Now, it is said that the testator had a lien on the partnership assets for this debt. In one sense, and in general sense, he had, but in the strict sense of lien do not think he had. His interest in the assets must have the shares ascertained; and, for that purpose, debt paid off. In that sense his right was to have assets realized so far as necessary for the purpose the liabilities satisfied and the surplus divided, nothing more than that. Although it is convenient describe it as a lien, in my opinion it is misleading, has been used in a misleading way in argument upon the footing that it was a lien pure and simple. my opinion it is not strictly a lien, although as Lin L.J., in his work makes use of the word it may described as a sort of equitable lien; and he does afterwards use the word "lien" as shortly to describe interest. His words, therefore, if they are strictly examined, do not seem to me to apply to a debt due a partner from the partnership. Further, there is important matter for consideration that leads me to conclusion that there is no disposition of the debt favour of the persons for whom the partner's share interest is given. There is no disposition in their fa of the interest upon this debt, which is payable, be all question, by the partnership to somebody. I can think it was out of the testator's contemplation, bec the last condition of the articles had been settled only days before the date of his will, and his will was with reference to the power expressly given by appendix to the articles of giving the devisee or the of the devisee the interest in the partnership, which to be continued as a going concern. He had, there the matter fully before him, and I cannot believe th he intended that the debt due to him from the part ship should be part of what was disposed of by w trust in the son for his widow and children that he w have omitted altogether to make any provision for application in the same way of the interest which payable by the partnership in respect of that debt. is clear that that interest would have to be set apart the partners and paid before any net profits whatev could be got at all. The widow was to take the gains and profits, minus the £150, just as the co partner would take his share in the net gains and profits. But the interest would have to be deducted and paid first before those net gains and profits would be arrived at. Under these circumstances, I come to the conclusion that the £3,866 11s. 10d. is not included in the disposition of the business, but passed to the widow as part of the testator's personal estate.

Furniss v. Phear. (a.)

Will — Construction — Supplying blank — Name of annuitant.

A testator, after giving legacies to Mary Wyatt, Matthew Wyatt, Frederick Wyatt, Louisa Atwell (called Wyatt), Maria Weir, and Emily De Vere, proceeded: "I give and bequeath to , daughter of , holding some situation about the church , the sum of fifty pounds annually during the continuance of her natural life, and I direct my trustees or trustee for the time being to pay to the said the said annuity of fifty pounds, . . . and the receipt of the said shall be sufficient discharge to my trustees or trustee for the time being; and from the decease of the said I direct," &c. And the testator directed that, "in case any one of my said legatees, Mary Wyatt, Frederick Wyatt, Matthew Wyatt, Louisa Atwell (called Wyatt), Maria Weir, Emily De Vere, or Marian Elliott," should become bankrupt, &c., her or his legacy should determine, and that the trustees or trustee should pay to her or him, "if in the case of Mary Wyatt, Matthew Wyatt, and Frederick Wyatt, the sum of forty shillings a week," and "if in the case of Maria Weir and Emily De Vere, the sum of thirty shillings a week," and "if in the case of Marian Elliott, the sum of fifteen shillings a week."

Held, on an originating summons by Marian Furniss (formerly Marian Elliott), supported by an affidavit by her to the effect that she was the daughter of James Elliott, beadle of the parish church at Epsom, and that the testator was acquainted with her, that she was entitled to the annuity of fifty pounds given by the will.

Adjourned summons.

Sir Matthew Wyatt, by his will, dated the 28th day of June, 1862, after giving legacies to Mary Wyatt, Matthew Wyatt, Frederick Wyatt, Louisa Atwell (called Wyatt), Maria Weir, and Emily De Vere, proceeded as follows:—"I give and bequeath to , daughter of , holding some situation about the church, , the sum of £50 annually during the continuance of her natural life; and I direct my trustees or trustee for the time being to pay to the said the said annuity of £50 by equal quarterly payments, to be computed from the quarter day next preceding my decease, for her own sole use and benefit, free from the control of any husband until she shall die or until she shall become a bankrupt or insolvent debtor within the meaning of any Act of Parliament concerning bankrupts or for the relief of insolvent debtors, or shall assign or incumber the same, or any part thereof, or her interest therein, or until, by her own act or operation of law (except the case of marriage), the said annuity given to her for her life would become vested in, or payable to, or for the benefit of, any other person or persons, which shall first happen (and the receipt of the said shall be sufficient discharge to my trustees or trustee for the time being), and from the decease of the said I direct that the said annuity shall merge into, and form part of, my general estate and income." And, after making various other provisions, the testator directed that, "in case any one of the said legatees, Mary Wyatt, Frederick Wyatt, Matthew Wyatt, Louisa Atwell (called Wyatt), Maria Weir, Emily de Vere, or Marian Elliott" should become a bankrupt, &c., the legacy given to her or him should determine, and that the trustees or trustee should pay to her or him, "if in the case of Mary Wyatt, Matthew Wyatt, and Frederick Wyatt, the sum of forty shillings a week," and "if in the case of Maria Weir and Emily de Vere, the sum of thirty shillings a week," and "if in the case of Maria Elliott, the sum of fifteen shillings a week."

The testator died on the 19th of July, 1886, and his will was proved on the 5th of January, 1887.

The probate of the will contained the blanks as set out above, but it appeared from the will itself that certain words had been originally inserted in the blanks, but had been erased, so that it was quite impossible to see what the words were, and also that the words, "holding some situation about the church," had been struck through with a pen, but remained so clearly readable that they were inserted in the probate, which was granted in common form to J. B. Phear, the executor and sole acting trustee of the will.

This was an originating summons taken out by Marian Furniss, wife of Thomas Furniss, and who was formerly Marian Elliott, daughter of James Elliott, beadle of the parish church of Epsom, Surrey, asking for a declaration that she was the person for whom the annuity of fifty pounds was intended, and that she was entitled to such annuity accordingly. The summons was supported by an affidavit by Marian Furniss proving her parentage and marriage, and that she was known to the testator.

S. L. Druce, for the summons.—There is sufficient indication in the will that the annuity was given to Marian Elliott, now Marian Furniss, to entitle her to receive it.

He referred to Price v. Page, 4 Ves. 680; Phillips v. Barker, 2 W. R. 110, 1 Sm. & G. 583; Martins v. Gardiner, 8 Sim. 73; Turner v. Hellard, 34 W. R. 420, 30 Ch. D. 390.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Dauney, for J. B. Phear.—The description of the annuitant is not sufficient to entitle her to receive the annuity. Martins v. Gardiner does not apply. It must not be assumed that the name Marian Elliott was ever in the will.

He referred to Mason v. Bateson, 7 W. R. 225, 26 Beav. 404; 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 21.

North, J.—I think that the will shows with reasonable clearness what was intended. [His lordship read section 21 of 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26, and proceeded:—] If the name of a legatee is obliterated so as to be illegible the legacy cannot take effect, and the will takes effect as if the legacy had been revoked. The result is that if you cannot get at the name of the legatee it has the same effect as if the will was revoked as to the legacy.

In the present case it is clear what is meant. The words of the will show that a female was intended, and that she was the daughter of a man holding some subordinate position in the church, for it is not likely that an incumbent or curate would be described in such a manner. This is negative evidence to exclude any female whose father does not fall within the description. The affidavit of the plaintiff shows that she was the daughter of a beadle, and that she was a person with whom the testator was acquainted. Then the clauses in the latter part of the will provide that in case of the forfeiture of any legacy by bankruptcy or otherwise, the legatee is to receive a weekly sum of money, and that in such case Marian Elliott, who is stated to be one of the legatees under the will, is to receive the sum of fifteen shillings a week. It is suggested that the name of Marian Elliott might have been inserted provisionally; but this suggestion would make the will a "solemn farce," as remarked by Lord Esher, M.R., in Turner v. Hellard. The subsequent clauses of the will convince me that the plaintiff is entitled to the annuity.

WOOD v. CHANDLER. (a.)

Parliament — Registration — Borough vote — Notice of objection — Neglect of statutory form — Registration Act, 1885 (48 Vict. c. 15), s. 18, schedule 3, Form I., No. 2.

Where notice of objection was given to a voter under the Registration Act, 1885, but the form of notice provided for the objector in the schedule of the said Act was not strictly complied with by him, it was held that the omission was a disregard of a substantive regulation, and not "an omission of any form or instruction" within section 18 which would not invalidate the notice.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the borough of Battersea and Clapham.

"Raymond Batchelor objected to the name of John Wood being retained on the Clapham occupiers' list of Parliamentary voters for the Parliamentary borough of Battersea and Clapham." The said objector signed his notice of objection thus:—"Raymond Batchelor, of 624, Wandsworth-road, on the list of Parliamentary voters for the Parliamentary borough of Battersea and Clapham." Exception was taken to the said notice of objection on the ground that the description of the objector was not in literal compliance with Form (I.), No. 2, Schedule 3, to 48 Vict. c. 15.

The following facts were established by the evidence:—The borough of Battersea and Clapham contains two distinct parishes — one, the parish of St. Mary, Battersea, and the other the parish of Clapham—and is divided into two divisions—viz., the Battersea division of the said borough and the Clapham division of the said borough—which divisions consist of fourteen polling districts, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 constituting the Battersea division, all of which are in the parish of St. Mary's, Battersea; and Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14 constituting the Clapham division, of which Nos. 7, 8, 9, and 10 are in the parish of St. Mary's, Battersea, and Nos. 11, 12, 13, and 14 are in the parish of Clapham. Raymond Batchelor's name appeared on the occupiers' list of the parish of Clapham, Clapham division of the said borough. The names of twenty-five persons other than the said John Wood were objected to under similar circumstances.

The revising barrister decided that the description of the said objector was a sufficient compliance with the form in the schedule of the Act, and expunged the names of John Wood and of the twenty-five other persons from the said list. Due notice of appeal from that decision was given, and the appeals in all the before-mentioned cases were directed to be consolidated, and it was directed that if the court be of opinion that the decision of the barrister was wrong, the register was to be amended by inserting the names of John Wood and of the twenty-five other persons in the said list.

McCaskie, for the appellant.—The notice of objection is defective in substance, as it does not mention the division or parish in which the objector is registered. It only gives the borough. This was decided in Ferrer v. Edmworth, 16 L. J. C. P. 132, and Crouthier v. Bradney, 12 W. R. 176. In the case of Samuels v. Hitchmough, 11 W. R. 92, where the notice was held good, the reasons assigned affirm the appellant's contention. The case of Oram v. Cole, 13 W. R. 26, which was relied upon before the revising barrister, is distinguishable, for the division was sufficiently indicated. This defect is not a formal omission within section 18 of 48 Vict. c. 15, but a substantial one, so that the notice must be invalidated by it.

No person appeared in support of the notice.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—This is not a case in which we have to determine whether the barrister might or might not have amended, as to which I express no opinion. There was no amendment, and the barrister has held the notice to be good as it stands. It certainly is not in the form given by the Act, and the 18th section says that the forms given shall be used. That appears to be imperative; and, though it is true that there follow words that "the disregard of any form shall not invalidate," those words do not mean that total disregard of all forms is protected. But I have no difficulty in saying that the form given has been disregarded, not in form, but in substance. The notice does not give the person objected to, the information as to the person objecting which the Act intends to be given, and the absence of which might put him to great inconvenience. I therefore hold that, in not following the form in this respect, the objector has not only not followed the form, but has in substance failed to comply with the enactment. I think, therefore, the revising barrister was wrong, and that his decision must be overruled and the notice held bad.

Pollock, B.—I have come to the same conclusion. The grounds given for such a conclusion in the cases cited are now stronger than they were at the time of the decisions referred to, as there might now be parishes partly in one division and partly in another, and therefore the objector, by omitting to mention the parish in which he resides, might put the voter to great trouble in finding out for himself in what parish or in what division the objector does reside, and omissions of that kind might cause enormous inconvenience. This is not a mere formality, for the omission withheld material information. Whether an amendment might have been made it is not necessary to decide.

Hawkins, J.—I concur in thinking the revising barrister was wrong. No person is entitled to make an objection unless he is on a list of voters for the place where the voter is qualified; and the 18th section requires that the party objected to should have the means of finding out whether the objector is qualified to object or not. The form required that it should be stated what is the parish or township on the list in which the objector is to be found, and, if the parish is not stated, the party objected to might have to search several lists—an inconvenience which the statute intended to prevent.

Appeal allowed, with costs.

In re Duty on the Institution of Civil Engineers. (a.)

Duty on property—Bodies corporate and incorporate—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 51), s. 11, sub-section 3—Property for the promotion of education.

The property of the Institution of Civil Engineers is not property appropriated and applied for the promotion of general education within the exemption of sub-section 3 of section 11 of 48 & 49 Vict. c. 51, because it is appropriated and applied for the promotion of a particular branch of knowledge for the purpose of enabling members of the institution to practise the profession of a civil engineer most effectively and successfully.

This was a writ of summons calling upon the secretary of the Institution of Civil Engineers to pay certain duties, assessed on that institution by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in pursuance of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 51), or to show cause why default had been made in payment of the said duties. An appearance had been duly entered to the writ.

The commissioners had assessed the duty upon the property of the institution under section 11 of the Act, which enacts: "Whereas certain property, by reason of the same belonging to, or being vested in, bodies corporate or unincorporate, escapes liability to probate, legacy, or succession duties, and it is expedient to impose a duty thereon by way of compensation to the revenue: Be it therefore enacted that there shall be levied and paid to her Majesty in respect of all rent and personal property which shall have belonged to or been vested in any body corporate or unincorporate during the yearly period ending on the 5th day of April, 1885, or during any subsequent yearly period ending on the same day in any year, a duty at the rate of £5 per centum upon the annual value, income, or profits of such property accrued to such body corporate or unincorporate in the same yearly period, after deducting therefrom all necessary outgoings, including the receiver's remuneration, and costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred in the management of such property. Subject to exemption from such duty in favour of property of the descriptions following, that is to say:—

". . . (3) Property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied for any purpose connected with any religious persuasion, or for any charitable purpose, or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts. . . .

"(6) Property acquired by or with funds voluntarily contributed to any body corporate or unincorporate within a period of thirty years immediately preceding."

The institution had not rendered an account for the assessment of duty to the commissioners under section 17 of the above Act, and the commissioners had not appointed any person to take an account of the same.

The property of the institution consists of premises No. 25, and part of No. 24, Great George-street, Westminster, which are partly freehold and partly leasehold, and of furniture, and of certain investments. The property is the product of donations, or of bequests, from members of the institution, or arises from savings made out of the annual subscriptions of members; but no part of the income arises from the sale of publications, or otherwise, to the public.

The institution was incorporated by royal charter under date of June 3, 1828. The charter defines the nature and objects of the institution thus:—"The general advancement of mechanical science, and more particularly for promoting the acquisition of that species of knowledge which constitutes the profession of a civil engineer, being the art of directing the great sources of power in nature for the use and convenience of man, as the means of production and of traffic in states, both for external and internal trade, as applied to the construction of roads, bridges, aqueducts, canals, river navigation, and docks for internal intercourse and exchange, and in the construction of ports, harbours, moles, breakwaters, and lighthouses, and in the art of navigation by artificial power for the purpose of commerce, and in the construction and adaption of machinery, and in the drainage of cities and towns."

In the last report of the council it is pointed out that, since the charter was drawn, the range of practice of the profession has become much enlarged, and after enumerating a great number of classes of works, with which practitioners in the art may now have to do, the report proceeds thus:—"This is a comprehensive, but by no means a complete catalogue, and if an estimate is attempted to be formed of the work done under it in the last century, and of the effect this work has had on the development of trade and commerce, on finance, and indeed on every possible aspect of human interest, it must be admitted that the profession of civil engineering has become a truly great power."

The whole property of the institution is and always has been exclusively devoted to the furtherance of these objects.

Section 11 of the bye-laws now in force refers to the constitution of the institution, and provides that it shall consist of corporate members and associates and honorary members, and that the institution may also have attached to it associates who are not entitled to the privileges of corporate membership, and students.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G. (Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and A. Dicey with him), for the Inland Revenue.—The property of the Institution of Civil Engineers is liable to pay duty under section 11 of 48 & 49 Vict. c. 51. The institution is unable to show that their property is exempt from payment of such duty, by reason of the protection offered by sub-section 3 of the above section. Sub-section 6 of the same section does not help them: In re the Duty on the New University Club, 35 W. R. 774, 18 Q. B. D. 720. The principle of the decision in Reg. v. Institution of Civil Engineers, 28 W. R. 253, 5 Q. B. D. 46, covers this case also. The Scotch case The Society of Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 14 Rettie, 34, is also in point.

A. Charles, Q.C. (Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and Radcliffe with him), for the Institution of Civil Engineers.—The institution is within the exemption of sub-section 3 of section 11. It is an educating body and there is nothing in the Statute to limit "education" to general education. The word "exclusively," on which the decision in Reg. v. Institution of Civil Engineers is based, is omitted in this Statute.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., in reply.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—It is evident that the funds of the institution come within the general words of section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, and are subject to the duty sought to be imposed, unless the exemption in sub-section 3 applies. What is sought to be exempted is substantially the whole, or nearly the whole, property of the Institution. The exemption is claimed on the ground that this is property which is, and the income and profits of which are, "legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts," within the meaning of sub-section 3 of the above Act. The collocation of the words in that sub-section however throw some light upon the meaning of the particular words upon which the claim for exemption is founded. I do not think that the words "for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts," mean the teaching of a particular thing connected with education, or literature, or science, or the fine arts, for if that were the meaning, the application of the exemption might be carried to almost any conceivable institution which taught anything conducing to education, to literature, to science, or to the fine arts; indeed it is very difficult to imagine, if such a definition were adopted, what institution would be excluded, for nearly all lawful institutions teach something or other which may be advantageous to education, literature, science, or the fine arts. An institution to teach people how to make shoes, for instance, might be within the exemption, because it is possible that the making of shoes extremely well would in a remote way aid the purposes of some portion of education, or of science, and so forth. The words of the exemption must receive a more reasonable construction. Those words must in my opinion be construed to mean general education, general literature, science considered as a branch of human knowledge, and the fine arts as extending to all those matters, great and small, with which the fine arts are connected.

That being so, does the Institution of Civil Engineers come within it? I do not doubt but that it may be a most excellent and valuable body, nor that it may contribute a great deal towards the general intelligence and advancement of this country, but it is instituted and carried on, not for the pure advancement of the laws of science, but for the promotion of such a study of the laws of science as shall, in the words of the charter, be conducive to "the general advancement of mechanical science, and more particularly for promoting that species of knowledge which constitutes the profession of a civil engineer." It is a profession prosecuted like all others for the purposes of honourable gain; it exists for the purpose of promoting such knowledge as will make civil engineers better civil engineers. I think that it is not an institution for the promotion of general education, literature, science, or fine arts generally, but for the promotion of a particular branch of knowledge for the purpose of increasing the intelligence and cultivation of the particular profession which deals with one branch of mechanical knowledge, and therefore that this institution is not brought within the words of the exemption. Further, there is authority on the subject which seems to me to conclude this case in principle. It is true that the case of Reg. v. Institution of Civil Engineers is not exactly in point, for the statute which had to be construed in that case contained the word "exclusively," which is not to be found in section 11 of the Act of 1885. But I think it makes very little practical difference whether you say that a thing is "exclusively" for the promotion of education, or (which is, I think, the true meaning of the words in section 11) that it is mainly and chiefly for the promotion of education, literature, science, and the fine arts. The difference in the wording of the statute in that case and in the present does not, to my mind, make any substantial distinction between the principle which was applied there and the principle which ought to be applied here. The grounds for the decision in that case seem to me to cover this case, and I think that the decision in the Scotch case proceeded on the same principle.

In the Scotch case the property of the Society of Writers to the Signet was proposed to be assessed. Objection was taken that the society was for the purposes of education; and it was answered that it was not for purposes of education, but for objects which were happily expressed by Lord Shand as follows:—"The maintenance of a body of professional men with recognised privileges—privileges which are of importance, and which were perhaps some years ago more extensive than they are now, and the object which the society has in view is not education, or the promotion of education, literature, or science, but that he shall become a member of the society in order to practise his profession as writer to the signet."

Now, without forgetting the distinction which undoubtedly exists between that case and this, I agree with Lord Shand that the object of the Society of Writers to the Signet is not to promote the study of the law, or the understanding of the theory of the general law, but to promote the wholesome practise of an honourable profession. The members of the society join it in order that they may more fitly and adequately practise that profession. In the present case the Institution of Civil Engineers is undoubtedly a teaching body, and persons become members or pupils, not for the purpose of the advancement of education or so forth, but in order that they may obtain certain technical knowledge of mechanics for the purpose of practising with more success the profession of a civil engineer. The distinction between the two cases is that no one in Scotland can become a writer to the signet without joining the society and going through the course which the society prescribes; but for a man to become a civil engineer it is not necessary that he should become a member of the Society of Civil Engineers. This distinction makes no valid difference in the principle to be applied, and for obvious reasons: no man is bound to be a writer to the signet, or to adopt that as his profession; but if he chooses to adopt it he must, in order to pursue it effectively, join the society. No man is bound, if he chooses to be a civil engineer, to join the Institution of Civil Engineers; but any man who wants to practise that profession effectively and successfully will join the institution and go through the course of teaching which it provides. The distinction does not appear to me to go to the root of the matter, or to prevent the principle of the Scotch case from applying here. Therefore, for the general reasons I have given, I think that the Crown is entitled to succeed.

County court—Action remitted from High Court under the County Courts Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 1[illegible] s. 10—New defendant added by order of county court judge—Prohibition.

An action in which the plaintiff claimed £150 damages for illegal distress was, on the application of the defendant, remitted to a county court under section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1867. The plaintiff then obtained an order from the judge of the county court, under which a new defendant was, against his will, added to the record.

Held, that the county court judge had no power to make such an order.

Appeal from an order of A. L. Smith, J., directing the issue of a writ of prohibition to the judge of the Clerkenwell County Court.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was for illegal distress, the plaintiff claiming £150 damages, and was brought in the High Court against the defendant Coulson, on whose application it was remitted to the county court of Middlesex holden at Clerkenwell, under section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1867. At the hearing before the county court judge on the 17th of October, 1887, an order was made that the further hearing of the action should be adjourned generally, with leave to the plaintiff to amend the proceedings. The plaintiff thereupon added one Ferdinand Strausberg as a defendant to the action, and delivered amended particulars of demand. On the 9th of December notice was sent by the registrar of the court to Strausberg that he had been so added as defendant. On the 20th of January, 1888, the matter came on for further hearing, the plaintiff being the only party who appeared, when judgment was given for the plaintiff against both defendants for £121 10s. 2d. On the 17th of February Strausberg applied at chambers for a prohibition; and A. L. Smith, J., made an order restraining the county court judge from proceeding on the judgment so far as it affected the defendant Strausberg.

From this order the plaintiff appealed.

Overend, for the plaintiff.—The action, having been remitted under the Act of 1867, became a county court case; and the county court judge had jurisdiction to add a defendant under ord. 14, r. 2, of the County Court Rules, 1886.

G. S. Bower, for Strausberg.

Manisty, J.—The question is whether, in a case which has been remitted to the county court under section 10 of the Act of 1867, there is power in a county court judge to add a defendant against his will. That section says that in any action of tort brought in the superior court, on the defendant making an affidavit that the plaintiff has no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant, should a verdict be not found for the plaintiff, a judge may make an order that the cause be remitted for trial before a county court to be therein named; "and the county court so named shall have all the same powers and jurisdiction with respect to the cause as if both parties had agreed, by memorandum signed by them, that the said county court should have power to try the said action." Both parties—that is, the parties to the cause—are to be supposed to have agreed. But Strausberg, who is now sought to be made a defendant, was not one of the parties to the cause; neither did he ever agree. I think there was no power in the county court judge to order him to be made a defendant.

Hawkins, J.—I am of the same opinion. This was an action of tort, in which the plaintiff claimed against the original defendant £150, a sum beyond the jurisdiction of the county court. It was remitted to the county court at the instance of the then defendant. The plaintiff thereupon applied to the county court judge to add Strausberg as a new defendant. He objected, and the order adding him was made against his will. Now, does section 10 of the Act of 1867 give the county court judge jurisdiction to make such an order? The effect of that section, no doubt, is that, as between the original plaintiff and defendant, an action so remitted becomes a county court case to all intents and purposes, and is subject to the rules of the county court. But it was not intended to give the county court judge power to add a new defendant against his will in a case where, if it had not been for the order remitting the action, he could have had no jurisdiction. Therefore the order for prohibition was right.

Appeal dismissed.

Bankruptcy — Proof by creditor resident abroad — Rejection — Appeal — Security for costs—Practice—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 131, 148.

Where the proof of a creditor resident abroad is rejected by the trustee in bankruptcy, and such creditor appeals from the rejection, the court has no jurisdiction to order him to give security for the costs of such appeal.

Application on behalf of the trustee in the bankruptcy that security for costs might be given by a creditor who had appealed against the rejection of a proof.

A proof for £12,000 against the estate of the bankrupt had been tendered by Madame de Viney, a French lady, resident in Paris, which proof had been rejected by the trustee. The creditor appealed from the rejection, and the trustee now applied that security for costs might be given.

F. C. Willis, for the trustee.—Considerable expense will be caused by the appeal, and the case is one in which security ought to be given.

Herbert Reed, for the creditor.—There is nothing in the Bankruptcy Act or the rules which gives the court jurisdiction to make such an order as this. Rule 131 applies only to appeals to the High Court, and rule 148 deals with the case where the petitioning creditor resides abroad. A trustee cannot compel a creditor resident abroad to give security for costs simply by rejecting his proof.

F. C. Willis in reply.—Even though there may be no special enactment in the Bankruptcy Act or rules, the practice under the Judicature Acts is applicable. The court has jurisdiction, as a branch of the High Court, to order security for costs to be given by a creditor resident out of the jurisdiction whenever it thinks it right to do so.

Cave, J.—In my opinion this application must be refused. No enactment or authority has been produced on behalf of the trustee that security for costs can be ordered to be given in such a case as this. The rules which have been referred to point out the cases in which such security can be required, and that being so a primâ facie inference is raised that such security cannot be enforced in cases which are not mentioned in the rules. In my opinion it would be somewhat oppressive to require a creditor, who is prosecuting his claim to prove against a bankrupt's estate here, to give security for costs of an appeal against the rejection of his proof by the trustee. If the application could be granted, a trustee in bankruptcy might be tempted to reject a proof without proper investigation in order that he might get security for the costs of investigating it before the court.

Application refused.

Small bankruptcy — Discharge — Appeal — Leave not obtained—Right of appeal—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 28, 104, 121—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 273.

Rule 273 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, by which it is provided that, in a small bankruptcy, no appeal shall lie from any order of the court except by leave of the court, does not apply in the case of an order made upon application by a bankrupt for his discharge.

Appeal on behalf of the bankrupt from an order of his Honour Judge Lushington in the county court at Croydon absolutely refusing an order of discharge.

Horne Payne, Q.C., and McIntyre, for the bankrupt.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver, the respondent to the appeal, took a preliminary objection.—This is a small bankruptcy under section 121 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and section 121, after specifying certain modifications which are in such case to be made in the Act, provides, by sub-section (3), that such other modifications may be made in the provisions of the Act as may be prescribed by general rules with the view of saving expense and simplifying procedure; "but nothing in this section shall permit the modification of the provisions of this Act relating to the examination or discharge of the debtor." By rule 273 of the Bankrupty Rules, 1886, in small bankruptcies "no appeal shall lie from any order of the court except by leave of the court." In the present case not only has no leave been obtained, but leave was applied for and refused. The refusal to give leave to appeal is an absolute bar in ordinary cases, but, this being an appeal from the refusal of a discharge, it is a question whether the rule prohibiting the appeal can apply.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that this preliminary objection cannot prevail, and that the appeal must be heard. It is only right, however, that the point should have been brought before us. Section 121, sub-section (3), provides that in the case of a small bankruptcy "such other modification may be made in the provisions of this Act as may be prescribed by general rules with the view of saving expense and simplifying procedure; but nothing in this section shall permit the modification of the provisions of this Act relating to the examination or discharge of the debtor." That seems to indicate an intention on the part of the Legislature that the provisions of the Act relating to discharge should not be modified. Those provisions are in section 28, and are coupled with the right of appeal given by section 104. They may certainly be said to be modified by a rule saying that there shall be no appeal.

Held, that the expenses in question were not costs the execution within the meaning of section 46, su[illegible] section (1), and were properly disallowed on taxation.

Appeal from an order of his Honour Judge Bagnall[illegible] in the county court of Bedford allowing certain sheriff's charges as against the trustee in bankruptcy.

On the 16th of August, 1886, the sheriff of Huntingdonshire levied execution on certain goods, chattels, and growing crops of one Charles Woodham under a writ of fi. fa. On the 19th of August, 1886, the sheriff's officer was served with a notice claiming the said goods, chattels, and growing crops as the property of a third party, and an interpleader summons was issued returnable on the 30th of August, but on the 28th of August the claimant withdrew his claim. Prior to such withdrawal the sheriff's officer instructed a local firm of auctioneers to advertise a sale of the things seized for the 7th of September, 1886, but on the 1st of September, on going to the debtor's farm, he found that part of the corn had been cut and carried, but not threshed, and part was still standing. The part that had been cut and carried was not sufficient to satisfy the execution debt, and the sheriff's officer postponed the sale for a week, and gave orders for cutting and threshing the corn.

On the 8th of September, 1886, the sheriff's officer paid the sum of £10, and on the 10th of September a further sum of £15 for harvest wages for the cutting and carrying of the corn seized when standing, and on the 20th of September he paid £10 15s. for threshing and dressing the corn. The liability in respect of which the above payments were made was incurred by him before notice was received of the receiving order which was made against the debtor on the 11th of September, 1886, and the official receiver took over the possession of the said goods, chattels, and growing crops from the sheriff charged with the costs of the execution. The sheriff delivered his bill of costs to the official receiver which included a charge of £25, representing the £10 and £15 paid on account of harvest work done while in possession, and a charge of the £10 5s. for threshing corn whilst in possession. These charges were disallowed on taxation by the registrar of the county court, and the sheriff, without carrying in before the registrar objections in writing to the disallowance of the charges, or applying to him to review his taxation, once appealed to the county court judge for a review.

The county court judge allowed the charges, and the questions now raised on an appeal from that decision were (1) Whether it was competent for the judge, under the circumstances, to review the taxation of the registrar; and (2) Whether he properly allowed either or both of the said items?

(a.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lindsell, for the trustee.—The judge was not entitled to review the decision of the registrar on taxation. Rule 118 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, provides that "in any case in which, pursuant to section 46 (1) of the Act, a sheriff is required to deliver goods to the official receiver or trustee, such sheriff shall, without delay, bring in his bill of costs for taxation, which shall be taxed by the taxing officer of the court having jurisdiction in the bankruptcy." Then the Appendix to the said rules, Part II., section 7, is headed "General Regulations" and rule 16 of that section provides that any person who is dissatisfied with the allowance or disallowance by the taxing officer in any bill of costs taxed by him of the whole or any part of any items may, at any time before the certificate or allocatur is signed, carry in before the taxing officer an objection in writing to such allowance or disallowance, and may thereupon apply to the taxing officer to review the taxation in respect of the same. The county court judge held that that did not apply to a sheriff's bill of costs, but only to costs of solicitors. Moreover, these costs ought not to have been allowed in any event. The sheriff could not recover them against an execution creditor. The duty of the sheriff is to sell with all reasonable expedition, and he has no other duty.

He referred to Playfair v. Musgrove, 14 M. & W. 239.

Muir Mackenzie, for the sheriff.—The whole of Part II. of the Appendix to the Rules applies to solicitor's costs only. It is headed "Scale of Solicitor's Costs." No part of the regulations apply to sheriff's costs. Then under section 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the judge is simply reviewing the order of the registrar. An order of the registrar as to costs is an order of the court, and subject both to review and appeal. Further, these charges were properly allowed, because a larger right is given to the sheriff where there is a bankruptcy, as is shown by section 145 of the Act.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed, and it must be allowed on the merits, without regard to the question whether there was any right to go before the judge in this case or not. It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to express a definite opinion, but, for my own part, I entertain very great doubt whether there was any right to go before the judge at all on the question of taxation. At the same time I reserve the right to decide the point if it ever comes before me on a future occasion.

As to the other point, I am of opinion that these payments were properly disallowed. The sheriff's officer was not bound to incur these expenses, and there is no provision giving him liberty to incur them or providing for his being repaid if he does so. The sheriff may levy and sell, and if he desires to go further he must obtain the authority either of the execution creditor or of the execution debtor, but there is nothing in any statute relating to the office of sheriff showing that there is any duty on him to incur these expenses on his own motion without authority. In the present case it is alleged that what was done was to the advantage of the creditor, and presumably it would be to the advantage of the debtor, and, if so, the plain course was to apply to the creditor and the debtor for authority to incur the expenses. As a matter of fact the sheriff did incur expenses without the consent of the creditor or of the debtor which the law did not authorize him to incur. Under section 46 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, at any rate, those expenses cannot be recovered as part of the costs of the execution, and the decision of the registrar was quite right. If there is any other mode in which the sheriff can apply to get these costs he may take it. I do not say there is, but he has taken the wrong course in trying to get them as costs of the execution.

HEYES v. HEYES AND MASON. (a.)

Divorce — Adultery — Husband's petition — Petitioner's conduct—Delay—Appeal—Practice—Rule 62.

A decree of dissolution of marriage refused to a husband whose wife had been guilty of adultery, where, after living with her for eleven years, he had broken up the home in order to get rid of her because of her drunken habits, and had made no inquiries about her for eight years, when he discovered she had been cohabiting with another man during the interval, and five years after that he had filed his petition.

Decision of Butt, J., affirmed.

By rule 62 of the Rules in Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, an application for the rehearing of a cause should be made to a divisional court.

Hearing before Butt, J., without a jury, of husband's petition for dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery.

The action was undefended, the respondent and co-respondent having filed no answer.

The parties, who were mill hands living in Lancashire, were married in 1863, and lived together until 1874, when the husband, owing to the drunken habits of his wife, left his home, but returned the next day and sold off all the furniture in order to get rid of her, she having in the meantime left the house, and he did not see her or hear of her till 1882, when he met her accidentally in the street. Soon after he ascertained that she had been cohabiting with the co-respondent since she left her home. The petitioner explained the delay by his want of means.

The adultery was proved.

Oct. 26.—Middleton, for the petitioner.

BUTT, J., refused to grant a decree, first, on the ground that the petitioner left his wife, made no inquiries about her for eight years, and when he found her living with another man said nothing; and, secondly, waited five or six years before coming to this court.

Petition dismissed.

The petitioner appealed by application to the Divisional Court for a re-hearing.

March 5.—Middleton, for the petitioner.—[HANNEN, P.—Ought not this application to have been to the Court of Appeal, as the case was tried without a jury?]—No, we come here under rule 62. It was the old practice under that rule, and that practice was preserved when the rule was amended by the Rules of August 12, 1885 (see 29 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, p. 708). Rule 62, as amended, is—"An application for a new trial of issues of fact tried by a jury or for a re-hearing of a cause shall be made . . . to a divisional court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division." [The COURT then proceeded to hear the case on the merits.] It appears that the wife, at the time of the separation, was earning £1 a week, and the husband £1, and therefore she was not left destitute. The conditions in life of the parties must be looked at, and it does not seem unreasonable for a husband to break up his home, as his wife was a confirmed drunkard, and he could take no other course. It cannot, therefore, be said the separation was without excuse. His conduct cannot be so connected with the subsequent adultery as to justify a dismissal of the petition. As to the unreasonable delay, the husband's wages were only £1 a week, and it is now sworn to that he was out of work during the five or six years two periods of three months and six months respectively, which would necessarily cripple his resources.

Hannen, P.—We are of opinion that this is not a case for re-hearing. The question is, whether or not the petitioner has been guilty of conduct conducing to the adultery of the respondent? He had a drunken wife, and it is suggested that places him in a different position. We cannot reasonably be asked to say that any man, whether well off or not, is entitled, under such circumstances, to turn his wife out of doors without more. In casting her off altogether he is paying no heed to her future. Here the adultery is substantially after the home was broken up. Then the husband learns that his wife is living in adultery, and waits five years. The excuse made for this delay is want of means, but he appears to have the same means now as he had then. The application must be dismissed.

Application for grant of letters of administration of the personal estate and effects of Henry Innes Nares to Sir George Strong Nares, the natural and lawful brother of the half blood, and one of the next of kin of the deceased, to the exclusion of the divorced wife of the deceased.

The original domicil of the deceased was English, and on the 13th of May, 1876, he married M. A. Hecker in Dublin. In November, 1876, they went to Central India with the regiment to which the deceased was attached, and he resided there till February, 1886, when he was ordered home.

On the 4th of May, 1883, he obtained a decree nisi in the Court of Judicature, Bombay, for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery, and this decree was made absolute on the 6th of March, 1884. The wife had since married again, and up to September, 1887, was residing at a known address in the Pas de, Calais, but had left no address except with the postal authorities, who, in accordance with their regulations, refused to disclose it.

A notice of this application by registered prepaid letter had been sent to the last known address on the 17th of January and no reply received.

Middleton, in support of the application.—The divorce proceedings were effectual to bar the wife's right to administration. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 104, an Act for establishing High Courts of Judicature in India, section 1 defines the jurisdiction and powers of such high courts and confers (inter alia) on them matrimonial jurisdiction to be defined by letters patent. The letters patent issued originally under this Act were amended by others of the 28th of December, 1865, section 35 of which related to matrimonial jurisdiction, and were followed by the Indian Divorce Act (Act IV of 1869 of the Indian Legislature), section 2 of which provides that the Act shall extend only to Christian British subjects in British India who shall reside there at the time of presenting the petition, and either the marriage shall have been solemnized there or the adultery, &c., committed there. The result, therefore, is the same as if the divorce had taken place here.

Graham v. Edge and Another (the Official Liquidators of the Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society). (a.)

Company — Unregistered company — Action against official liquidator in his personal capacity—Action stayed—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 87, 92, 199, 203.

The plaintiff sued the defendants personally to recover rent charged on property which had vested in them under section 203 of the Companies Act, 1862, as official liquidators of an unregistered company in process of winding up.

Held, that the action in that form was obviously not maintainable, and therefore ought to be stayed.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Huddleston, B., and Manisty, J.) reported 20 Q. B. D. 538.

The action was brought to recover arrears of ground-rent. In June, 1872, the plaintiff conveyed land to certain persons, subject to a rent charge of £52 2s. 9d. per annum. In 1878 the land passed into the possession of the trustees of the Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society, which was an unregistered company. On October 25, 1881, an order was made for the winding up of the building society under the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, relating to unregistered companies. On February 21, 1882, an order was made under section 203 of the Companies Act, 1862, vesting all property of the building society in the defendants as official liquidators. The defendants paid the rent up to May, 1885, but subsequently declined to do so. The action was brought without leave of the court in the winding-up proceedings. An application having been made to stay the action on the ground of non-compliance with section 87 of the Companies Act, 1862, ordered by Hawkins, J., at chambers, to the Divisional Court, by whom the action was stayed on that ground.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. W. Chitty, for the plaintiff.—The action is brought, not against the building society, but against the official liquidators. Section 87 of the Companies Act, 1862, only requires the leave of the court for actions brought against the company which is being wound up. The defendants, by taking possession of the property and receiving the rent, have made themselves personally liable. They are in the same position as a trustee in bankruptcy: Hanson v. Stevenson, 1 B. & A. 303; Ex parte Fowler, 27 W. R. 144, 9 Ch. D. 252.

Danckwerts, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, for the defendants, were not called upon to argue.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case an action is brought against the defendants to recover arrears of an annual ground-rent alleged to be due from the defendants to the plaintiff in consequence of the defendants having been in possession of the land which was subject to the ground-rent. The action is brought in such a form as to make the defendants personally liable, and it was totally declared by the plaintiff's counsel that the object of the action was to make the defendants and their property liable, and that it was not directed against the building society and its assets. It is true that in the heading of the writ the defendants are described as the official liquidators of the Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society, but no mention is made in the operative part of it of their official capacity, and it is plain that, if judgment were signed upon this writ, execution could be issued against them personally.

Now is there any colour for saying that the defendants are personally liable to such an action as this? The land in question vested in the defendants under the provisions of section 203 of the Companies Act, 1862, as official liquidators of the building society. By section 199 of the same Act the court has power to wind up an unregistered company just as if it were a registered company, and by section 92 the court has power to appoint official liquidators to conduct the proceedings in the winding up and to assist the court therein. The official liquidators are, therefore, officers of the court appointed to assist the court. Then, by section 203, the court may direct that all such property as may belong to the company, or to trustees on behalf of the company, should vest in the official liquidators by their official names, and "thereupon the same shall vest accordingly, and the official liquidators may in their official names . . . bring or defend any actions, suits, or other legal proceedings relating to any property vested in them." The official liquidators have no power to disobey the order of the court and to refuse to let the property vest in them. They are not in the position of trustees in bankruptcy, who can elect whether they will or will not disclaim. The official liquidators have no such power. The defendants cannot, therefore, be held to be personally liable on the ground that they elected to hold this property. They held it solely in their official capacity, and no action will lie against them in their personal and individual capacity in respect of it. That being so, there is no colour for the maintenance of this action against the defendants personally, and therefore the action cannot justly be allowed to proceed. It is the duty of the court to stay an action which cannot be maintained on the ground that it is frivolous and vexatious. We therefore agree with the Divisional Court, though not on the same grounds, that this action should be stayed. Whether the defendants can be sued in their official capacity for these arrears, and whether, if so, the leave of the court is necessary in order to bring the action, are questions which it is not necessary for us now to decide.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The action has been brought against the defendants in their personal and individual capacity, and not in their official capacity as official liquidators. The intention of the action was to make them personally liable, and not to attach the assets of the company. It is therefore, in my opinion, unnecessary to decide whether, if the writ had been differently framed and the action had been brought against the defendants in their official capacity, the leave of the court would have been necessary. All that we have to decide is, whether there is any colour for the suggestion that the defendants can be made personally liable. I think that there is none. By section 203 the property is vested in the official liquidators by their official names. They are not clothed with the property except as official liquidators, and it is in that capacity only that they can be sued in respect of that property, if at all. It is the plain duty of the court to stay actions which are obviously untenable, as being oppressive, and I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed, and that the action must be stayed.

Appeal dismissed.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 138), affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Stephen and Charles, JJ.), reported ante, p. 138.

The action was brought against the local board for trespass in entering upon a certain yard belonging to the plaintiff, for the purpose of paving the centre of the yard as a roadway, under the powers given them by section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

At the trial before Manisty, J., judgment was entered for the plaintiff.

The facts of the case are set out in the report in the court below, and it is sufficient to state that the question raised was whether a yard which led to a mill, and through which there was no regular thoroughfare, was a "street" within the meaning of section 150 of the Public Health Act.

The Divisional Court held that they were bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Mayor of Portsmouth v. Smith, 13 Q. B. D. 184, 32 W. R. Dig. 123, to read into section 150 the definition of "street" given by section 4, and they entered judgment for the defendants accordingly.

The plaintiff appealed.

By section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, "street" includes any highway not being a turnpike road, and any public bridge not being a county bridge, and any road, lane, footway, square, court, alley, or passage, whether a thoroughfare or not.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C. (Longstaffe with him), for the plaintiff.—It is true that in The Mayor of Portsmouth v. Smith the Master of the Rolls and Bowen, L.J., considered that the interpretation clause must be read with the other sections, but that opinion was not material to the decision, and when the case was affirmed in the House of Lords (10 App. Cas. 364, 33 W. R. Dig. 128) Lord Blackburn (page 373) and Lord Watson (page 375) did not concur with that opinion.

Forbes, Q.C., and Wilberforce, for the defendants, were not called upon to argue.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It is clear that if the interpretation clause is to be read into section 150 nothing more is to be said. I am still of the opinion which I expressed in the Portsmouth case, that the words of the interpretation clause must be read into the section. No doubt the House of Lords did not affirm the view I then took, but all that they said was that "at present" they were unable to concur with it. I therefore adhere to my opinion, and the plaintiff's only course is to go to the House of Lords to solve the doubt.

Mayor's Court—Removal of action before entry for trial, but more than a month after service of plaint—Mayor's Court Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 157), s. 17.

By section 17 of the Mayor's Court Act, 1857, no cause depending in the Mayor's Court shall be removed before judgment therein into any superior court unless the writ removing such cause shall have been lodged with the proper officer of the court within one month after the service of the plaint, or unless such writ shall have been lodged with such officer before such action shall have been entered for trial.

More than a month after the service of the plaint, but before the action was entered for trial, application was made for a writ of certiorari to remove the action from the Mayor's Court to the High Court.

Held, that the application was in time.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Mathew and A. L. Smith, JJ.), reported 20 Q.B.D. 554.

The action was commenced in the Mayor's Court November 25, 1887, the plaint being served the next day. Appearance was entered on December 3. On January 17, the cause not having been entered for trial, the defendant took out a summons for a certiorari to remove the action into the High Court. This was granted by the master, but on appeal Field, J., referred the matter to the court. The Divisional Court differed, Mathew, J., holding that the summons was in time, and A. L. Smith, J., that it was not. A. L. Smith, J., as the junior judge, having withdrawn his judgment, the order of the master was affirmed, and the plaintiff appealed.

By section 17 of the Mayor's Court Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 157): "No cause depending in the Mayor's Court shall be removed before judgment therein into any superior court unless the writ removing such cause shall have been lodged with the proper officer of the court within one month after the service of the plaint, or unless such writ shall have been lodged with such officer before such action shall have been entered for trial according to the practice of the Mayor's Court.

Horne Payne, Q.C. (R. F. Colam with him), for the plaintiff.—The question is whether the section gives an alternative. We say that it does not, and that 'or' should be read as 'and.' More than a month had expired from the service of the plaint, and the summons was therefore out of time. If the action was set down for trial within the month it could not be removed after that.

Reginald Bray, for the defendant, was not called upon.

FRY, L.J.—In this case I should not have thought there was any difficulty, but the fact that the judges of the court below have differed shows that that is not so. It is a short point, and arises solely on the construction of section 17 of the Mayor's Court Act, 1857. Does that section give an alternative? May the cause be removed either within a month after the service of plaint or at any time before it is set down for trial? I think that the word "or" does express an alternative, and I see no reason to read it as equivalent to "and." The effect is to give the longer of two periods to the person seeking to remove the action. If it is entered for trial within the month he has a month from the service of the plaint, but if the month has elapsed, and the action is still not entered for trial, he may remove it at any time before it is so entered. He cannot therefore have less than a month, and he may have more. I can see nothing unreasonable in this construction, and I think Mathew, J., was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The point is, perhaps, a difficult one, but I must decide it according to the best of my ability. I think two alternative periods are given by the section for the lodging of the writ of certiorari. I do not think "or" should ever be read as "and," unless there are circumstances compelling us to vary its meaning. Here I can see nothing unjust or unreasonable in giving the word its natural and ordinary construction.

The appeal therefore fails.

Appeal dismissed.

GRUNDY v. TOWNSEND. (a.)

Account stated—Jurisdiction of Mayor's Court—Prohibition—Estoppel—Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 157), s. 12.

The plaintiff's solicitor, who carried on business within the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court of London, wrote to the defendant demanding payment of £7 6s. 6d. for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant. Neither of the parties resided or carried on business, nor was the contract entered into, within the jurisdiction. The defendant, in a letter written to the plaintiff's solicitor—posted outside, but received within, the jurisdiction—admitted that he owed £5 6s. 6d. to the plaintiff. The plaintiff having brought an action in the Mayor's Court to recover £7 6s. 6d. for goods sold and delivered, the defendant obtained a writ of prohibition staying proceedings therein. The plaintiff then brought second action to recover £5 6s. 6d. on an account stated, and the defendant obtained a second writ of prohibition. Held, that the prohibition in the first action was not an estoppel against the bringing of the second action; that the admission of the defendant and the bringing of the second action amounted to an account stated; that the account was stated within the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court; that the plaintiff's solicitor was his agent to receive the admission and to state the account; and that, therefore, the Mayor's Court had jurisdiction to try the action.

Appeal from a decision of a divisional court (Mathew and A. L. Smith, JJ.).

In June, 1887, the plaintiff's solicitors, who carried on business within the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court in the City of London, wrote to the defendant, who resided outside the jurisdiction, demanding payment of a sum of £7 6s. 6d. alleged to be due to the plaintiff, who resided at Liverpool, from the defendant for goods sold and delivered, the contract not having been entered into, nor wholly or in part performed within the jurisdiction. The defendant replied by letter, posted outside the jurisdiction, but received by the plaintiff's solicitors within the jurisdiction, wherein the defendant admitted that he owed the plaintiff £5 6s. 6d., but denied any further indebtedness. The plaintiff commenced an action in the Mayor's Court to recover £7 6s. 6d., and a reference was ordered by the court, but the defendant obtained a writ of prohibition staying all further proceedings in the action or on the award, on the ground that the Mayor's Court had no jurisdiction. Thereupon the plaintiff commenced a second action to recover the sum of £5 6s. 6d. on an account stated. The defendant having got a writ of prohibition staying the second action, the plaintiff obtained a rule nisi for a supersedeas setting aside the writ of prohibition. The rule nisi was discharged by Mathew and A. L. Smith, JJ. who held that the admission contained in the defendant's letter was never accepted by the plaintiff, and consequently that there was no account stated between the plaintiff and the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

Section 12 of the Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 157) in effect (omitting immaterial parts) gives the Mayor's Court jurisdiction in any action "where the debt or damage claimed shall not exceed £50 . . . if the cause of action either wholly or in part arose within the City of London or the liberties thereof."

Cur. adv. vult.

March 27.—Lord ESHER, M.R. (after stating the facts above set out).—There were several points taken in this case; one was whether the fact of this claim having been made in the former action, and a prohibition having been granted, was not an estoppel against the new action. I have no doubt myself at all that a prohibition is not an estoppel, therefore that point fails. Then, it being said that this was an action on an account stated, it was urged by the defendant that there was no account stated anywhere, whether within or without the City, and the point was taken that an account stated must be an account accepted by both sides. I agree to that, but then it is true that an unqualified admission is evidence of a statement of account against the person who makes that unqualified admission. The other party must accept it as an admission or there is no account stated. How does the plaintiff accept it? He accepts it by bringing the action. The bringing the action on an account stated is an acceptance of that account by him; the unqualified admission is evidence of its being stated by the other side, and therefore you have a settlement of the account, and ever since one can recollect that has been the way in which many an account stated has been sued upon, and judgment has been recovered thereon. The next question was this: the admission was in a letter; that letter was posted outside the City, it was received within the City: where was the account stated? Is it stated at the time the letter is put in the post, or is it stated at the time when the letter is received by the person to whom it is addressed? I am of opinion that the account is stated at the time it is received by the person to whom it is addressed, because then he, if he is the principal, or if he is an agent who can accept the admission, has got to act upon it, and say whether he agrees to it. Therefore the admission here was made within the City.

Then another point arises. Whether the solicitor was the agent to state the account? I think the proper way to put the question is to ask yourself whether he was the agent to receive the admission. If a solicitor is authorized to make a claim, I am of opinion that he is by that alone made the agent to receive the answer to that application—if the answer is an admission, to receive that admission. I think, upon all the points, this was an admission received in the City, that that admission was made an account stated, that part of the cause of action arose within the City, and therefore there is jurisdiction in the Mayor's Court to try this case upon the account stated, and upon that alone. It is a thing to be noticed, as I noticed in the argument that, if two people are dealing in Liverpool, or Glasgow, if the claimant, instead of writing himself from Glasgow or Liverpool to his debtor, gets a solicitor in London to write the letter, and the person to whom that letter is written answers it to the solicitor in London, that gives the Mayor's Court in the City of London jurisdiction over matters that have happened in Glasgow or Liverpool. It seems absurd, but when you come to look at the law of it, the writing of the letter and the answer to it are in law the same as if the plaintiff and defendant had come to London and had stated an account between them, and settled the balance within the City. If they did that, no doubt the Mayor's Court would have jurisdiction.

FRY, L.J.—The learned judges of the Divisional Court, as far as I can understand, considered that, instead of there being any statement of account, the proceedings in the first action showed that the plaintiff did not accept or state to the defendant the account of £5 6s. 6d. That appears to me to have been the ground of their decision. If so, I do not think it can be maintained. It appears to me, on the contrary, that the subsequent action, and the unqualified admission of £5 6s. 6d. being due, were evidence of the account stated for that amount. That point appears to me to have been determined by the case of Chisman v. Count, 2 M. & G. 307. There one of the defendants was shown an account with the plaintiffs in their counting-house. He objected to one of the items, and made no remark upon the rest, whereupon an action was begun for the whole account, including the item objected to, and in the same declaration a count was contained of an account stated, and the plaintiff recovered on the account stated the smaller sum, although in the same action he had sued for the larger sum. With the single exception that in that case the attempt to recover the larger sum was in the same action as that in which the smaller sum was recovered, that case is precisely on all fours with this, and I think is an authority in favour of the contention of the appellant in this case.

Upon the other points to which reference has been made, I content myself with expressing my concurrence with the view of the Master of the Rolls.

LOPES, L.J.—It is clear law that is acted upon every day, and I may say many times a day, that an account stated is an admission of a sum of money being due from the defendant to the plaintiff which can be charged in an account stated as a distinct cause of action. The action lies upon an absolute acknowledgment made by the defendant to the plaintiff, or his agent authorized to receive such an admission of a debt due from him to the plaintiff, and payable at the time of action brought. I do not hesitate to say that is clear law, and I cannot understand how it can for one moment be doubted. There were two cases referred to here that I think it desirable to refer to. One was the case of Evans v. Nicholson, and the observations of Archibald, J., in that case, it appears to me, should be quoted with regard to the case now before us. Archibald, J., there says:—"The plaintiff based his case on two grounds, the first being upon a claim for goods sold and delivered. But, with reference to that claim, the circumstances showed that part certainly of the cause of action took place out of the jurisdiction, and to entitle the Mayor's Court, upon a prohibition being moved to issue to it, to proceed in the action, the whole cause must arise within the City. But he rested his case, also, upon a claim on an account stated. A letter written by the defendant in such terms as to be an absolute admission of the debt being due was posted out of the City and received in it." It will be observed those are circumstances similar to those in the present case. Then Archibald, J., proceeds: "The question is, Where is the account stated? Now, as soon as it was put in the post by the defendant there was an account stated as against him as decided by the cases of Dunlop v. Higgins and Duncan v. Topham, 8 C. B. 225. But it was a continuing statement, and I see no difference between an acceptance of a contract and a statement of account so far as the principle is concerned. It is true that in Dunlop v. Higgins it was not necessary for the court there to consider this point, but it is quite consistent with the judgment on the point decided that the acceptance was a continuing acceptance. This case of a statement is analogous, I think, to that of an acceptance, for the transaction shapes itself thus:—When a letter is written by the creditor asking the debtor: 'Do you owe me the sum mentioned in this account?' and the answer is 'Yes,' then, I think, the answer is continuous until it reaches the person to whom it is sent, and is a statement to him then and at the place where he receives it." The other case was Taylor v. Nicholls, which also seems to me to be in its circumstances very near the present case. That was a case where "the defendant ordered goods of the plaintiff's traveller in Battersea, and they were delivered to him at his place of business in Battersea where he resided. There was no statement as to the place from which the goods were sent, but, after they had been received by him, the defendant, in answer to a letter written to him by the plaintiff's solicitor in King William-street, City, demanding payment of the price, £8 8s. 6d., wrote to the solicitor (whether by post or otherwise did not appear):—'I will call at your office in the early part of next week, and hope to make some satisfactory arrangement for the payment of Mr. Taylor's claim.' Upon a rule for a prohibition to restrain the proceedings in an action brought in the Mayor's Court for goods sold and delivered at the defendant's request, and upon an account stated, held a sufficient admission of the debt to support an account stated, and to warrant the court assuming that there was a cause of action arising within the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court." The two cases appear to me clearly to show that the Divisional Court were wrong. I agree with what has been said by the other members of the court, and I have much doubt if the facts of this case were made clear to the Divisional Court.

Bankruptcy—"Final judgment"—Order for dismissal of action for want of prosecution—Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g).

An order had been obtained by the defendant for the dismissal of an action (for the recovery of land, a declaration of title, and mesne profits) for want of prosecution and for the payment of costs.

Held, that such an order is not a final judgment within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, upon which the defendant is entitled to serve the plaintiff with a bankruptcy notice.

This was an appeal by leave from an order of Cave and Grantham, JJ., reported ante, p. 304, 20 Q. B. D. 318, affirming an order of the Newcastle County Court, dismissing a bankruptcy petition.

An order had been made by North, J., in an action in the Chancery Division, for the recovery of possession of land, for a declaration of title, and for mesne profits, dismissing the action for want of prosecution, with costs. The costs were taxed at £52, and a bankruptcy notice was served upon the plaintiff, with which he did not comply. A bankruptcy petition against him was thereupon presented.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and H. Stephen, for the appellant.—There has been a "final judgment" in this case. We got execution for the costs, to which the sheriff returned nulla bonâ, so that there was no seizure and sale of goods. The question decided by the court was as to who should pay the costs, and that was the only question the court was asked to decide, and that brings the case within Ex parte Moore, 33 W. R. 438, 14 Q. B. D. 627. In Ex parte Schmitz, 32 W. R. 812, 12 Q. B. D. 509, the order was by consent, and only stayed proceedings contingently. Ex parte Whinney, 13 Q. B. D. 476, 32 W. R. Dig. 11, and Ex parte Chinery, 32 W. R. 469, 12 Q. B. D. 342, are also distinguishable. By 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 orders and decrees of the Court of Chancery are put on the same footing as judgments. Again, in an action for the possession of land the right of possession at the time of the writ is the only question to be decided, and that has been determined in this action. The defendant in an action of ejectment could not set up the plea of res judicata, even if the action had been fought out. The plaintiff can always bring a fresh action claiming possession from the date of the new writ. By the dismissal of the action for want of prosecution this particular action has reached all the finality of which it is capable.

S. Woolf, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I think there are only two cases to be considered, Ex parte Chinery and Ex parte Moore, as the other cases on this point have been decided on their authority. The principle in Ex parte Chinery was stated by Cotton, L.J., to be that the word "judgment" in the statute is to be construed strictly, and to be understood to mean that which was known before in law as a judgment as distinguished from "order." Further, that judgment must be a final judgment.

Therefore, if the court comes to the conclusion that it is an order which is in dispute, and not a judgment, then no bankruptcy petition can be upheld. As to the words "final judgment," Cotton, L.J., said that they mean "a judgment obtained in an action by which a previously existing liability of the defendant to the plaintiff is ascertained or established." It has been suggested that that definition is not exact, and Lord Selborne, C., in Ex parte Moore, said: "To constitute an order a final judgment nothing more is necessary than that there should be a proper litis contestatio and a final adjudication between the parties to it on the merits." I think, perhaps, the words "on the merits" might have been omitted from this definition. Then as to the words "for existing liability," Lord Selborne added that "Those expressions must be taken in connection with the particular facts of the cases in relation to which they were used." I do not think that Lord Selborne wanted to contradict in the latter part of his judgment what he had previously laid down. I think that he was not pleased with the words "for existing liability," and that he wished to substitute "litis contestatio"—that is to say, a previously existing assertion of liability, by which the question as to whether a pre-existing right of the plaintiff against the defendant existed was ascertained. Either there would be, or there could not be, such a right, and in either case the question would be ascertained and determined. Cotton, L.J., finding that his former definition had been criticized, said that a final judgment is "a judgment in an action between parties brought to establish some right of the plaintiff against the defendant," and proceeded to add that a tort was included in that definition, for "if a defendant has committed a tort there is a previously existing liability on his part to the plaintiff to pay damages," and, further, "the order for the payment of costs did not enforce a pre-existing liability of the defendant, but that order is part of a final judgment which did." I do not pretend to say that the definition I am about to give is strictly accurate, but, in my opinion, a final judgment means a judgment obtained in an action by which the question as to whether there was a pre-existing right of the plaintiff against the defendant is finally determined in favour either of the plaintiff or defendant. I think that definition will govern most cases.

Is this, then, such a judgment? There was a claim of right which the plaintiff alleged existed before action. Was that finally determined? Certainly not on the merits, for no tribunal had heard the facts; but I do not think Lord Selborne meant that when he introduced the words, "on the merits." If a question between two parties cannot be raised again, then only can it be said to be finally determined. But the question can be raised again between the same two parties. I think that this judgment is only a judgment of nonsuit—that is to say, that the action has not been finally determined. It is said that this is an action for ejectment, and that that fact establishes a distinction, because the same question can never be raised again between the parties, because an action of ejectment only tries the question whether the plaintiff is entitled to possession at the date of the writ. It is said that is now determined, because in a new action the question to be tried would be as to the rights of the parties on the day of the new writ. I do not think that is so. Actions for ejectment have never been so treated during the last 300 years. When an action for ejectment has been brought and tried out, there is no law permitting a similar question to be argued out again. A judgment in such an action is final, and there is no difference between that form of action and any other. The appeal must fail.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. An action was brought against the appellant to get possession of certain lands, for a declaration of title, and the recovery of mesne profits. That action was dismissed for want of prosecution. That order is in terms and substance an "order," and cannot be held to be a "judgment." Even supposing it to be a judgment, is it final? I shall not attempt to define what a final judgment is, but, according to the definitions of the Master of the Rolls, of Lord Selborne, and of Cotton, L.J., nothing can be a final judgment which does not give a final and conclusive determination between the parties of the matters in controversy. Is that the case here? It is said that there has been here as final a determination as is possible, because there is an action for ejectment, which can only determine the rights of the parties at the time of the writ. But this is more than an action of ejectment, for it seeks further relief. If a declaration of title had been made, it would have been a final and conclusive determination of the rights of the parties down to, and including, the time of the trial, and that declaration might have been pleaded as res judicata to a fresh action by the plaintiff.

LOPES, L.J.—I do not say whether this is a judgment or not, but certainly it is not final. I think that the following is a fair definition—though it may not be an exhaustive one—of the term, "final judgment." A final judgment, in my opinion, is a final adjudication of the matters in contest in an action between the parties to the action. Such an order as this for the dismissal of an action for want of prosecution does not prevent the plaintiff from bringing a fresh action, and that fact seems to me to be conclusive.

Appeal dismissed.

FINLAY v. CHIRNEY. (a.)

Contract—Breach of promise of marriage—Death of promisor—Action against executors—Special damage—Actio personalis moritur cum personâ.

An action for breach of promise of marriage, where no special damage is alleged, does not survive against the personal representatives of the deceased promisor.

Special damage must consist in some loss to the property of the promisee flowing directly from the breach, or within the contemplation of both parties at the date of the promise as the probable result of the breach, according to the rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale, 2 W. R. 302, 9 Ex. 341; and such special damage alone can be recovered.

Chamberlain v. Williamson, 2 M. & S. 408, approved and followed.

This was an action brought against the executors of G. B. Chirney in respect of an alleged breach of promise of marriage committed by him in his lifetime. There was also an allegation that the plaintiff was seduced by him under cover of the promise to marry. At the trial Cave, J., nonsuited the plaintiff, on the ground that there was no corroboration of the plaintiff's evidence with respect to the promise as required by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68, s. 2. Upon an application to the Divisional Court for a new trial, the defendants, in addition, raised the objection that the action would not lie. Field and Wills, JJ., held that there was evidence of corroboration, and, without expressing an opinion whether the action would lie in its present form, held, upon the authority of Chamberlain v. Williamson, 2 M. & S. 408, that it would lie where special damage was alleged and proved, and ordered a new trial, giving the plaintiff leave to amend by alleging special damage.

The defendants appealed.

Waddy, Q.C., and H. F. Boyd (Ernest Pollock with them), for the defendants.—This action will not lie against executors. In Chamberlain v. Williamson an action was brought by the administrator for breach of promise of marriage, and it was held that the action would not lie where no special damage was alleged. The principle of that decision is that executors and administrators represent the estate of the deceased, and not his wrongs or his contracts of a purely personal nature. A breach of promise of marriage imports only a personal injury, for which executors cannot be made liable. Actions of a merely personal nature, whether ex contractu or ex delicto, are not maintainable by or against executors: Phillips v. Homfray, 32 W. R. 6, 24 Ch. D. 439. It is submitted that this action will not lie even where special damage is alleged; at any rate, it will not lie without proof of special damage, and none can be alleged or proved in this case. Special damage must be something different from the damages ordinarily recoverable in actions for breach of promise of marriage. There must be some loss to the personal estate of the promisee: per Lord Ellenborough in Chamberlain v. Williamson. The American cases are to the same effect: Stebbins v. Palmer, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 71; Lattimore v. Simmons, 13 Serjeant and Rawle (Penn.) 183; Smith v. Sherman, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 408; Hovey v. Page, 56 Maine, 142.

Digby Seymour, Q.C., and J. Lawson Walton, for the plaintiff.—The maxim Actio personalis moritur cum personâ applies to actions of tort and to actions of a purely personal nature: Bacon's Abridgment, 7th ed., vol. 3, pp. 537, 539. An action for breach of promise of marriage, is not a purely personal action. Damages are given for loss of a valuable marriage. Wherever damage is suffered from breach of contract an action will lie against the deceased promisor's executors. In Chamberlain v. Williamson an administrator was trying to get damages when he could prove none. Besides, an action by executors is different from an action against them. If necessary, this court can overrule Chamberlain v. Williamson. Secondly, the action is maintainable where special damage is alleged, and the plaintiff has obtained leave to amend by alleging special damage.

They also referred to Hambly v. Trott, Cowp. 371; Sollers v. Lawrence, Willes, 421; Siboni v. Kirkman, 1 M. & W., at p. 423; Wheatley v. Lane, 1 Wms. Saund. 239; Pinchon's case, 9 Co. 88a; Prince v. Nicholson, 5 Taunt. 333; Barry v. Robinson, 1 New Rep. (Bos. & P.) 293; Walker v. Hull, 1 Lev. 177; Beckham v. Drake, 2 H. L. Boyd, in reply.—Lord Ellenborough, in Chamberlain v. Williamson, used the phrase "special damage" in the sense in which it was used in Kingdon v. Nottle, 1 M. & S. 355, as damage to the personal estate of the deceased in his lifetime.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 15.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—This was an action against the executors of the deceased promisor for breach of promise of marriage. The action was tried before Cave, J., and a jury, when the objection was taken by the defendants that there was no corroboration of the plaintiff's evidence as to the promise. Cave, J., took this view, and nonsuited the plaintiff. The case was taken to the Divisional Court, and there a further contention was raised—namely, that the action was not maintainable. The court held that there was evidence of corroboration, but considered that it was not necessary to decide the new point raised, because they held that the action would lie upon proof of special damage, and as it was alleged that the plaintiff could prove special damage, they granted a new trial giving the plaintiff liberty to amend. Under those circumstances the appeal came before us.

We must first consider whether the action will lie without proof of special damage. There can be no doubt that the authority of English law is overwhelming to this effect, that no such action will lie against the personal representatives of a deceased promisor or against the personal representatives of a deceased promisee. I say the authority is overwhelming because it was decided by the Court of Queen's Bench in the time of Lord Ellenborough in Chamberlain v. Williamson, that the action was not maintainable by the administrators of the deceased promisee, and no case can be found in

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

English books in support of such an action, though circumstances must have occurred over and over again to give rise to it. From authority I come to principle, and inquire whether a breach of promise of marriage is of such a nature that the injury is solely personal to the promisor and promisee. It seems to me to be clear that the injury or complaint does not relate to the property, whether real or personal, of the party complaining. The cause of complaint—that is, the cause of action, is purely personal on both sides. It is true that the action is founded upon a breach of contract, but it has been often held that that does not prevent the complaint from being personal. In an action for breach of promise of marriage, although the cause of complaint is a breach of contract, yet the injury has always been treated as personal, and the damages treated as damages arising from a personal injury to the plaintiff. In assessing the damages the personal conduct of the defendant is taken into account, and evidence is always admissible of the conduct of both parties in aggravation or mitigation of damages. Besides conduct, other personal matters, such as the age of the parties, are taken into account. All this shows that, though the form of action is a breach of contract, the action is strictly personal, affecting only the person and not property; and therefore, both on principle and on authority, such an action, whether by or against personal representatives, is not maintainable. The authorities in America which have been cited to us are to the same effect. There being, therefore, no allegation of special damage, the defendants were entitled to judgment.

Then comes the second question, whether the action will lie where special damage is alleged. In Chamberlain v. Williamson it is stated that such an action will not lie, except where special damage has occurred, and in the American cases the same statement is made. I know of no case where the action has been maintained upon proof of special damage. For some time I had grave doubts whether it was not right to say that special damage did not enlarge the case at all. Upon consideration, however, I do not wish to go that length. Assuming special damage to be alleged and proved (I can hardly conceive a case of special damage), there arises the question whether the damages are limited to the special damage, or whether they are to include general damages as well. Is the whole question of damages thrown open, or is the action confined to the recovery of the special damage? If the whole matter is thereby thrown open, the principle that a personal action does not survive to or against personal representatives would be violated, and executors would have to pay out of the estate of the deceased damages for personal injury. Therefore I have no doubt that, even if this action will lie upon proof of special damage, it can only be brought to recover the special damage, and all other damages must be eliminated. The only damages that can be recovered are in respect of injury to the property of the promisee. Such special damage may arise where, at the time of the promise to marry there was another promise affecting the property of the promisee, but forming a part of the consideration for the promise to marry. If, again, there were circumstances existing at the time of the promise to marry such that the parties must reasonably have contemplated that the breach of the promise would affect property of the promisee, an action will lie for the loss to that property within the rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Ex. 341. The conclusion I have arrived at is, that the action will not lie without special damage; if there is special damage, an action will lie to recover only that special damage, the cause of action still being the breach of promise; and such special damage may result from an express promise, part of the promise to marry, or may be such as the parties would reasonably contemplate as resulting from the breach of promise to marry. I may add that the American cases seem to me to point to the same conclusion.

That being so, the plaintiff was rightly nonsuited at the trial, as she neither alleged in the pleadings, nor proved, any special damage. The Divisional Court, however, ordered a new trial, giving her leave to amend by alleging special damage. In mercy to both sides, before putting the parties to the expense of a new trial, we thought it right to inquire what special damage could be alleged, and accordingly particulars of the special damage proposed to be proved have been furnished to us. Those particulars do not, in my opinion, disclose any special damage within the rule that I have enunciated. The first head of special damage relates to clothes which the plaintiff bought for the marriage. It can hardly be said that at the time of the promise to marry both parties may reasonably be taken to have contemplated that a woman in the position of the plaintiff would buy a trousseau. The plaintiff was manageress in a dairy belonging to the deceased promisor, who owned a farm. Even in a higher station in life the man has nothing to say to the trousseau. The girl's father, as a rule, buys it; and even if the girl were to buy it out of her own money, she would still have the clothes. Moreover, the preparation for the marriage has always been given in evidence to aggravate the ordinary damages for the breach of promise, and not as special damage. It was suggested that if the plaintiff had given up a valuable situation for the purpose of getting married, that would be special damage. If at the time of the promise to marry it had been brought to the knowledge of the man that the plaintiff would have to give up her situation to marry him, then, perhaps, it might be special damage, and come within the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale. Take one more case, a promise to marry, coupled with an invitation to seduction. The invitation to seduction is part of the negotiations, and is a matter existing at the time of the promise. The reason why it cannot be allowed to be given in evidence as special damage is that it is contrary to public policy and decency to recognize it as special damage, and is not a contractual relationship known to the law. No special damage having been alleged, and the plaintiff not being able to allege any, the order for a new trial must be discharged, and judgment must be entered for the defendants. We think, however, under the circumstances of this case, that the defendants should only have the costs of the trial, and that there should be no costs in the Divisional Court or in this court. I have thought it right to state the reasons for the conclusion at which I have arrived, and I also agree in the elaborate judgment which Bowen, L.J., will now read.

The judgment of Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., was read by

Bowen, L.J.—That there was in this case some evidence which, if the jury believed it, would be in corroboration of the plaintiff's own story, we do not doubt, for the reasons indicated during the course of the argument. But a more serious question has been raised as to the liability of an executor in respect of an alleged breach of promise of marriage by the testator whose estate he represents. The liability of an executor in respect of the acts and defaults of his testator has been in the English law a matter of slow growth. The maxim Actio personalis moritur cum personâ is one of some antiquity, but its origin is obscure and post-classical. Unless, indeed, some very restricted sense is affixed to the word personalis, it is by no means true at the present day that a personal action always dies with the person. Upon the other hand, if the meaning of the maxim is to be limited, it is difficult to reconcile its phraseology with the ordinary classifications of ancient English law. Judges and text-writers since the reign of Queen Elizabeth have been in the habit of explaining upon fit occasions that only actions ex delicto were within the operation of the principle. "The rule," says the learned editor of William's Saunders (vol. 1, p. 240), "was never extended to such personal actions as were founded upon any obligation, contract, debt, covenant, or any other duty to be performed." This remark is true, if confined to the law of recent times, but it is inexact if it be taken as applying to the older English law, under which actions based upon an obligation, as a rule, died with the person. As applied, however, to modern times, the proposition is supported by abundance of authority. "Actio personalis," says Willes, J., in Sollers v. Lawrence, "is always understood of a tort"; and similar expressions occur elsewhere in plenty. But though this gloss or limitation has been forced upon the Latin maxim in later times by the exigencies of a growing society, we are left still in the dark as to the maxim's exact meaning or source. The truth is, that in the earliest times of English law survival of causes of action was the exception; non-survival was the rule. Moreover, the clear line which we are accustomed at this day to draw between contract and tort in the classification of personal actions does not correspond with the early English law, nor with the history of old English writs and causes of action. Actions of trespass were formerly actions of a quasi-penal character, and based upon the supposition of personal wrong. It was not unnatural that such actions should die upon the death of the trespasser. "All private criminal injuries or wrongs, as well as all public crimes, are buried," says Lord Mansfield in Hambly v. Trott, 1 Cowp., at p. 375, "with the offender." But survival was also denied to other actions which did not fall within the category. In Bracton's time (fol. 101) the general law was that an obligation was got rid of by the death of either of the contracting parties. "Item tollitur morte alterius contrahentium vel utriusque, maxime si fuerit pœnalis vel simplex, si autem duplex, scilicet pœnalis et rei persecutoria, in hoc quod pœnalis est tollitur et non extenditur contra hœredes, nec datur hœredibus, quia pœna tenet suos auctores et extinguitur cum personâ." In debt the executor could not be sued where the testator could have waged his law: see Pinchon's case; a condition of things which continued even down to 1805: Barry v. Robinson. And when we consider that all actions on the case, as is said by Blackstone, J., in Mast v. Goodson, 2 W. Black. 849 (13 Geo. 3), were originally for torts, and that it was only in the time of Queen Elizabeth that the familiar action of assumpsit was, after a controversy, introduced, it becomes plain that it is within the last three centuries that the contractual liabilities of an executor have expanded to their present limits. Modern jurisprudence has, however, since the reign of Queen Elizabeth adopted a rough but convenient interpretation of the maxim which is set forth in the passage above cited from 1 William's Saunders, 240. On one side of the line of demarcation lie actions of tort. Remedies for wrongful acts, according to the present law, can only be pursued against the estate of a deceased person when property, or the proceeds or value of property belonging to another, have been appropriated by the deceased person and added to his own estate or moneys: Phillips v. Homfray, 32 W. R., at p. 9, 24 Ch. D., at p. 454. On the other side of the line lie actions founded on any contract, express or implied, "or any other duty to be performed." Early in the reign of James an action was allowed against executors for payment of a debt, if clothed in the form of an action on the case in assumpsit: Pinchon's case; and this remedial view of the law has been adopted and followed ever since.

The question we have to decide to-day relates to a class of action which, though in its form and substance contractual, differs from other forms of actions ex contractu in permitting damages to be given as for a wrong This double aspect of an action for breach of promise creates the perplexity in the present instance. On which side of the line is to fall an action which is based on the hypothesis of a broken contract, yet is attended with some of the special consequences of a personal wrong, and in which damages may be given of a vindictive and uncertain kind, not merely to repay the plaintiff for temporal loss, but to punish the defendant in an exemplary manner as well? How far is such an action within, how far without, the maxim Actio personalis moritur cum personâ? The problem is one which in the nature of things is of later date than the Year Books. Before the Reformation no action for breach of promise could be maintained, for marriage was a matter of spiritual jurisdiction. It was not till the middle of the 17th century that marriage was recognized by our law as a temporal benefit, and a breach of promise of marriage as cognizable by the temporal courts: Baker v. Smith, Styles, 295; Rolle's Abridgment, Action on case, p. 22, par. 20. See also Hebden v. Rutter, Siderfin, 180; and Harrison v. Cage et uxor, Carth. 467, a case supposed erroneously by Willes, J., in Smith v. Woodfine, 1 C. B. N. S., at p. 667, to be the earliest recorded of breach of promise of marriage. No authorities of a very early date can accordingly be expected to throw light upon the question, and it must be solved mainly upon principle. It is a striking and not an immaterial fact that no action for breach of promise of marriage against the executors of a deceased person is to be found in the books. We have, moreover, a case decided by Lord Ellenborough and the Court of Queen's Bench towards the beginning of the century which affords us some guidance in the matter. In Chamberlain v. Williamson the converse of the present case occurred in an action brought by the representatives of a deceased against a living person for breach of promise. It was held that an action of the sort in which no special damage was alleged would not lie, on the ground that, except when such special damage had been occasioned, the action was in reality an action arising out of a personal injury. "The general rule of law," says Lord Ellenborough, "is Actio personalis moritur cum personâ, under which rule are included all actions for injuries merely personal. Executors and administrators are the representatives of the temporal property—that is, the debts and goods of the deceased, but not of their wrongs, except where those wrongs operate to the temporal injury of their personal estate." This judgment has been adopted as a guiding one by the American courts in the cases of Stebbins v. Palmer, A.D. 1822; Lattimore v. Simmons, A.D. 1825; Smith v. Sherman, A.D. 1849; and Hovey v. Page, A.D. 1867. It does not, indeed, follow that the same reasoning applies in toto to actions brought against the executors of a deceased person: per Bramwell, L.J., in Twycross v. Grant, 27 W. R. 87, 4 C. P. D. 40. But the decision in Chamberlain v. Williamson shows, at all events, that the courts of this country will, even although an action for breach of promise be an action arising out of contract, apply the general principles of the maxim Actio personalis to as much of the damages as are a remedy for mere personal wrong, and will allow only so much of the remedy to survive as seems to belong to the ordinary category of actions ex contractu. In order accurately to draw the dividing line it becomes necessary to analyze the damages which are recoverable in cases of breach of promise, and their measure and character has nowhere been better explained than in 2 Sedgwick on Damages, 7th ed., 146, cited with approval by Willes, J., in Smith v. Woodfine. "This action," says the learned author, "is given as an indemnity to the injured party for the loss she has sustained, and has been always held to embrace the injury to the feelings, affections, and wounded pride, as well as the loss of marriage. From the nature of the case it has been found impossible to fix the amount of compensation by any precise rule; and, as in tort, the measure of damages is a question for the sound discretion of the jury in each particular instance, subject of course to the general restriction that a verdict influenced by prejudice, passion, or corruption will not be allowed to stand. Beyond this the power of the court is limited, as in cases of tort, almost exclusively to questions arising on the admissibility of evidence when offered by way of enhancing or mitigating damages." It is, as it seems to us, by way of enhancing damage, and not as a special head of damage flowing naturally from the breach, that evidence of the means of the defendant is usually given at the trial. If it were otherwise such head of damage would require special averment on the record. But it is treated as part of the history of the circumstances of the case, and as enabling the jury to estimate properly the conduct of the defendant. "The value of the defendant's property," says Cresswell, J., in Smith v. Woodfine, "is invariably gone into in cases of this sort." But where there is no special averment on the record of pecuniary loss arising out of the breach, the general allegation of the breach of promise imports, according to Lord Ellenborough in Chamberlain v. Williamson, only a personal injury, though the jury may consider such personal injury with reference to all the circumstances of the case. There may, of course, be an actual loss to the temporal estate of the promisee arising out of the breach of contract. If such loss is to be relied on as independent and special damage in an action against executors, it ought to be specially pleaded, and in order to see if such damage is in fact recoverable the ordinary line as to remoteness of damages will have to be drawn according to the well-known doctrine of Hadley v. Baxendale.

If the above is a correct account of the damages recoverable in an action of breach of promise, it would seem to follow that with the death of the promisor all claim to damages of an exemplary or sentimental kind ought to cease, and that such damages only ought to be left as represent compensation for a temporal and measurable loss flowing directly from the breach or within the contemplation of both parties at the date of the promise; and that in an action against executors such a temporal loss, if it is alleged, must be treated according to the ordinary rules as to remoteness as applied to the special facts of the case. In the present action there is no special averment of temporal loss, and we ought not to allow the pleadings at this late stage to be amended, and to send down the case to trial again, unless we are satisfied that there is a substantial claim under this head fit for the consideration of the jury. By special leave of the court the plaintiff has now filed an affidavit as to particulars of special damage. The only items which are entitled even to plausible consideration are two—first, the expense to which the plaintiff was put in maintaining herself as a feme sole subsequently to the breach; and, secondly, the amount expended by the plaintiff in the purchase of underclothing, &c., in preparation for her marriage. The plaintiff's expense in maintaining herself after she was forsaken clearly cannot be recovered. It cannot be a consequence naturally arising out of a breach of promise of marriage that the woman is to be entitled during the remainder of her life to charge the expenses of her living and maintenance to her faithless lover. With respect to the claim for underlinen, &c., it is sufficient to say that the materials furnished by the plaintiff's affidavit do not show that such purchase was made under circumstances which would bring the expenditure within the head of damages flowing directly from the alleged breach of contract, or within the contemplation of the parties at the time. We do not desire to intimate any opinion that expenditure in respect of a marriage trousseau, or other marriage preparation, must necessarily be too remote to be recovered against executors in an action for breach of promise of marriage; the matter must in each case depend upon the circumstances of the case; but, though invited to do so, the plaintiff has not given us the means of seeing that this particular head of damage can be sustained by evidence, or what case she has for asking for an amendment to be made in the statement of claim which would include it.

The action, therefore, must be dismissed, with costs; but as the only point taken by the defendants at the trial was one as to corroboration, and as that point was a bad one, we think that there ought to be no costs of the hearing in the Divisional Court or of this appeal.

From Q. B. Div. Feb. 13.

Leduc & Co. v. Ward. (a.)

Ship—Bill of lading—Contract of carriage—Voyage—Deviation—Liberty to call at any ports in any order.

Goods were shipped on board a general ship for carriage from Fiume to Dunkirk. The bill of lading contained the usual exception of perils of the sea, and stated that the goods were shipped "on board The A., now lying at the port of Fiume, bound for Dunkirk, with liberty to call at any ports in any order." The A. proceeded first to Glasgow, and was lost on her voyage thither through a peril of the sea.

Held, that evidence was inadmissible to vary the contract of carriage as contained in the bill of lading, and that the voyage to Glasgow was a deviation in excess of the liberty given by such contract, and that, therefore, the exception contained in the bill of lading did not apply.

Appeal from the decision of Denman, J.

The action was brought by the indorsee for value, of a bill of lading against the owners of the steamship Austria for the value of certain goods.

The goods were shipped on board The Austria, which was a general ship, at Fiume, for delivery at Dunkirk. The bill of lading contained the usual exceptions of sea perils, and stated that the goods were "shipped on board The Austria, now lying at the port of Fiume, bound for Dunkirk, with liberty to call at any ports in any order, and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property. Goods to be delivered at Dunkirk to order or assigns."

The Austria, instead of going direct to Dunkirk, went first to Glasgow, and was lost on her voyage, being wrecked on Ailsa Craig. It was admitted that the loss was due to a peril of the sea. Evidence was given at the trial with the intention of showing that the shipper by whom the bill of lading had been indorsed to the plaintiff knew at the time the vessel left Fiume that she would go first to Glasgow. Denman, J., admitted the evidence, but considered it insufficient to prove such knowledge, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., and Gainsford Bruce, Q.C. (Lawson Walton with them), for the appellants.—A bill of lading is not a contract, and therefore evidence was admissible to show that the shipper had assented to this variation of the voyage: Sewell v. Burdick, 33 W. R. 461, 10 App. Cas., at p. 105. Liberty to call at any ports gives liberty to call at any ports in the world, including Finlay, Q.C., replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff is the indorsee of a bill of lading to whom the property had passed within the terms of the Bills of Lading Act. He is therefore the owner of goods which were shipped on board this ship to be carried from Fiume to Dunkirk. He brings the action as a party to the bill of lading on the ground that the goods were put on board upon the terms of the bill of lading, and that therefore he is entitled to have the goods so put on board delivered at Dunkirk. The defendants answer that the goods have been lost by a peril of the sea excepted by the bill of lading, and that they are therefore protected. To this it is replied that the goods were not lost by any peril of the sea excepted from the contract to deliver them at Dunkirk, but that they were lost at a time when a breach of such contract had been committed, and in a place where the shipowner could not rely on the exceptions in the contract, and that, therefore, although the loss was actually occasioned by perils of the sea, the shipowner is liable. The case was tried before Denman, J., who has given judgment for the plaintiff.

Now the questions are as to the meaning of the contract, and whether the contract is contained in the bill of lading.

It has been suggested that the bill of lading is nothing but a receipt for the goods, and contains no contract, or evidence of a contract, except that the goods have been received, and are to be delivered at the place named. A bill of lading is a mercantile document, which is generally drawn in a form known for hundreds of years in the mercantile world, and which has received, both there and in the courts, one and the same construction. A bill of lading signed under a charter-party and given to the charterer is, as between the charterer and the shipowner, only a receipt for the goods, because all other terms are determined by the charter-party. Such a bill of lading is, therefore, not a contract of carriage, but it is given to enable the charterer to deal with the goods by indorsing it over to a third party. But when a bill of lading is thus given and is indorsed over, inasmuch as the shipowner by giving it enables the shipper to pass it on as the contract of the shipowner, it is, as between shipper and shipowner, more than a receipt.

But where there is no charter-party the bill of lading is no doubt primarily a receipt for the goods, and, as such, is not conclusive as a receipt. It is a mere statement which can be contradicted by evidence. There is good reason for this, because the question whether it is something more than a receipt depends on whether the captain has received the goods on board, for he can make no contract of carriage in respect of goods which he has not received on board. Therefore, if the goods have not been received on board, the bill of lading cannot contain the terms of a contract of carriage with respect to them as against the shipowner. But if the goods have been received on board, the bill of lading is evidence in writing of what the contract of carriage is. The contract is usually made, no doubt, before the goods are sent on board; but when they are sent on board the captain can reduce into writing the terms of the contract, and he does this by giving and signing the bill of lading. The bill of lading, therefore, is a contract between the shipper and shipowner reduced into writing. By the general rule of law, where a contract has been reduced into writing, that writing is the only evidence, and the contract cannot be varied, except by showing the existence of a custom so well established and generally known that it must be taken to be incorporated into the written contract. Nothing else can be incorporated in the contract, because no evidence outside the written contract is admissible.

To say that this question has never been raised before is startling. In Fraser v. Telegraph Construction Co. Blackburn, J., said that the bill of lading contained the terms of the contract. In The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Co. I said: "The contract here has been, by the consent of the parties, reduced into the form of a bill of lading, and therefore the whole of the contract is contained in that bill of lading, and no terms of the contract outside of the bill of lading can be looked at." And in Glyn, Mills, & Co. v. East and West India Dock Co. Lord Selborne said: "The primary office and purpose of a bill of lading . . . is to express the terms of the contract between the shipper and the shipowner."

Therefore, to treat the bill of lading as being merely a receipt for the goods, and nothing else, seems to me untenable. The terms of the Bills of Lading Act also show that the Legislature takes the view that it is a contract.

The bill of lading being in this case the contract of carriage, is it part of that contract that the ship should go on the voyage mentioned in the bill of lading, and was the voyage actually taken a breach of the contract? The bill of lading is in ordinary terms—terms which have received common construction. It has been said that it is no part of the contract to carry the goods directly on the voyage named. Only consider what would be the result of such a construction. The goods might be transported anywhere, and it would be impossible for the buyer of the bill of lading to know when they were likely to arrive at the port of destination. So, in the case of insurance, it would be impossible to foretell where the goods might be taken or to what perils they might be subject. To suppose that the voyage forms no part of the contract would be to disregard the whole course of mercantile business.

It is a most important point of the contract of carriage by sea to determine the voyage on which the ship is to proceed. The contract is to carry the goods from the port of shipment to the port of destination along the agreed voyage. The bill of lading is almost always in one form, and declares that the goods are shipped on board the ship at the port of shipment, and are bound for such and such a destination. If the ship has to go to any other places they are named. What, then, is the construction of such a description of a voyage? The ordinary business description which has been used for hundreds of years has always been interpreted in this way, and has been recognized by all courts and in business, and it is that construction that the courts always adopt—namely, the ordinary track by ships on such a voyage. In this case, therefore, if the bill of lading contained no further provision, the voyage would be from Fiume to Dunkirk along the ordinary track of the sea of such a voyage, and to deviate from that track unless forced to do so would be a breach of the contract. Of course, the word track must be taken in a common sense way. The track may differ under different circumstances, and it does not mean an absolutely direct line.

But here some further liberty was given, and a vessel was allowed by the bill of lading to call at ports. Can it be seriously contended that that gave the ship liberty to call at any ports in the world. I think not. The words have invariably been given one meaning, and have been held only to include ports that will be passed substantially on the main voyage. The liberty given enables the shipowner to go somewhat out of the ordinary track to call for the purposes of business at any of the ports which he passes. To call is a well-known sea term, and he is allowed to call at such ports as would be ports of call on the voyage named in the bill of lading. Where there is nothing more it is an invariable rule that he may only call at these ports in their geographical order. Here, however, further liberty is given, and he may call "in any order." The shipowner, therefore, had, upon the contract in this bill of lading, to go from Fiume to Dunkirk along the ordinary track of such a voyage, but he might call at any ports along that track in any order; but to go beyond that would be a breach of contract; and when, therefore, this ship passed from that track, a deviation was committed, and she was no longer on the voyage to which the exceptions contained in that contract applied, and therefore the shipowner was no longer protected by those exceptions.

These are plain principles, business principles, and well-recognized principles. I, for one, will not depart from them. It is said that there is an American case (Lourie v. Russell) which has decided that where a voyage is expressed in such a bill of lading in terms which can only be construed one way, that nevertheless evidence is admissible to show that the shipper knew that the ship was going to deviate from that voyage. If that was really said at all, which I am inclined to doubt, I think it was immaterial, as there was in that case a general custom proved; but it seems more probable that the case is misreported. Two other American cases (The Delaware and May v. Babcock) seem to state the right business principle, and therefore the American authority is more in favour of my view than against it.

I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

Fry, L.J.—A greater part of the argument before us has been concluded by the Bills of Lading Act, 1855. That Act provides that every indorsee of a bill of lading to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned shall pass shall have all rights and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself. In this case the goods in question vested in the plaintiff by virtue of the indorsement of the bill of lading. The statute is a legislative declaration that there is a contract in the bill of lading, and that, in such a case as this, the benefit of that contract passes to the indorsee. I entirely agree with the Master of the Rolls as to the construction of that contract, and I do not doubt that all the rights of deviation which the shipowner had are contained in it. Does the right of deviation given by it allow her to pass Dunkirk and to go to Fiume? Clearly that is not a deviation contemplated by the contract.

As to the American authority which has been cited in addition to this view, I think that the statement there is mere obiter dictum. No effect can be given, in my opinion, to the knowledge of the shipper in respect of a contract which is assignable to a third person. The contract is express as to the extent and power of deviation, and repels the suggestion that there was any wider liberty than is expressly given. Nor do I think that the evidence, even if it had been rightly admitted, amounts to any variation of such liberty. I prefer, however, to rest my judgment on the fact that the contract is one assignable to a third person, who cannot have notice of any parol variation of its terms.

Lopes, L.J.—I entirely agree, and I do not think I can usefully add anything. The bill of lading is clear and express, and no parol evidence ought to be admitted to vary it. The deviation was entirely unjustified, and therefore the plaintiff is entitled to succeed.

Divorce—Alimony—Verdict of jury finding wife guilty—Right to alimony pending appeal.

When there has been a verdict of a jury finding a wife guilty of adultery, the wife's right to alimony prima facie then ceases, subject, however, to a discretion in the judge to order it to be continued pending a new trial if he consider it reasonable to do so.

Wells v. Wells and Hudson, 3 Sw. & T. 542, 12 W. R. Div. Dig. 16, explained.

Appeal from Butt, J.

This was an appeal from an order of Butt, J., in chambers, refusing an application by the wife that a fi. fa. might be issued to enforce the payment of alimony pendente lite. On the 3rd of February, 1888, a decree nisi had been pronounced on the petition of the husband, on the ground of the wife's adultery; the jury having found a verdict in favour of the husband on all issues in cross actions by the husband against the wife, and the wife against the husband. An order for the payment of alimony had been made when the proceedings were first instituted, and the husband had tendered payment of the same up to the 3rd of February, but refused to make any payment after that day, though making no application to have the order for the payment of alimony set aside. The wife gave notice of motion for a new trial, and afterwards applied to the registrar, and then to Butt, J., in chambers for leave to issue a fi. fa. to enforce the payment of alimony subsequent to the 3rd of February, on the ground that the case of Wells v. Wells, 3 Sw. & Tr. 542, 12 W. R. Div. Dig. 16, was an authority that the wife was entitled to alimony pending the result of the motion for a new trial.

Butt, J., on the 28th of February, refused the application.

The wife appealed.

Fillan, for the appellant.—Wells v. Wells and Hudson is an authority expressly laying down the rule of practice that alimony pendente lite only ceases when, in a case tried before a jury, the time has elapsed for moving for a new trial, and, if a new trial is refused by the court, when the further time for appealing from such refusal has elapsed. Until such time has elapsed the decree is not final and the suit is not at an end: Ellis v. Ellis, 31 W. R. 942, 8 P. D. 188; and a wife is entitled to alimony while she still remains a wife, which she does until the decree for dissolution of the marriage becomes final: Stanhope v. Stanhope, 34 W. R. 446, 11 P. D. 103. An order for alimony was made when this action was instituted, and that order is still in force, the husband not having made any application to have it set aside: Jones v. Jones, 20 W. R. 449, L. R. 2 P. & D. 333. The order for alimony is made under section 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), and rule 203 of the Rules in Divorce and Matrimonial Causes shows that a writ of fi. fa. shall be issued as of course on default in payment of any sum of money ordered to be paid. [Lindley, L.J.—Rule 110 seems to qualify that. Cotton, L.J.—An appeal, no doubt, does not operate as a stay of execution, but is it not a matter of discretion in the judge to stay payment of alimony pending an appeal?] Butt, J., did not base his refusal on the ground of exercise of discretion.

Inderwick, Q.C., and Middleton, for the respondent, were not called on.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Butt, J., and as he gave no reasons for his decision it is left to us to decide the question without having the advantage of knowing his reasons. The question is, does the case of Wells v. Wells lay down a rule adopted in the Divorce Court, that where there has been a verdict of a jury finding a wife guilty of adultery, notwithstanding that verdict, alimony is to be continued to be paid until the time for appealing had expired? No doubt in that case the judge allowed the alimony to be continued, but is it a matter of right where the guilt of the wife has been established, though subject to appeal to this court or to the House of Lords, that alimony should continue to be paid after the verdict of the jury, unless some application is made by the husband to have it stopped? What is the reason for requiring payment of alimony? It is this, that until it has been proved that a wife has broken her marriage vow she is entitled to support from her husband. But when once it is established that she has been guilty of adultery, the whole foundation of the right to alimony is gone. She is, no doubt, still a wife, but she loses the right to alimony. The husband here has offered to pay alimony up to the time when the verdict of the jury was given, but has declined to pay after that date, and the judge has refused to order him to do so. I think that is right. The proper rule is that primâ facie where there is a verdict of guilty by a jury, the wife's right to alimony ceases, subject, however, to a discretion in the judge to order it to continue pending a new trial, if he consider it reasonable to do so. A different rule would have this effect—viz., that, merely by continuing litigation without any reasonable hope of success, alimony would be kept up pending an appeal, perhaps, to the House of Lords. Ellis v. Ellis is an entirely different case from the present, that was a suit by a wife who had not in any way forfeited her right to support by her husband, and therefore it was held that alimony ought to be continued to be paid after the decree nisi and until the decree was made absolute.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems startling and anomalous that alimony should as a matter of right continue after a verdict finding the wife guilty of adultery. We have been informed that Wells v. Wells has not as a matter of practice been acted on. In my opinion it lies on the wife to show why alimony should be continued, but it would be monstrous to say that she is always as of right entitled to it until the House of Lords had decided as to her guilt. In my opinion she is only entitled to alimony until the court is judicially informed that she has been guilty of adultery.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I have seen the President of the Divorce Division, and he considers that in our statement of the rule we are in no way deviating from what the practice in that court has been, Wells v. Wells notwithstanding. Under the circumstances we do not give costs against the wife.

"The Cella." (a.)

Ship—Repairs—Action in rem—Arrest of ship—Lien—Security—Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), ss. 4, 35.

In an action in rem under the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, the ship from the date of arrest is a security in the hands of the court for the plaintiffs' claim as subsequently determined by the judgment, and this security is not affected by the bankruptcy or liquidation of the ship-owners between the date of the arrest and the judgment.

Appeal from the judgment of Hannen, P.

In January, 1885, the steamship Cella, owned by the Cella Steamship Co., put into Halifax, Nova Scotia, for repairs, and the plaintiff effected the repairs necessary to enable her to complete her voyage to the United Kingdom, which she did. The master drew a bill at ninety days upon the Cella Steamship Co. for £963, the cost of the repairs. The bill was accepted, but was dishonoured at maturity. The plaintiff brought an action against the steamship company in the Queen's Bench Division, and on the 13th of August, 1885, recovered judgment, but this judgment remained unsatisfied.

On the 28th of May, 1885, the master commenced an action in rem in the Admiralty Division for his wages and disbursements, and on the same day The Cella was arrested. On the 15th of June, Wood the mortgagee of the ship, intervened in that action, and paid the master £120 in full discharge of his claim, and a release of The Cella in that action issued On the 8th of June, 1885, the plaintiff, while The Cella was under arrest, commenced this action in rem, under section 4 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861. The company did not appear to this action. On the 15th of June Wood intervened in this action, and a few days later the following order was made:—"Upon agreement of counsel and James Marke Wood, the intervener, by counsel, undertaking to pay to plaintiff whatever plaintiff could, if arrest continued, recover from the ship after satisfying prior incumbrances, it is ordered that the ship Cella be released forthwith." Wood took possession of the ship, and sold her for £4,500.

On the 8th of August, 1885, the Cella Co was ordered to be wound up, and in October a liquidator was appointed.

Under an order of the court Wood furnished accounts, and the registrar found that, after allowing for the expenses of the sale, and after satisfying all prior incumbrances, including his own mortgage, there remained a balance of £937 in his hands, and this sum was ordered to be paid into court to abide further order pending an inquiry into the amount of the plaintiff's claim. The registrar reported that the plaintiff's claim amounted to £819 8s. 10d., and upon application by the plaintiff that this sum be paid out to him, the liquidator of the Cella Co. intervened and claimed the whole sum in court.

The President (Sir James Hannen) held that the plaintiff was entitled to be paid his claim out of the money in court. He held that the plaintiff had a lien on the ship from the commencement of the action in rem and the proceedings taken against the ship, and that the rights of the plaintiff under Wood's undertaking must be determined by the rights which the plaintiff had against the ship at the time she was released. He therefore ordered that the amount of the plaintiff's claim be paid out to him.

The liquidator appealed.

ity by reason of the arrest of the ship. He has no security until judgment. The rights of the parties are not affected by the commencement of the action, and as the Celia Steamship Co. went into liquidation before the judgment in the action, the liquidator is entitled to the proceeds in court, the plaintiff not being a secured creditor in the liquidation. Under section 87 of the Companies Act, 1862, the Admiralty Court ought not to proceed with the action. Proceedings in rem are matter of procedure only. There are some expressions in The Two Ellens, 20 W. R. 592, L. R. 4 P. C. 161, and The Pieve Superiore, 22 W. R. 777, L. R. 5 P. C. 482, which are against this contention, but they are only dicta.

He also referred to The William F. Safford, Lush. 69, 3 W. R. Adm. Dig. 22; The Heinrich Bjorn, 33 W. R. 719, 10 P. D. 44; s.c., 11 App. Cas. 270; 34 W. R. Dig. 179.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiff.—In an action in rem in the Admiralty Court the writ and the warrant of arrest are served by being nailed on the ship's mast, the Admiralty marshal serving the warrant, and from that moment the ship is taken possession of by the court, and held as security for the plaintiff's claim. It is analogous to the case of money paid into court to abide the result of the action where the money in court is security for the plaintiff: Ex parte Banner, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 379, 22 W. R. Dig. 20; Ex parte Bouchard, 28 W. R. 129, 12 Ch. D. 26. The court holds the ship as security from the date of the arrest, and subsequent bankruptcy or liquidation cannot affect that security. [He was then stopped.]

Skinner replied.*

Lord Esher, M.R.—This case seems to me to be decided by authority, and depends upon the true construction and effect of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861.

The order of events was as follows:—Repairs were done to the ship by the plaintiff at Halifax, and upon the ship reaching this country she was arrested by the Admiralty Court at the suit of the master, and while under arrest the plaintiff commenced this action in rem. The steamship company then went into liquidation, and afterwards came the judgment in the Admiralty Court establishing the plaintiff's claim. The question is whether the plaintiff is not entitled as against the liquidator of the company to the proceeds of the sale of the ship after the incumbrances have been paid. It is clear that the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, gives no maritime lien in respect of the repairs. But section 4 gives the court jurisdiction over any claim for repairs to a ship when the ship or the proceeds thereof are under arrest of the court, and section 35 provides that the jurisdiction may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam. In this case the action was instituted by proceedings in rem. A maritime lien differs from a common law lien in this, that the latter depends upon possession, whereas the former may exist without possession. A maritime lien is enforced in the Admiralty Court by an action in rem. Now this lien for repairs may be enforced in the same way. In an action in rem the warrant of arrest is served by the Admiralty marshal nailing it to the ship's mast. The court of Admiralty takes possession of the ship as security for the claim of the plaintiff at whose suit the ship has been seized, and then proceeds to adjudicate upon the claim. The judgment of the court deals with the rights of the plaintiff at the time of the service of the writ in the action. That is so in every action. When an action is in personam, bankruptcy law may intervene and affect the rights of the parties. But when the money or the res is in court, the court gives effect to its judgment, as if it were pronounced the moment after the money or the res were in the possession of the court. The two cases cited by the plaintiff's counsel are strong to that effect. In Ex parte Banner James, L.J., said: "The plaintiff is ordered to pay into court the amount claimed in the action. It belongs to the party who is found eventually to be entitled to the sum in dispute." That is still more elaborated by the same learned judge in Ex parte Bouchard:—"I am of opinion that the equitable title of the petitioning creditor to the money was complete when it was paid into court to abide the event of the action. After that the only question was, what was the event of the action? The money was to be the money of the creditor if he succeeded in establishing his title to it in the action, and he did succeed in so doing. It would be idle to make such a provision if the whole thing was afterwards liable to be defeated by the relation back of the title of the trustee appointed under the petition of another creditor to the act of bankruptcy committed on the debtor's summons." Thesiger, L.J., said: "I think the payment into court was, when his debt was established, equivalent to a payment to him as of the date when the payment into court was made." The analogy of those two cases seems to me to conclude the present case.

So, again, in the cases in which the point was discussed. In The Two Ellens Mellish, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said "That that section (section 4 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861) at any rate does not give any maritime lien, but merely entitles the person who has done the repairs or built the ship to be paid out of the proceeds, in preference, at any rate, to the owner." Then, further on: "The jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty is not made by this section (section 5) to depend upon what is the state of things at the time when the supply is furnished, but is made to depend upon what is the state of things at the time when the suit is instituted." And at the end of the judgment he said: "According to the true construction of this section (section 5) the res, the ship, does not become chargeable with the debt for necessaries until the suit is actually instituted?" Again, in The Pieve Superiore the court said that "The object of the statute is only to found a jurisdiction against the owner who is liable for the damage, and to give the security of the ship, the res, from the time of the arrest. This is clearly explained by Dr. Lushington in The Alexander Larsen, 1 W. Rob. 288, 294, and The Pacific, 2 Br. & Lush. 243, and by this committee in The Two Ellens." The judgment, therefore, shows that the ship is the security from the time of the arrest. That seems to me to be the deliberate judgment of the Privy Council, and not a mere dictum. Then in The Heinrich Bjorn this court, after expressing an opinion that the two statutes of 1840 and 1861 ought to be construed in pari materiâ, said that, "Whilst the statute of 1840 has enabled the material man to enforce his claim in the Admiralty Court, and as one means has given him a right to arrest the ship, it has given him no maritime lien, and, consequently, no right against the ship till action brought." Those three successive judgments indicated the same view as that expressed in the two judgments in the Court of Chancery. Though there is no maritime lien, from the moment of arrest the ship is a security in the hands of the court for the rights of the plaintiff as subsequently determined by the judgment. The judgment is a judgment in rem good against all the world. Therefore, I am of opinion that, according to the true meaning of the statute, and having regard to the true effect of the arrest, the ship from the time of arrest is security for the claim as determined by the subsequent judgment of the court, and nothing intervening between the arrest and the judgment can affect that security. I am of opinion, for these reasons, that this appeal should be dismissed.

* It was also contended that the judgment in the Queen's Bench Division was a bar to the action in rem, but this argument was not pressed. The Bengal, Sw. 1, and Cambefort & Co. v. Chapman, 35 W. R. 838, 55 L. R. D. 229, were referred to.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same mind. Section 4 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, gives the Court of Admiralty jurisdiction over any claim for repairing any ship, if at the time of the institution of the cause the ship or the proceeds thereof are under arrest of the court; and section 35 provides that the jurisdiction may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam. We must inquire what was the nature of proceedings in rem at the date of the Act. Dr. Lushington explained it in The Volant, 1 W. Rob. 383, and at p. 387 he says that "The damage confers no lien upon the ship, but an arrest offers the greatest security for obtaining substantial justice in furnishing a security for prompt and immediate payment." He treats the arrest as creating a security for payment of the claim. The proceeding appears to me to be analogous to the payment of money into court to abide the result of a suit. The arrest operates to secure the ship, and relieves the party from the result of anything happening between arrest and judgment. That appears to me to be the meaning of Dr. Lushington's judgment, and I think it is perfectly correct. That view has not been explained away or departed from since; indeed, when the Legislature dealt with the matter in 1861, it expressed no dissent from it. The subsequent cases of The Two Ellens and The Pieve Superiore are in strict accordance with it. It is analogous to the decisions of the court in Ex parte Banner and Ex parte Bouchard as to the security afforded by the payment of money into court. Lastly, it is in entire accordance with the practice in the Admiralty Court in proceedings in rem. I have, therefore, no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the arrest of the ship provides a security for the party instituting the proceedings in rem.

In re TUCKETT'S TRUSTS. (a.)

Trustees—Will—Power to invest in Consols—No power to change or vary investments—National Debt (Conversion) Act, 1888 (51 Vict. c. 2).

Trustees of a fund were by a will directed to invest the fund in £3 per cent. Consols, but without power to vary or change the investment when made, and out of the income of the Consols to pay certain annuities, and after the deaths of the annuitants the trust funds were directed to go over. The fund was duly invested. The annuities were not charged on the corpus.

Held, that sections 26 and 8 of the National Debt (Conversion) Act, 1888, authorized trustees to exchange £3 per cent. Consols for the new stock, and that section 27 of the same Act authorized trustees to sell any stock converted or exchanged by virtue of that Act, and to invest the proceeds in any of the securities for the time being authorized for the investment of cash under the control of the High Court of Justice; and held also that the trustees of the will were justified in selling the £3 per cent. Consols representing the trust funds and investing the proceeds of such sale in any of the securities now authorized for the investment of cash under the control of the High Court.

This was a petition by the trustees of the will of a testatrix asking for the advice of the court whether the trustees could safely sell Consols subject to the trusts of the will and invest the proceeds in such investments as the court authorises for cash under its control.

By her will the testatrix directed the trustees to appropriate part of the residue of her estate in the purchase of £3 per cent. Consols, and out of the income thereof to pay certain annuities, and after the payment of the annuities, which were not charged on the corpus of the estate of the testatrix, there was a gift over of the corpus and income. The will contained no power of changing or varying the investments. The trustees had duly made the investment in Consols, and now asked leave to sell the Consols and invest the proceeds as above mentioned, on the ground that if they agreed to accept the new stock under the National Debt (Conversion) Act, 1888, each annuity would be reduced by one-twelfth during the next fourteen years, and that, if the trustees accepted the new stock in exchange and then sold the new stock and invested the proceeds in such securities as the court authorises for the investment of cash under its control, the trust estate would be put to the expense of a double instead of a single operation. No remaindermen were served.

E. Ford, for the trustees, referred to sections 13, 20, 26, and 27 of the National Debt (Conversion) Act, 1888 (51 Vict. c. 2), and to In re Wedderburn's Trusts, 37 W. R. 53, 9 Ch. D. 112.

Benjamin Eyre, for the annuitants, supported the application.

CHITTY, J., after stating the facts of the case as above set out, continued as follows:—I think there is no question but the trustees have power under the Act to exchange the Consols for the new stock, because section 8 of the Act expressly authorises trustees to make such exchange. If anything more is needed it is found in section 8. By that section any holder of any amount of Consols may, at the time mentioned in the Act, exchange that amount for an equal nominal amount of new stock, and such an exchange shall not be considered to be a change or variation of investment by the holder. Obviously the latter portion of this provision is meant to apply to holders who are trustees, as the fact of an exchange being a change or variation cannot affect the person who holds absolutely.

Now section 27 is material. It provides that where any stock converted or exchanged by virtue of this Act into new stock, is held by a trustee, such trustee shall be at liberty to sell the same and to invest the proceeds arising from such sale in any of the securities for the time being authorised for the investment of cash under the control of the High Court, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the instrument creating the trust. Trustees could, therefore, take the new stock and, by section 27, sell and invest it as I have mentioned. In the present case it would clearly be for the benefit of the annuitants that the trustees should sell the Consols and invest in such securities as cash under the control of the court is invested in, and I can advise the trustees they may safely so do.

In re Randell.
Randell v. Dixon. (a.)

Will—Charitable legacy—Condition of forfeiture—Perpetuity—General charitable gift.

A testatrix bequeathed a sum of money to trustees upon trust to invest and pay the income to the incumbent of a certain church and his successors so long as they allowed the sittings in the church to be occupied free from pew rents; but, in case any incumbent should receive payment in respect of sittings in the church, then the testatrix directed that the money and income should fall into the residue of her estate.

Held, that the condition of forfeiture of the legacy was not void on the ground of perpetuity, and that the legacy would cease if any future incumbent should receive payment for sittings in the church; also that it was not a gift for the general purpose of charity with respect to which a scheme could be made.

Elizabeth Randell by her will bequeathed a sum of £14,000 to trustees, upon trust, to invest the same, and if the Rev. John Ingrave Penfold Wyatt, the then incumbent of the district church of Holy Trinity, Hawley, should hold that position on her death, then, upon trust, that they "do and shall during his incumbency, or during such part thereof as he shall permit all the sittings in the said district church to be occupied free from all claim for pew rents, pay to him the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds arising from the sum of £14,000, and the investments thereof; and from and after the determination of the said incumbency of the said John Ingrave Penfold Wyatt, either by his death or otherwise, do and shall so long as his successors, incumbents of the said district church of the Holy Trinity at Hawley, shall permit all the sittings in the said district church to be occupied free of all claims for pew rents, pay the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds of the stocks, funds, and securities in or upon which the said sum of £14,000 may be invested, to the incumbent for the time being of the said district church; and I direct and declare that in case any such incumbent shall make any claim for and receive any such payment as aforesaid in respect of the occupation of any pews or sittings in the said district church, that from thenceforth the trust moneys and the interest, dividends, and annual income arising therefrom shall fall into and be dealt with as part of my testatrix's ordinary personal estate." "I give, devise, and bequeath all that piece of arable land called 'Red Lion Field,' situate at the rear of the Red Lion Inn, at Blackwater, in the county of Hants, and which contains about three acres, now in the occupation of the said John Ingrave Penfold Wyatt, to the said John Charles Randell and the Rev. John Frewen Moor, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, as trustees for the benefit of the said district church of the Holy Trinity at Hawley, upon the same trusts and conditions as those respecting the sum of £14,000 hereby bequeathed."

The testatrix died on the 2nd of March, 1887.

This was an originating summons taken out by the trustees of the will for the determination (among other questions) of the question whether the gift over of the £14,000 offended against the rules as to perpetuities, and was consequently void; and whether, in the event of a breach of the condition as to free sittings, the court would direct a scheme of the £14,000 as being given for general charitable purposes.

Medd, for the trustees of the will, stated the facts, and referred to the case of Christ's Hospital v. Grainger, 1 Mac. & G. 460.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the incumbent of Holy Trinity.—The condition of defeasance or forfeiture is valid as to the life interest of the present incumbent, but, as regards the rest of the gift, it is void for remoteness and cannot take effect. The gift is a good charitable gift, dedicated generally to charitable purposes, and the condition that the money should revert to the legatees is void, so that the court or the Charity Commissioners have power to make a new scheme with respect to it. The case of Christ's Hospital v. Grainger is inapplicable to the present case.

Carson, for a pecuniary legatee.

G. F. Hamilton, for the residuary legatees.

North, J.—The gift of the £14,000 is as follows:—[His lordship read the gift, as set out above, and proceeded:—] The effect of that is that the gift of the income of this £14,000 is a charitable gift, and is not in itself obnoxious to any rule against perpetuities. But it seems to me that the charitable gift is one for a definite limited particular purpose, and no other purpose. It is intended to be devoted to one thing and nothing else, it is intended to continue so long as the pews in the church are allowed to be used without payment of any pew rents of any sort, and no longer. Then the gift over is (whatever its construction may be) important as showing that the testatrix intended the gift to be for a limited special purpose and no other, because it says, in case the definite purpose hereinbefore specified can no longer be carried into effect, then the property is to fall into the residue of my personal estate. Under these circumstances it seems to me that there is a charity created for a definite limited time and no longer, and there is no general purpose of charity with respect to which a scheme could be made altering entirely the destination of the income of these investments.

It seems to me startling to say that the Charity Commissioners might, if they pleased, make a new scheme for the application of this income in any way they thought fit, possibly for the benefit of the incumbent, and possibly not, and that when they have done that, although the very purpose for which the scheme is created, and for which the money is given can no longer be carried into effect, yet the money is to be applied for a totally different purpose. I know no case at all exactly like it, but the case that most resembles it, I think, is Walsh v. Secretary of State for India, 11 W. R. 823, 10 H. L. Cas. 367, which came before the House of Lords not very long since, in which Lord Clive had devoted a sum of nearly £200,000 to provide pensions for officers and others being Europeans in the military or naval service of the East India Co., with a proviso which took the form of a covenant in that case, that, if at any time after 1784, the East India Co. should cease to employ a military force, and to use vessels for the purpose of trading, the money paid to them should be paid back to Lord Clive and his family, their executors, administrators, or assigns. Somewhere about the year 1834, I think, they ceased to be a trading company employing ships. They continued to employ a military force until after the Indian Mutiny, when we know that the whole power of the East India Co. to employ military troops was put an end to, and the Secretary of State succeeded to and performed the duty which previously the East India Co. had performed. When that took place in 1858, after the Indian Mutiny, the then legal personal representatives of Lord Clive filed a bill for the purpose of having it declared that the purposes for which that fund, which was obviously a charity in itself, was created had come to an end, and that the fund might be paid back to his family. When the case came before the Master of the Rolls, in the first instance, he held that there was a clear trust for this purpose, which beyond all question was a charitable purpose, but as soon as the time arrived at which it came to an end the trust would have ceased, and the money would have been payable to Lord Clive, but for the fact that, as he held, the Acts of Parliament transferring the powers, the property, and so on of the East India Co. to the Secretary of State for India had transferred this fund, this trust fund he called it, with its liabilities, and had cast upon the Secretary of State the same duties with respect to it which the East India Co. had previously performed." Upon that ground, and upon that ground only, he thought that the trust had not come to an end, and that, therefore, the action failed. That case was carried to the House of Lords, and the House of Lords took a different view. They said there was no trust fund appropriated. The money was given to the East India Co., there was no trust fund set apart, it was mixed with their general funds, and they were not answerable for the trust fund in their hands. The Acts, therefore, transferring the property did not apply, but the liability was at an end; and at the end of upwards of eighty years after the time when the original charitable institution was founded, it was held that the obligation to repay the money, not to transfer the trust funds, because the House did not consider it to be a trust fund, remained, and the money was handed back to the person who at that time had taken out representation to Lord Clive for the purpose of bringing that action. A part of the fund was not subject to that covenant, but the original gift of five lacs of rupees was subject to it, and the money was paid over.

That seems to be a case very like the present. There was, beyond all question, a trust for charity for a limited period; but it was held that when the trust came to an end it fell into the estate of Lord Clive. In the present case it seems to me that there is a definite particular special charitable bequest, which must have effect given to it so long as it lasts, and no more, and that, when it comes to an end, there is no general devotion of it to charitable purposes at all, the intention of the testatrix being distinctly opposite. On the construction of the will the charity is a charity for a particular limited purpose, and nothing beyond that is declared. As soon as that particular purpose comes to an end the fund which was subjected to that particular trust falls into the residue of the estate; and it would do so just as much if there was no such limitation as this in the will as it does when the limitation is found here. The limitation is that in that case "the trust moneys, and the interest, dividends, and annual income arising therefrom, shall fall into and be dealt with as part of my residuary personal estate." If the testatrix had said that it would fall into and form part of her residuary personal estate, she would simply have been stating what the law is; but saying that it shall do so, is simply saying what the law would do without such a statement. In my opinion a direction that, in a particular event, a fund shall go in a way in which the law would make it go in the absence of such a direction, cannot be said to be an invalid gift, or contrary to the policy of the law. In my opinion this direction means that the fund is to go as the law, independently of direction, would give it, and that therefore the gift is not obnoxious to any rules of law.

That being so, it belongs (subject, of course, to the trust created) to the residuary legatees, and they take it just as they would take it if there were no gift, or if the gift failed for perpetuity. It goes to them as part of the estate of the testatrix.

I prefer to answer the question in this summons in this way, that the direction in the will, in the events therein mentioned—"that the trust moneys arising from the investment of the £14,000, and the interest, dividends, and annual produce thereof, shall fall into and be dealt with as part of my residuary personal estate"—is not void on the ground of perpetuity.

In re BETTESWORTH AND RICHER'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 150, 257—New street—Expenses of sewering, &c.—Frontage owner—Liability.

The frontage owner who is liable under sections 150 and 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875, for the expense of work done under section 150 by the local authority in a new street is the frontage owner at the time the work is completed.

Adjourned summons.

In September, 1886, Bettesworth contracted to sell to Richer for £100 two leasehold houses situate in the district of the Willesden Local Board, and which partly abutted on a private road, subject to certain mortgages, the purchase to be completed in December, 1886.

Previously to the contract, the Willesden Local Board had, in November, 1885, in pursuance of the 150th section of the Public Health Act, 1875, given notice to the owners of the property abutting on the private road to sewer, level, pave, and do other work to the road. The owners, however, made default in complying with the notice, and the board thereupon executed the work themselves, which was actually completed on the [illegible] of June, 1886.

In October, 1886, notice of apportionment of the expenses incurred by the board in the execution of the work was served on the frontage owners; and the amount of the expenses apportioned by the surveyor of the board as payable in respect of the two leasehold houses contracted to be sold was £41 14s. 6d.

In January, 1887, notice of demand for payment of the £41 14s. 6d. was served by the board in pursuance of the 257th section of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The title to the property had been accepted without reference to the expenses incurred by the board, and the draft conveyance approved by the purchaser, but he required the vendor to pay the £41 14s. 6d. before the completion of the purchase.

This was a summons by the vendor under the Vendors and Purchasers Act, 1874, to determine, as between vendor and purchaser, by whom the £41 14s. 6d. ought to be paid.

Swinfen Eady, for the summons.—The purchaser ought to pay the local board expenses as outgoings at the time for the completion of purchase. The payment of the money did not become enforceable until January, 1887, and it did not constitute a charge upon the property until that date. The owner of the property at the time when the charge became enforceable was liable.

He referred to the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 150, 257; Grece v. Hunt, 25 W. R. 543, 2 Q. B. D. [illegible]; The Queen v. Swindon Local Board, 27 W. R. 73[illegible], Q. B. D. 305.

Grosvenor Woods, for the purchaser.—The money was a charge upon the property before December, 1886, the time for completion of the purchase, which ought to be paid by the vendor. The work was completed in June, 1886, and under sections 150 and 257 of the Act [illegible] person liable to the board was the owner of the property at that time.

He referred to Tottenham Local Board of Health v. Rowell, 29 W. R. 36, 15 Ch. D. 378; Corporation of Birmingham v. Baker, 17 Ch. D. 782, 30 W. R. Dig. 121.

North, J. (after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:—).—The vendor contends that the expenses in question are outgoings arising after the time for completion of the purchase, which ought to be paid by the purchaser. The purchaser says that these expenses were a charge upon the property at the date of the contract which the vendor ought to satisfy. In my opinion the expenses became a charge upon the property, at any rate, on the 26th of June, 1886. The 150th section of the Public Health Act, 1875, provides that when work under that section is required, the urban authority may, by notice addressed to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises abutting on the street, require them to do the work, and if the notice is not complied with the urban authority may execute the work mentioned in the notice, "and may recover in a summary manner the expenses incurred by them in so doing from the owners in default according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as may be settled by the surveyor of the urban authority, or (in case of dispute) by arbitration in manner provided by this Act." The meaning of the words "owners in default" was the question in dispute in the case of The Queen v. Swindon Local Board, where it was decided that they refer to the owners at the time when the work is completed. The 257th section provides that the expenses incurred may be recovered, together with interest at a rate not exceeding five pounds per centum per annum from the date of service of a demand for the same till payment thereof, from any person who is owner of such premises when the works are completed for which such expenses have been incurred, and until recovery the same shall be a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred.

It appears from the case of Tottenham Local Board of Health v. Rowell, which was decided on the 62nd section of the Local Government Act of 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), which is not distinguishable from the 257th section of the Public Health Act, 1875, that the expenses are a charge upon the premises from the time of the completion of the work. The payment of the expenses cannot be compelled and the charge cannot be enforced until three months after the expenses have been apportioned, but the person who, under the 257th section, is the owner of the premises at the time the work is completed is the person bound to pay the expenses. There is no conflict between the opinion of Cockburn, C.J., in the case of The Queen v. Swindon Local Board and the opinion I have expressed. There Cockburn, C.J., says: "I cannot think it was ever intended by the Legislature that when the owner has parted with his property, and somebody else is in possession of it, and therefore getting the benefit of the work done, and who ought, therefore, to pay the expenses incurred, it should be competent for the local authority to follow him up wherever he may have gone and hold him personally liable. I think that defect is remedied by the 257th section, which treats owners upon whom notice was originally served, and who are the owners at the time the work is completed and the expenses demanded, as the persons upon whom the local board shall be able to come for the expenses. I cannot suppose it was intended that both should be liable—the owner who made default originally in not doing the work, and the owner who is the person who has become the owner at the time the work is completed. What was meant was this: if the owner who is called upon to do the work and who makes default in doing it continues the owner at the time the work is executed, and when the money laid out upon it is demanded, then he is liable under the 150th section; but if in the meantime he has ceased to be owner, he cannot be said to be the owner in default at the time the money is demanded and when another has stepped into his shoes and become the owner." That is describing a person who is owner at both periods—when the work is completed and when payment is demanded. The present case, where one person is owner of the premises when the work is completed and another is owner of the premises when payment is demanded, was not before the court. The words of section 257 are, "from any person who is owner of such premises when the works are completed for which such expenses have been incurred, and until recovery of such expenses and interest the same shall be a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred." It does not say owner at the date of demand. I am not bound by the opinion expressed in the case of The Queen v. Swindon Local Board. I think that this was a charge upon the premises from the 26th of June, 1886, and was an incumbrance which ought to be discharged by the vendor.

Summons dismissed, with costs.

In re Vickers.

Vickers v. Vickers. (a.)

Ademption—Bequest of property, including business, equally between sons and daughters—Subsequent transfer of business to sons.

A testator by his will bequeathed the residue of his estate equally between his two sons and three daughters, and directed his business premises, goodwill, stock-in-trade, and effects to be sold and to fall into the residue. Afterwards he determined to retire from his business in favour of his two sons, and by deed assigned his business to the elder son, with a provision enabling the younger to become partner on attaining full age, and reserving to himself an annuity payable out of the profits of the business.

Held, that the shares of the two sons in the residue were adeemed to extent of the value, at the date of the assignment, of the gift to them of the business, and that such value must be taken into consideration in estimating the daughter's shares.

By his will, dated the 30th of April, 1867, George William Vickers, after making certain specific bequests as therein mentioned, provided as follows:—

"And as to all my moneys in the English funds at my decease and all other my estate and effects (excluding the before and hereinafter-mentioned specific bequests), I give the corpus or principal equally between all my children, each son's share to be transferred to him at twenty-one years of age, and each daughter's to be held in trust, such trust to commence at her attaining the age of twenty-one years or marriage (whichever should first happen) as follows—viz., the dividends and interest for her separate use for her life, and after her death for all her children equally who shall attain the age of twenty-one years or marry, if more than one, if one only then to such one child (when the principal of each of my daughter's shares is to be paid and transferred), to her child or children, as the case may be, and in case any of my daughters shall have no such issue then the principal share of each such daughter shall go to her next of kin as if she had died unmarried. And in case any of my children should die, being a son under the said age or being a daughter under that age or marriage, the share of my children so dying (as well original as accruing under this provision) shall go to the survivors or survivor of my said children upon the trusts as if such share had (in each case) been originally bequeathed. And as to the dividends and interest to arise from each of my said children's shares as aforesaid (as to each son's share until the said age and as to each daughter's until the like age or marriage previously) upon trust to permit my said wife to receive the same dividends and interest respectively during her widowhood, and afterwards (in case that event should happen) upon trust to lay out the dividends and interest of each child's share for his or her use, maintenance, education, and advancement in life. And I direct my said executors to sell and convert into money the lease, goodwill, book debts, stock-in-trade and effects of, in, and at my said premises in Angel-court either wholly or in part by public auction or private contract, and their receipts shall fully discharge the purchaser without seeing to the application of the purchaser and to invest the net proceeds in the English funds, and to permit my said wife to take the dividends thereof during her widowhood, and from the determination of that event my will is that the same shall fall into and form part of my money in the funds and residuary estate hereinbefore bequeathed, and be disposed of accordingly. . . . And I authorize my trustees and executors to apply any reasonable portion of each of my son's presumptive share during his minority for apprenticeship or advancement in life in case circumstances should so require."

The testator's wife died in 1876.

Afterwards the testator determined to retire from his business in favour of his two sons, William Edward Vickers and George William Vickers, of whom the latter was an infant, and by an indenture dated the 10th of June, 1886, it was, among other things, provided as follows:—

"1. In consideration of the facts and circumstances hereinbefore recited, and also in consideration of the covenants on the part of the said William Edward Vickers hereinafter contained, the said George William Vickers, as beneficial owner, hereby assigns unto the said William Edward Vickers all the beneficial interest and goodwill of the said George William Vickers in the business so carried on by him as aforesaid, and also all the book and other debts now due and owing to him on account of the said business, and all securities for the same, and also all contracts and engagements, benefits and advantages, in or to which the said George William Vickers is interested or entitled on account or in respect of the said business, and also the stock-in-trade, goods, fixtures, articles, and things which now belong to the said George William Vickers on account of the said business, or are used for the purposes thereof, to hold unto the said William Edward Vickers absolutely, but nevertheless upon the trusts and subject to the provisions hereinafter contained.

"2. The said William Edward Vickers shall stand possessed of the said leasehold premises when assigned to him and of the said banking balance and the premises hereby assigned, upon trust, to carry on the said business at No. 1, Angel-court aforesaid, under the style or firm of George Vickers, and either alone or in partnership with the said George Frederick Vickers after he shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, so long as any of the other trusts of these presents shall be subsisting.

"3. If the said George William Vickers shall die during the minority of the said George Frederick Vickers, the weekly sums hereinafter by paragraph 5 made payable to the said William Edward Vickers and George Frederick Vickers respectively shall thenceforth during the minority of the said George Frederick Vickers be increased to £6 and £3 per week respectively.

"4. The net moneys received by the said William Edward Vickers by virtue of the foregoing assignment (including the earnings of the business) shall be paid to the banking account of the business.

"5. During the minority of the said George Frederick Vickers, provided the said George William Vickers shall so long live, the said William Edward Vickers, out of the moneys for the time being standing to the credit of the banking account of the business, shall pay to the said George William Vickers the weekly sum of £10 and to or for the benefit of the said George Frederick Vickers the weekly sum of £1 for one year from the date hereof, and weekly sum of £2 after the expiration of such one year, and shall be entitled to retain for his own use the weekly sum of £2 during one year from the date hereof, and the weekly sum of £3 during the remainder of the minority of the said George Frederick Vickers.

"6. If on attaining the age of twenty-one years the said George Frederick Vickers shall be willing to enter into partnership with the said William Edward Vickers, or the said George William Vickers wishes him to do so, the said William Edward Vickers, shall be bound to admit the said George Frederick Vickers forthwith into partnership and to an equal share in the property and profits of the business if both partners devote their whole time and attention thereto. . . .

"11. If the said George Frederick Vickers shall be under the age of twenty-one years, or when of full age shall decline to enter into partnership with the said William Edward Vickers, it shall be lawful for the said William Edward Vickers to carry on the said business on his own account, and if the said George Frederick Vickers when of full age shall be willing to enter into partnership, but the said William Edward Vickers shall desire to retire, or shall decline to enter into partnership with the said George Frederick Vickers, it shall be lawful for the said George Frederick Vickers to carry on the said business on his own account, but whichever of the two shall become entitled to carry on the said business alone (except in the event of the said George Frederick Vickers dying under the age of twenty-one years) shall pay or secure to the other the value of one moiety of the trust premises as follows—that is to say, one-fifth shall be paid immediately, and the balance by eight equal yearly instalments bearing interest at £5 per cent. per annum, such value to be ascertained by arbitration in case of dispute.

"12. The said William Edward Vickers hereby covenants with the said George William Vickers that the said William Edward Vickers and George Frederick Vickers or one of them will, on the said 31st day of August, 1886, pay to the said George William Vickers the said sum of £500 so advanced by him to the said business as aforesaid, with interest thereon in the meantime after the rate of £5 per cent. per annum computed from the date of these presents, and also so long as on that day as any principal money remains due in respect of the said sum of £500 to pay to him interest thereon after the same rate by equal quarterly payments, and also that the said William Edward Vickers and George Frederick Vickers or one of them will from time to time and at all times hereafter keep indemnified the said George William Vickers and his estate and effects from and against all debts and liabilities in respect of the said business, and from all actions, claims, and expenses in relation thereto."

George William Vickers died on the 6th of July, 1887, leaving two sons, William Edward Vickers and George Frederick Vickers, an infant, having been born on the 2nd of July, 1868, and three daughters.

The present summons was taken out by two of the daughters as administratrices with the will annexed against the two sons and remaining daughter for the determination of the question whether the shares of William Edward Vickers and George Frederick Vickers or either of them were ademed to any and what extent

Farwell, for the summons.—A gift of money or residue may be ademed by a gift of a share in a business: Bengough v. Walker, 15 Ves. 507; In re Lawes, 30 W. R. 33, 20 Ch. D. 31. There can be ademption pro tanto: Pym v. Lockyer, 5 My. & Cr. 29; but it was formerly held that there could only be ademption in toto: Grave v. Earl of Salisbury, 1 Bro. C. C. 425. In Holmes v. Holmes, 1 Bro. C. C. 555, it was decided that a father did not ademe a legacy to his son by taking him into partnership and giving him a share of capital; but that decision has not been followed in later cases. In this case the testator in his will expressly directed his business to be sold, and the proceeds to fall into the residue of his estate.

He also referred to Montefiore v. Guedalla, 8 W. R. 53, 1 De G. F. & J. 93; Leighton v. Leighton, 22 W. R. 727, L. R. 18 Eq. 458.

Everitt, Q.C., and Monckton, for the defendants.—There is such a difference between a share of residue and a share of a business as to prevent the one from being taken to be in satisfaction of the other: Holmes v. Holmes. In the cases of Bengough v. Walker and In re Lawes there were special circumstances, and the gifts of capital really amounted to gifts of sums of money. Here the sons take the business subject to conditions, and their interests in it are not absolute. In fact the transaction really amounts to a sale of the business to the sons, who are to pay the father an annuity, and who also covenant to pay him £500 and interest, and to indemnify him against the creditors of the business.

Farwell, in reply.—The transaction was meant to be a provision for the two sons, and to benefit them. The payment of the annuity to the father, and the conditions, must be considered as lessening the value of the gift, but not making it a sale. The value must be ascertained at the date of the gift.

He cited Watson v. Watson, 33 Beav. 574; Chichester v. Coventry, 15 W. R. 849, L. R. 2 E. & I. 71.

North, J.—[After stating the facts and reading the provisions of the will and the clauses of the deed set out above, his lordship proceeded:—] The question is whether a gift by will of a share of residue is ademed by the gift by deed of a business which formed part of the residue. The circumstances are somewhat peculiar, because the property comprised in the deed is specially dealt with by the will as part of the residue. It is hardly a case in which the testator can be said to have estimated the value of the gift; that is not necessary. There is, in substance, a handing over of the whole business, whatever its value, to one or both of the sons. I will treat it as if it were to one son only.

There does not seem such a want of harmony in the subject-matter of the gift in the will and the subject of the gift in the deed as to create a difficulty in saying that the one can be taken in satisfaction for the other. I see nothing in the nature of the property given to prevent the rule against double portions applying, and the gift of the business to both or either of the sons being a satisfaction pro tanto of his or their share in the residue. The cases of Bengough v. Walker and In re Lawes show that there is nothing in the nature of the property to rebut the presumption against double portions. The case of Holmes v. Holmes seems to have been recognized in In re Lawes as a special case depending on special circumstances; but in both the other cases it was recognized that a share in a business is a thing capable of being taken in satisfaction of a gift of personal estate. In Bengough v. Walker, which was a case of satisfaction, not ademption, the thing given by will was a share in powder works. There had been a previous covenant by the testator, the father, to pay a sum of £2,000, then the bequest was a bequest to the son of all the testator's "capital, share, interest, and concern in certain powder works"; the father also bequeathed to the son "so much money as, being added to the capital of the said powder works concern at the last settlement before the testator's decease, should make up in the whole the full and complete sum of £10,000, he, Abraham Elton, paying thereout to Mrs. Prout for life £20 a year." What was given there was the capital in a business. I do not see that it was in any way appreciated or had any value put upon it by the testator. It is true that he said that at some time and for some purposes a value must be put on it, for it was intended to give an amount up to £10,000; but he did not put any value on it at the time of making his will; and it seems to me from the report that the effect would have been precisely the same, and the operation on the covenant to pay £2,000 must have been the same if there had been no direction to make up the gift to £10,000, and that part of the gift had been left out.

Then, again, in the case of In re Lawes there was a bond to pay the obligor's reputed son £10,000 on a certain day four years later. Shortly before the day for payment he took the son into partnership, and it was provided by the articles of partnership that the capital should consist of £37,500 to be brought in by him, of which £19,000 should be considered as belonging to the son. The £10,000 was never paid. It was held in a suit to administer the father's estate that the rule against double portions applied. The late Master of the Rolls, after pointing out that the case of Holmes v. Holmes was a case not so sufficiently reported as to be useful as a guide in the case before him (which remark, in my opinion, applies also to the present case), referred to the following passage, relating to the older authorities, from the judgment of Sir William Grant in Bengough v. Walker: "But it is to be observed that in none of those cases did the party making the advance or the bequest ever make either with reference to a definite amount to which he intended it should reach. These are all cases in which the testator, without reference to the pecuniary value of the thing he was giving, has given it; and the question was whether, as upon entering into a computation of the value of the thing given, it turned out equal to the portion, or the legacy, it should be taken as a satisfaction, the testator not having indicated any idea of his own whether it was or was not correspondent in value to the debt which he owed or the legacy he gave. Those cases, therefore, would not precisely apply."

Upon that the Master of the Rolls said:—"The true meaning of that is that, where a testator gives to a child a beneficial lease or share of works, or any other thing, and says nothing about the value, he is not to be taken to be giving it in satisfaction of a pecuniary bequest; but, where he does refer to the value, the presumption of satisfaction may arise." Now what I understand him to be doing is to be commenting on the meaning of language used by a former judge in a case decided at a time when it was considered that a gift of something to go in ademption of a legacy must be something that would satisfy the legacy altogether, and not pro tanto, and he was not expressing his own view of the law at the time he was speaking. The view of the Master of the Rolls and of the whole court in that case was that a gift of a share in a business, in that case more valuable than a legacy, was of itself sufficient to ademe the legacy, and that the rule that there is a primâ facie presumption against double portions applied, and that in that case there was nothing to rebut it.

Another ground taken by Mr. Everitt was that the transaction carried out by the deed was a sale out and out for valuable consideration, and not an advancement. In my opinion it was not a sale out and out, but was a transaction by means of which the testator intended to provide for his two sons. The mere fact that some benefits were given to the testator would not be enough to prevent the transaction being treated as an advancement that would work an ademption. It is clear that the obligation of the legatee in Bengough v. Walker to pay an annuity of £20 a year was not considered enough. Therefore, in the present case it must be considered whether what was done was intended as a gift by way of portion. In considering that, the obligations entered into by the eldest son form an element to be taken into account. It is suggested that, as a matter of principle, instead of its being a boon, what was done was a bargain, and cannot operate as a portion. There is no doubt that an advance made by a father to a son on marriage will operate as an ademption, and yet in that case consideration is given; there is the consideration of marriage in every case, and property may or may not be brought in by the wife. The fact that there was some contract between the father and the son is not enough to prevent the operation of the rule against double portions. Looking at the nature of the agreement, there is nothing to prevent what the son received in trust for the two being taken as a portion or portions. The fact that the father was to be paid £520 a year out of the business is not material for the present purpose, but it is a matter to be taken into consideration in considering what the value of the gift was. The value of what the eldest or both sons take under the deed is to be taken into consideration in estimating the daughters' shares; but it is not possible now to say precisely what that value is. It is sufficient to declare that, in ascertaining the value of the daughters' shares, the value of the gift of the business assigned by the deed at the time it was made must be taken into consideration. There must be an inquiry as to the value of the gift at the date of the deed.

Statute of Distributions—(22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10), ss. 3, 5, 6, 7—Administration of personal estate—Intestacy—Next of kin—Grandchildren—Per stirpes or per capita.

A testatrix (a widow) died intestate as to a share of her residuary personal estate, owing to the death of a legatee in her lifetime. She had only two children, a son and a daughter, both of whom died before her. Three children of the son and one child of the daughter survived the testatrix.

Held, that, under the Statute of Distributions, the grandchildren took the share per stirpes and not per capita.

Adjourned summons.

This was an originating summons taken out by the trustees and executors of the will of Sarah Natt (widow), who died on the 25th of March, 1879, to determine the question as to how one-sixth share of the residue of the personal estate bequeathed by a residuary gift in the will but which had lapsed by the death of the legatee in the lifetime of the testatrix, and was undisposed of, was to be divided among her four grandchildren, who were her only next of kin—whether the division was to be per stirpes or per capita. The testatrix was married twice, the name of her first husband being John Bassett, by whom she had two children—viz., Henry John Bassett and Sarah Underhill, who married George Collin. They both died in the lifetime of the testatrix. By her second husband she had no children. Henry John Bassett had five children, three only of whom survived the testatrix—viz., Mrs. Head, Harry Bassett, and James Bassett. Harry Bassett was the heir-at-law of the testatrix. Mrs. Collin had two children, one only of whom, G. N. Collin, survived the testatrix. G. N. Collin died on the 20th of April, 1886, a bachelor.

The summons was adjourned into court.

Marcy, for the plaintiffs.—The question is whether, having regard to section 7 of the Statute of Distributions, the one-sixth share of the residue, so far as it consisted of personal estate, devolved on the four grandchildren per stirpes or per capita. The only recent authority bearing on the question is In re Ross's Trusts, 20 W. R. 231, L. R. 13 Eq. 286.

R. F. Norton, for the children of Henry John Bassett.—The next of kin being all of the same degree, the division must be per capita. That is the proper construction of section 7 of the Act. In re Ross's Trusts only decides that, when descendants of an intestate are in different degrees, they take by representation per stirpes. In the present case, however, there is no necessity for representation; all the next of kin, being in the same degree, take in their own right. The children in grandchildren by representation only in a manner which otherwise they would take nothing. The text-books do not all agree on this point.

He referred to Williams on Executors, 8th ed., vol. 3, p. 1,503; Watkins on Descents, 4th ed., p. 10; Burton's Compendium, 7th ed., p. 438, plac. 1,403 n.; and William's note to Watkins on Descents, 4th ed., p. 259 n.

F. L. Wright, for the representative of G. N. Collin.—Lord Hardwicke, in Lockyer v. Vade, Barnardiston C. 444, a case the facts of which were similar to those of the present case, expressed his opinion in favour of a division per stirpes, and Mr. Hargrave, Jurisconsult Exercitations, vol. 1, p. 271, adopted the same view. [He was stopped by the court.]

Bunting, for the heir-at-law of the testatrix.

North, J.—I observe that Lord Hardwicke, in Lockyer v. Vade, said that upon the opening of the cause "he inclined to be of a contrary opinion" to that which he expressed at the close of the hearing, viz., that, there being grandchildren living at the death of an intestate, but no children, the grandchildren should take per stirpes. I must confess that when this case was first opened I also was inclined to think that the rule was as it is stated in Williams on Executors. But on further consideration I have come to the conclusion that it is not so, and I think that In re Ross's Trusts is really an authority to the contrary. I think that section 3 of the Act points out distinctly a difference between the "wife and children or children's children, if any such be," of the dead man and his "next of kindred." I read the words "children's children" as meaning "issue of children," and I think that section 3 distinguishes clearly between children and descendants of children on the one hand, and "next of kindred" on the other hand. Then section 5 provides that the distribution is to be as follows, one-third to the wife the intestate, and the residue equally amongst the children and "such persons as legally represent such children, in case any of the said children be then dead." It was decided long ago that the persons who "legally represent" the children are their descendants in any degree. I think the words, "in case any of the said children be then dead," apply to the case of an only child being dead. The effect, therefore, of section 5, putting it shortly, is to give one-third of the surplus of the estate to the wife of the intestate and the other two-thirds equally among his children and such persons as legally represented the children in case any of them be then dead. Then section 6 provides for the case of an intestate leaving a wife but "no children nor any legal representatives of them"—that is, no children living in themselves or in their descendants. In that case half of the surplus is allotted to the wife and the other half is "to be distributed equally to every of the next of kindred of the intestate who are in equal degree and those who legally represent them." Then comes section 7, which (omitting the first proviso) provides that "in case there be no wife" all the estate is "to be distributed equally to and amongst the children; and in case there be no child, then to the next of kindred in equal degree of or unto the intestate and their legal representatives as aforesaid." The proviso at the beginning of section 7 is, "Provided that there be no representations admitted among collaterals after brother's and sister's children." I think that proviso is really an appendix to both section 6 and section 7, and that the two sections would read more clearly if the proviso were placed at the end of section 7 and the two sections were then read as one.

Section 6 provides for the case of an intestate leaving a wife, but leaving no children, either living themselves or represented by their descendants, and in that case half the estate is to go to the wife and the other half is to be divided equally among "the next of kindred who are in equal degree and those who legally represent them." But there are other possible cases for which the statute proceeds to provide. There might be no wife living at the death of the intestate, but there might be children living, or there might be no child living; and section 7 provides for both those cases. Mr. Norton construes section 7 as if it had said that the estate is "to be distributed equally to and amongst the children; and, in case there be no child, then to the next of kindred in equal degree of the intestate, including the descendants of deceased children and their legal representatives as aforesaid." I think it would make no difference whether the word "representatives" is read as applying to "children" or not. But I think the true construction is, that the words "next of kindred" mean next of kindred exclusive of issue of the intestate. If there is no wife of the intestate living, the entirety of the estate is to go to his children, in the same way as two-thirds go to them under section 5 if there is a wife to share with them. The words "to and amongst the children" are not intended to define exactly how the estate is to go to them; they are merely words of reference to what has gone before, implying that the distribution of the whole is to be as already directed in the case of the two-thirds. The last clause of section 7 provides for the case of there being no child of the intestate. It does not say, "in case of there being no child or representative of any child," but I think it means "no child living either in person or in its descendants." The provision for "next of kindred" is addressed merely to the case of children—i.e., children living either in themselves or in their descendants, being out of the way. I admit that this view of the meaning of the statute is contrary to that taken in Williams on Executors following the older work, Toller on Executors, and which has been adopted by some other text-writers. But the cases which are cited as authorities in support of the proposition applied to a different state of circumstances. They were all cases relating to collaterals, not to children of the intestate in the statutory meaning of the word "children."

The second rule, stated in Williams on Executors, 8th ed., vol. 2, p. 1,503, is as follows:—"Where the intestate's children are all dead, all of them having left children, if a father have three children, John, Mary, and Henry, and they all die before the father, John leaving, for instance, two children, Mary three, and Henry four, and afterwards the father die intestate, in that case all his grandchildren shall have an equal share, for, as his children are all dead, their children shall take as next of kin. Such, also, would be the case with respect to the great-grandchildren of the intestate if both his children and grandchildren had all died before him. In these instances the parties are said to take per capita, or, in other words, equal shares in their own right."

That view is, however, at variance with the view taken in Burton's Compendium. There it is said: It has been thought, however, that, where the claimants are all in the same degree of lineal descent from the intestate (as grandchildren, after the death of all his children), the distribution is not to be made on the principle of representation, but by the more simple rule of personal equality, or, as it is commonly expressed, per capita, and not per stirpes (see Toller on Executors). But it may be doubted whether this was the intention of the statute; and the authorities (as Davers v. Dewes, 3 P. Wms. 40; Lloyd v. Tench, 2 Ves. sen. 213) which establish that mode of distribution in the case of collaterals, under section 6, are grounded upon a reason which does not apply to the issue of the intestate—viz., that, where all take equally as next of kin, the words of the statute afford no room for the introduction of representative claims, for there is no mention of the next of kin in any part of the statute which precedes the supposition of a failure of the intestate's issue."

A passage similar to that which I have read from Williams on Executors is to be found in the text of Watkins on Descent, 4th ed., p. 259. But in the fourth edition there is this note by Mr. Joshua Williams:—"The authorities here referred to do not support the position taken in the text. They are all cases of the children of the deceased brothers of the intestate taking per capita, there being no mother, brother, or sister of the intestate living at his death. But in these cases the children of the brothers take as next of kindred, and not by representation, whereas the descendants of the children of an intestate take under the description of 'such persons as legally represent such children.' It would seem, therefore, that the grandchildren ought to be entitled per stirpes."

I have looked at the passage in Mr. Hargrave's Jurisconsult Exercitationes, vol. 1, p. 271, which was referred to by Wickens, V.C., in his judgment in In re Ross's Trusts, and I find that that learned writer takes a view at variance with that taken by Williams and Toller. Mr. Hargrave says: "A very distinguished civilian of the present times (to whom his country already stands highly indebted for his elegant and masterly edition of Justinian's Institutions, and to whom it may owe far more if he should prosecute his design of a more enlarged commentary), seems to have been almost aware of this difficulty; and, as if he thought consistency required it, he openly contends on our Statute of Distributions for excluding the distribution per stirpes, even as amongst grandchildren, when they are only claimants; though he candidly confesses that by Justinian's law it was clearly otherwise, and that he did not meet with any judicial determination to prove the doctrine in respect to our own law. But it may be doubted whether our courts of equity would be easily induced thus to extend this restrictive construction of the distribution per stirpes to descendants. It was once, indeed, attempted before Hardwicke, L.C. But, after hearing the point discussed, he discouraged the idea of a distribution per capita, and gave an opinion against it, though not a final one." It is clear, therefore, that the opinion of Lord Hardwicke, after hearing the point fully argued in Lockyer v. Vade, was in favour of a distribution per stirpes among grandchildren, and he arrived at his ultimate conclusion after having begun with taking a contrary view. There is, therefore, not merely a conflict of opinion among the text-writers, but there is what I must consider the decision of Lord Hardwicke that the division be per stirpes. There is, moreover, the case of In re Ross's Trusts before Wickens, V.C. If I am right in my construction of the statute, that it gives nothing in terms to the grandchildren of the intestate, but that the provision for "children" covers all the descendants of children, the decision in In re Ross's Trusts is directly in point. If Mr. Norton's argument is correct, the fund in that case should have been divided into sevenths instead of into moieties, and the distinction which he has attempted to draw does not seem to me to alter the effect of the decision. In re Ross's Trusts confirms my view of the construction of the statute, and it adopts that of Lord Hardwicke.

Under these circumstances I hold that the one-sixth share of residue which is undisposed of in the present case must, so far as it consists of personal estate, be divided into moieties. One of the moieties will be equally divided between the three children of Henry John Bassett, the other will go to the representative of G. N. Collin. The lapsed share, so far as it consists of realty, will go the heir-at-law of the testatrix.

In re Commercial Bank of South Australia. (a.)

Bill of exchange — Dishonour — Damages — Bill dishonoured abroad — Interest — Re-exchange — Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 57.

A bill of exchange drawn in South Australia, by a banking company carrying on business in South Australia and in England, for acceptance in England by their English branch bank, was dishonoured when presented in England.

Held, on a claim by the holder to prove in the winding up of the company in England for interest on the amount of the bill, at the rate of ten per cent. (the Australian rate of interest), that the claim for interest was wrong, and that the only remedy of the holder was by way of damages for the amount payable for re-exchange.

Ex parte Roberts, 35 W. R. 128, 18 Q. B. D. 286, followed.

Adjourned summons.

The Commercial Bank of South Australia was incorporated by an Act of the South Australian Legislature, and was not registered in England. It carried on the business of bankers in Australia and also in London, the head office being in Australia, and there being a branch office in London.

In February, 1886, the company suspended payment, both in Australia and London. There were a considerable number of creditors and assets to a large amount in England, and some of the shareholders were resident in England.

On the 8th of June, 1886, an order was made by North, J., on the petition of some English creditors, for the compulsory winding up of the company. A winding-up order had been made in Australia on the 12th of April, 1886.

In January, 1886, the Commercial Banking Co. of Sydney (hereinafter called the Sydney Co.) purchased from the Commercial Co. at Adelaide, in South Australia, a bill of exchange for £15,000, dated the 21st of January, 1886, drawn by the Commercial Co. on their London branch in favour of the Sydney Co., and payable sixty days after sight. This bill was presented to the London branch for acceptance on the 1st of March, 1886, when acceptance was refused, because the bank had then stopped payment, and the bill was not paid at maturity.

The Sydney Co. claimed in the English winding up to be paid the amount of the bill, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum (that being the Australian rate of interest) from the date when the bill became due to the date of payment. Interest was claimed because it was admitted that the assets of the Commercial Bank would be more than sufficient to pay their creditors in full.

The chief clerk admitted the claim, with interest at five per cent., without prejudice to the right of the Sydney Co. to receive additional interest at the rate of five per cent. if the court should hold that they were entitled to the colonial rate of interest.

The Sydney Co. now claimed the additional interest.

The court in Adelaide had allowed interest at ten per cent. on similar bills which had been proved in the Australian winding up.

Theobald, for the Sydney Co.—If this bill had been sent out to Australia and proved in the winding up, the colonial court would have allowed interest at ten per cent. as it has done in similar cases; and I submit the creditors ought not to be put in a worse position by proving here instead of sending the bill to Australia. By the course the creditors have adopted they have saved the company the expense of re-exchange. Your lordship said when the winding-up order was made that the winding up in this country was auxiliary to the winding up in Australia. Interest is given by way of damages, and the damages ought to be assessed according to the law of the place at which the bill was drawn. Allen v. Kemble, 6 Moo. P. C. 314; Gibbs v. Fremont, 9 Ex. 25.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the English liquidator.—This case is governed by the South Australian Bills of Exchange Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. No. 312). Section 57 of that Act is identical with section 57 of the English Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, except that in the former Act words fixing the rate of interest at ten per cent are introduced in clause (b) of sub-section 1. Under sub-section 2, when a bill is dishonoured abroad the holder is entitled to recover "the amount of the re-exchange, with interest": Ex parte Roberts, 35 W. R. 128, 18 Q. B. D. 286. The present claim is not for re-exchange, and it is, therefore, misconceived. The bill of exchange is really a promissory note, the same company being both drawers and acceptors, and the breach of contract took place in London, where the bill was dishonoured.

Pollard appeared for the colonial liquidators, but the court declined to hear him.

Theobald, in reply.

Aug. 3.—North, J., stated the facts, and continued:—The question is whether the claimants are entitled to be allowed additional interest at five per cent. so as to make up ten per cent. in the whole. It was contended that the bill, being drawn by the company in Australia upon its London branch, was really drawn by the company upon itself; that it was, therefore, in the nature of a promissory note, and that the mercantile law applicable to bills of exchange does not apply. But in Willans v. Ayers, 3 App. Cas. 133, 26 W. R. Dig. 32, it was decided that it did not lie in the mouth of the drawer or acceptor of such a bill to raise that objection, and that, if the holder chose to treat the document as a bill of exchange, he was entitled to do so. It comes, therefore, to this, that the holders of this bill, who are, no doubt, indorsees of the drawers, have entered into a contract with the drawers, and the drawers with them, that the bill shall be presented for acceptance at the branch of the bank in London on which it is drawn, that it shall be accepted when presented, and that it shall be paid at maturity. In consequence of the stoppage of the bank before the bill was presented, it was not accepted, and there has been a breach of contract on the part of the drawers towards the holders, and the drawers are liable to the holders in damages for that breach.

The question is, What those damages are? In some cases, no doubt, it has been held that the holder of a bill may recover as damages interest at the rate payable in the country in which the contract was made, the breach of which gives rise to the claim. Allen v. Kemble and Gibbs v. Fremont were cited as authorities for the proposition that interest is payable. In Gibbs v. Fremont Mr. Willes, whose argument was successful, cited the following passage from Story on the Conflict of Laws:—"The drawer and indorsers do not contract to pay the money in the foreign place on which the bill is drawn, but only to guarantee its acceptance and payment in that place by the drawee; and, in default of such payment, they agree, upon due notice, to reimburse the holder in principal and damages at the place where they respectively entered into the contract." That place, in the present case, was South Australia. Then Martin, B., in the course of the argument, referred to Allen v. Kemble, and read this passage from it:—"There it is said, 'The drawer, by his contract, undertakes that the drawee shall accept, and shall afterwards pay the bill, according to its tenor, at the place and domicil of the drawee, if it be drawn and accepted generally; at the place appointed for payment, if it be drawn and accepted payable at a different place from the place of domicil of the drawee. If this contract of the drawer be broken by the drawee, either by non-acceptance or non-payment, the drawer is liable for payment of the bill, not where the bill was to be sold by the drawee, but where he (the drawer) made his contract, with such interest, damages, and costs as the law of the country where he contracted may allow." Alderson, B., delivered the judgment of the court, and stated the point as expressly decided in Allen v. Kemble. He said, "And this is not to be left to the jury, for it depends on the rule of law. The amount of the interest in each place is to be so left" (that is, to be left to the jury), "and so also is the question whether any damage has been sustained requiring the payment of interest at all, for those are questions of fact." Then I proceeded to deal with the case on the footing that these questions have been before the jury, and that they had found what the facts were. Those cases, therefore, show clearly that the liability to damages is to be measured according to the law of the country where the contract which is broken was entered into.

In the present case there can be no doubt about the law of the country, because the South Australian Act relating to bills of exchange has been put in evidence, and it is substantially the same as the English Act of 1882 on the same subject. The 57th section, which bears on this point, corresponds exactly with section 57 of the English Act, except that, instead of giving interest generally, it gives interest at the rate of ten per cent., no doubt because that is the ordinary rate of interest in South Australia. [His lordship read section 57 of the Australian Act, and continued:—] I was inclined at one time to think that the remedy given by sub-section 2 in the case of a bill dishonoured abroad was an alternative remedy, and that the holder had an option of proceeding either under sub-section 1 or under sub-section 2. But on consideration I do not think that is the real meaning. Sub-section 1 is not in terms limited to the case of a bill dishonoured at home, but still I think the true construction is that, when the bill is dishonoured abroad, the damages mentioned in sub-section 2 are the only damages which can be recovered.

There is very excellent authority to assist me on this point in the case of Ex parte Robarts, in which the construction of section 57 of the English Act came in question. There Lindley, L.J., who delivered the judgment of the court, in speaking of the consequences of the breach of contract arising from the non-payment of a bill of exchange, said:—"These consequences are dealt with in section 57. Sub-section 1 deals with bills dishonoured at home, and sub-section 2 deals with bills dishonoured abroad. The bills now in question were drawn abroad, but they were payable, and accepted, and dishonoured in this country, and therefore, if provided for at all, they fall within sub-section 1, and not sub-section 2. But, according to sub-section 1, neither the acceptor, nor anyone else, is liable to pay more than the amount of the bill and interest, and expenses of noting and protest. But this sub-section does not appear to be addressed to the case of a bill the drawer of which is liable to damages for re-exchange." That, therefore, is a decision on section 57 of the English Act, which is identical with that with which I have now to deal, that, in the case of a bill dishonoured abroad—that is, in a place foreign to that where it is drawn and indorsed—the remedy is under sub-section 2 for re-exchange. That sub-section in each of the Acts is founded, not upon anything peculiar to the law either of England or of Australia, but upon the general law of merchants, and is of international application. It is clear that this is so as regards England. For this I may refer to De Tastet v. Baring, 11 East, 265, and Suse v. Pompe, 9 W. R. 15, 8 C. B. N. S. 538. The law of England is fully stated in Chitty on Bills and in Byles on Bills. As regards continental nations, the law is stated in Pothier, and as regards America, in Kent's Commentaries and Story on Bills, and many other text-books. It seems to me, therefore, that this claim for interest is wrong.

The way in which the re-exchange is reckoned is pointed out very clearly in Chitty on Bills, 10th ed., p. 337, thus:—"In foreign countries, especially in France, when a bill has been duly protested for non-payment, the holder has a right to reimburse himself by drawing a second bill of exchange (called by the French retraite) on the drawer or one of the indorsers of the first, for an amount which is composed, first, of the principal sum and interest from the day of the protest; secondly, of the expenses of the protest; thirdly, of other legal expenses, such as bank commission or brokerage, and of journeys, when requisite, to obtain payment; and, fourthly, of the stamp and of the postage of letters which the default of payment rendered it necessary to write. These charges must not exceed what ought, of right, to be demanded, and the vouchers for such charges should accompany the bill. The evidence in support of the charges is established by an account called compte de retour, which ought to be annexed to the retraite, together with the protest, or a copy thereof. This account ought to name the person on whom the retraite is drawn, in order to show that it relates to such bill, and to avoid the frauds that might result from the omission. The account ought also to announce the rate of exchange at which the retraite is negotiable, and which the law terms re-exchange." That shows clearly the details to be gone through in order to arrive at the amount payable by way of re-exchange. But it is clearly not necessary that all those processes should be strictly followed, for, as is said in Byles on Bills, 14th ed., p. 449: "According to English practice, the retraite, or re-exchange bill, is now seldom drawn, but the right of the holder to draw it is settled by the law-merchant of all nations, and it is only by a reference to this supposed bill that the re-exchange, in other words, the true damages in an action on the original bill, can be scientifically understood and computed." That shows that it is immaterial that in the present case the bill has not been sent out to Australia. The amount of damages for re-exchange can be ascertained without that formality being gone through. It is clear, therefore, that the amount payable by way of re-exchange depends upon various complicated matters, such as the expenses incurred in the particular case, and the rate of exchange at the moment between the two countries which are concerned in the transaction. Therefore, it is impossible to say what is the precise sum payable, except by going through the computation in the particular case.

In some countries a different rule has been adopted in order to avoid the trouble of this computation. For instance, it appears from Francis v. Rucker, Amb. 672, that a liquidated sum of twenty per cent. was substituted for re-exchange in the State of Pennsylvania, and from Ex parte Roberts it appears that in Tobago a liquidated sum of ten per cent. has been substituted for re-exchange. I have considered whether it would be possible to treat the ten per cent. in the present case as really a liquidated sum in lieu of re-exchange. But there are difficulties about that, particularly having regard to Willans v. Ayers. In that case South Australia was the foreign country, and an attempt was made to prove that there was a custom existing there for ten per cent. to be taken as liquidated damages instead of re-exchange, but the Privy Council held that the custom was not proved, and refused to act upon it. The claimants are also in this difficulty, that they are not claiming upon the footing of a breach of the contract, but they have proved for the amount of the bill with interest, and, interest having been allowed at five per cent. (that being the rate of interest payable upon bills of exchange in this country when the rate is not specially agreed upon), they have accepted interest at that rate, and they now make a claim, not for damages, but for additional interest as on a contract which they affirm, and not one for the breach of which they are suing. I feel, therefore, an insuperable difficulty in attempting to remould the claim, or in allowing an amendment, so as to make it a claim for re-exchange instead of interest, as I have no means of ascertaining what the amount of re-exchange would be, or of forming any opinion whether the case is similar to Willans v. Ayers, and whether any sum would be payable for re-exchange.

I think the claim for interest is altogether misconceived, and I have no materials which enable me to substitute any other claim for it. The claim fails, and I must dismiss it, with costs.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) April

DAVYS v. RICHARDSON. (a.)

Practice—Payment of money into court—Tender in satisfaction before action — Defence denying liability — Payment out—Order when necessary—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 22, rr. 5, 6 (c).

In an action for wrongful dismissal, with claim one year's salary in lieu of notice, defendant denied liability for more than one month's salary, or, alternatively, for more than three months' salary, which he amount he tendered in satisfaction before action, on plaintiff's refusal of acceptance, paid it into court. Plaintiff obtained a verdict that one month's salary was due, but, on the application of his solicitor, the amount paid in was paid out to his solicitor under 22, r. 5 (c).

Held, that an order was necessary before the money should have been paid out under ord. 22, r. 6 (c), on the ground that the defence in substance denied liability for the whole amount; that rule 5 (c) of order 22 only applied to defences of "tender" where the old plea of "tender" could, under the circumstances, have been maintained; that, the defence being in substance a denial of liability, the money should only have been paid out under an order of court; and that the plaintiff's solicitor, having received the money wrongly so paid out, must refund the balance in excess of the one month's salary recovered by him.

Appeal from Pollock, B., at chambers.

The plaintiff in this action had sued the defendant for wrongful dismissal under an agreement, and claimed one year's salary in lieu of notice. The defendant in his statement of defence pleaded (inter alia) that "by the agreement the plaintiff was only entitled to one month's notice at the time when he received the notice," or, "alternatively that the plaintiff under the agreement was not entitled to more than three months' notice or salary in lieu thereof," and, "further, by the whole statement of claim, the defendant made tender before action of £163, which the plaintiff refused, and the defendant has paid the said amount of £163 into court, and says it is enough to satisfy the plaintiff's claim." The said £163 was made up of a sum admittedly due to the plaintiff, and of three months' salary in lieu of notice. The sum so paid in was receipted on the pleadings by the Bank of England, Law Courts Branch as being "paid in with defence setting up tender." On the trial Day, J., held that the plaintiff was only entitled to one month's notice, and judgment was given in those terms. The plaintiff's solicitor immediately applied for and obtained the money paid into court on the written request of the plaintiff under ord. 22, r. 5 (c). The defendant claimed repayment of the balance paid in beyond one month's salary on the ground that the money should not have been paid out without an order to the effect under ord. 22, r. 6 (c). Pollock, B., held that the payment into court had been made without denial of liability, and, therefore, that rule 5 (c) of order was applicable, and the money could be taken out by the plaintiff on his request or paid to his solicitor on the plaintiff's written authority." From this decision the defendant now appealed.

month's salary, but in the alternative three months' salary was tendered if the plaintiff would accept that in satisfaction. The plaintiff had not accepted that amount in satisfaction. The money, therefore, became subject to rule 6 (c) of order 22, and should not have been paid out without an order of the court or of a judge. The judge had held that one month's salary was sufficient satisfaction. The defendant could not lay claim to more than that amount, and the balance ought to be ordered to be repaid to the defendant: Maple & Co. v. The Earl of Shrewsbury, 35 W. R. 819, 19 Q. B. D. 463.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., and Horace Browne, for the plaintiff and for his solicitor.—The money was paid in by way of tender, without denial of liability. By the forms of the Paymaster's office money can be paid in "with defence setting up tender," and it can then be paid out at the request of the plaintiff under rule 5 (c) of order 22, or it may be paid in "with defence denying liability," and then it can only be paid out under an order under rule 6 (c) of order 22. The defendant's solicitor here paid in the money under the first form "setting up tender," and the plaintiff's solicitor was justified in taking out all the money so paid in under the written request of the plaintiff without any order being necessary. The judgment at the trial was in effect that "the money paid in was enough." The money was properly paid out at the request of the plaintiff without further order under order 44 of the Supreme Court Funds Rules, 1886. At any rate, the plaintiff's solicitor should not be called upon to refund the money, as he was misled by the form in which the defendant's solicitor chose to pay in the money.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—I am of opinion that the order of Pollock, B., must be rescinded, and that this appeal be allowed—namely, this application for an order for the plaintiff's solicitor to repay the balance of this money over and above the amount of one month's salary to the defendant.

It is not necessary to detail the circumstances of this case. It is sufficient to pass to the fact that the money paid into court by the defendant was, in the result, in excess of that which it was held could properly be demanded by the plaintiff. That money might have been properly taken out by the plaintiff in satisfaction at the time, and all further proceedings been stayed. The plaintiff did not do so. He did not accept the sum paid in in satisfaction of his claim. He chose to go on with his action, thus necessarily implying that he claimed more than had been paid in. In that claim he failed. The money was clearly shown in the result to have been in excess of that which need have been paid, and equally clearly it was shown that the plaintiff had not been satisfied by its tender. The plaintiff, however, still maintains that under ord. 22, r. 5 (c), money may be paid in under the old and well-understood plea of "tender," and that where it has been so paid in it may be taken out without any order of court by the plaintiff. That is so, but then the money must have been paid in under circumstances under which the old plea of "tender" could have been set up. Here the statements in the pleadings are inconsistent with any such plea. They do not bring the case within the rule at all. There is a second conclusive objection which follows upon this against the plaintiff's claim. Rule 5 must be taken with rule 6 of the same order. Now the facts of this case seem to bring it exactly within rule 6, under which when the liability of the defendant for the whole claim, as pressed, is denied, as it clearly was here looking at the pleadings as a whole, and when the sum so paid in is not accepted by the plaintiff in satisfaction, as it was not in this case, then the money can only be obtained by an order. The plaintiff's claim was for more than three months' salary. The defendant denied his liability in any event for more than three months, and, as he contended, for more than one month. That is a denial of liability which satisfies the condition of the preamble of rule 6; and sub-section (c) of that rule makes the case still more complete. The money was not accepted in satisfaction, hence the action proceeded. It cannot not now be got back without an order, and it ought never to have been paid out without an order. What is to be done? It was paid into the hands of the plaintiff's solicitor—at the plaintiff's request, I quite allow. It must not be supposed that anything dishonourable whatever is so much as hinted at against the solicitor. He made a mistake, that is all; and he was led into that mistake by the form which the defendant's solicitor adopted in paying the money into court. But he took that money out when he ought not to have done so. Under the circumstances he must replace the balance so wrongly taken out, but we will give no costs against him.

Whitely v. Barley. (a.)

Corporation—Officer of local authority—"Concerned or interested" in contract—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 189, 193, 126.

A local authority entered into contracts respecting certain sewage and drainage works, and they employed the defendant, who was their town surveyor, to prepare bills of quantities and to superintend the construction of the drainage works. It was provided by the local authority that he should receive in respect of each employment a percentage (1) on the amounts certified by him to be due under the contract; and (2) on the sums paid for the works under his superintendence.

Held, that the defendant was "concerned or interested" in the contracts within the meaning of section 193 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and had incurred the penalty therein provided.

Further consideration before Mathew, J.

This was an action to recover penalties under section 193 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The defendant was town surveyor to the Corporation of Ramsgate, which is the "local authority" within the meaning of the Act, and the penalties sought to be recovered were in respect of three contracts entered into by the corporation in 1884 and 1885 for the sewering and paving of new streets. The defendant had been employed to take out the quantities, and it was provided in each contract that for this service he should be paid two and a half per cent. on the amount of the contract. This amount the contractor was to receive upon obtaining the defendant's certificate that the works had been completed to his satisfaction.

The plaintiff further claimed penalties in respect of seven contracts entered into by the corporation for the construction of sewage works at Ramsgate. The defendant had prepared a scheme and had been appointed engineer by the corporation to superintend the works and the corporation had passed a special resolution allowing him percentages on the sums to be paid for the works. Under these contracts also he was to receive one and a half per cent. commission on such sums for taking out the quantities.

(a.) Reported by G. K. Paley, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Kemp, Q.C., and Dickens, for the plaintiff.—The definition given in section 326 of the Public Health Act, 1875, of the duties of the surveyor to a local authority includes the superintendence of sewering and paving works. "Taking out the quantities" also comes within his ordinary duties. The defendant was either "concerned or interested" or these percentages must be considered as "fees exacted" within the meaning of section 193: Burgess v. Clark, 33 W. R. 269, 14 Q. B. D. 735; Towsey v. White, 5 B. & C. 125. The local authority cannot appoint their surveyor to act as their engineer, because he is unable to contract with them: Mellies v. Shirley Local Board, 34 W. R. 187, 16 Q. B. D. 446.

Finlay, Q.C., Tindal Atkinson, and Crispe, for the defendant.—The superintendence of the drainage scheme and the "taking out the quantities" are both outside the ordinary duties of surveyor to a local authority. The corporation, therefore, were justified in making the defendant an "allowance," and these percentages must be regarded as "allowances" within the meaning of section 189 of the Act.

Kemp, Q.C., replied.

Mathew, J.—This action was brought to recover penalties alleged to have been incurred by the defendant under section 193 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The defendant is town surveyor of the Corporation of Ramsgate, and it was not disputed that he was an officer employed by the corporation as the local authority within the description in the section.

It appeared that under three contracts with builders made by the corporation for the purposes of the Act the defendant had been employed to take out the quantities. For this service it was provided in each contract that he should be paid two and a half per cent. on the amount of the contract. This amount the contractor was to receive upon obtaining the defendant's certificate that the works had been completed to his satisfaction.

The first question was whether the defendant was "concerned or interested" in these contracts within the meaning of the section.

I am of opinion that he was, and that he has incurred the penalty sought to be recovered in respect of each of these contracts. The object of the statute is to prevent an officer of the local authority from being placed in a position where his duties to his employers conflict with his personal interests. With respect to each contract, the defendant had a duty to the corporation, first, to advise as to the estimate of quantities and the amount to be paid to each contractor, and, secondly, to decide that the work for which he was to certify had been properly executed. In the performance of this duty he was exposed to the temptation from which the statute was intended to protect him.

The plaintiff further sought to recover seven penalties in respect of contracts entered into by the corporation for the construction of extensive sewage works at Ramsgate. The defendant had prepared a scheme for carrying out a system of main drainage in the town which had been approved by the Local Government Board. The corporation had appointed the defendant their engineer to superintend the execution of the necessary works. By special resolution of the corporation the defendant was to be paid for his services percentages on the sums to be paid for the works, which were not to exceed £780. He was also to receive, as in the case of the other contracts referred to, a commission of one and a half per cent. for taking out the quantities.

An attempt was made at the trial to show that the whole payment to the defendant was an "allowance" which, under the Act, the corporation was empowered to make him, and with that view it was sought to establish that the arrangement made as to the one and a half per cent. was that the defendant was to account to the corporation for the amounts received by him less his expenses out of pocket. The jury were not satisfied that there had been any such contract. I have no doubt that the jury were right in this conclusion, and that the respectable witnesses who were called for the defendant had persuaded themselves that the resolution of the corporation entitled the defendant to no more than £780 and fell into the mistake of supposing that their view of the contract had been the subject of an express bargain.

I cannot doubt that, in respect of this employment of the defendant by the local authority, he has incurred a further penalty. The cases of Burgess v. Clark, Todd v. Robinson, 14 Q. B. D. 739, 33 W. R. Dig. 127, and Mellies v. Shirley Local Board seem to me decisive of the question.

It was contended by the counsel for the plaintiff that in respect of the sewage works, the defendant had incurred not one but seven different penalties, and to this end it was pointed out that two different percentages were payable under the resolution appointing the defendant as engineer, and that there had been five agreements for the execution of the works entered into by different contractors, in each of which had been inserted the provision that one and a half per cent. should be paid to the defendant for taking out the quantities. I am of opinion that the evidence showed there was one contract only with the defendant in respect of the sewage works, and that the corporation intended that he should have for his services as engineer the percentages mentioned in the resolution, and also those provided for by the contracts.

I regret the conclusion to which I have been compelled to come to, and I think it right to add that there was no evidence and no suggestion at the trial that the defendant had been guilty of discreditable or dishonourable conduct in his office of town surveyor. With respect to the main drainage scheme, he received a moderate recompense for very valuable work, and I see no reason to doubt that he had served the Corporation of Ramsgate with equal integrity and ability. The defendant would seem to be the victim of the law which in his case operates harshly. The motives for bringing this action were not disclosed at the trial, and I am not concerned in making them the subject of inquiry or comment.

Crampton v. Ridley & Co. (a.)

Arbitration—Costs—Mercantile reference—Remuneration of arbitrators and umpire—Implied contract.

Where parties in a mercantile dispute agree to refer matters in difference to arbitration, an implied contract is thereby created to pay the arbitrators and umpire acted in the reference reasonable remuneration for their services.

Virany v. Warne, 4 Esp. 47, and Barroughes v. Clarke, 1 Dowl. 48, distinguished.

(a.) Reported by Cecil Chapman, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action tried before A. L. Smith, J., without a jury.

The action was brought to recover £328 as fees payable to certain arbitrators and an umpire for their services in a mercantile reference.

The facts and arguments appear in the judgment.

Pitt-Lewis, Q.C., and F. Radcliffe, for the plaintiffs, Crampton and Holt.

Bigham, Q.C., and Danckwertz, for the defendants, Ridley & Co.

Danckwertz appeared for the defendant McNay.

The defendant Mackay, who was trustee in bankruptcy of F. C. Winby, did not appear.

A. L. Smith, J.—This is an action brought by an umpire and an arbitrator to recover the sum of £328, being umpire's and arbitrator's fees payable, as it is alleged, to them by the defendants.

The facts of the case are as follows:—

By indenture dated July 2, 1878, Frederick Charles Winby, whose trustee in bankruptcy is one of the defendants, granted the sole and exclusive licence to the defendants, Ridley & Co., to use his invention for improvement in rails for steam tramways, subject to the terms and provisions in the indenture contained. In and prior to the year 1882 disputes arose between Winby and Ridley & Co. touching and concerning the licence so granted and the user thereof, whereupon, on July 10, 1882, it was agreed between Winby and Ridley & Co. that such disputes should be referred to the award of William L. Holt and Thomas Fothergill McNay, civil engineers, or, in case of disagreement, to their umpire. By this submission to arbitration it was also agreed "That the arbitrators or their umpire, as the case might be, might by their or his award order and determine what should be done by either party, and that the costs of the reference and award should be in the direction of the arbitrators or their umpire, who might award by whom, to whom, and in what manner the same should be paid."

Winby appointed Holt as his arbitrator and Ridley & Co. appointed McNay as theirs, and each undertook their respective appointments. The arbitrators thereupon agreed to appoint as umpire the plaintiff, Mr. W. R. Crampton, the well-known engineer of 4, Victoria-street, Westminster, which appointment was made and accepted in the following letters:—

"October 17, 1882.

"Dear Sir,—Mr. McNay informs us that he and Mr. Holt have agreed to appoint you as umpire, and he asked us to inquire whether you will undertake the office, and, if so, to forward you the agreement of reference.

"Will you kindly let us know whether you will be good enough to accept the appointment?

"Yours truly,

"R. P. & H. Phillipson & Cooper."

These gentlemen were solicitors for Messrs. Ridley & Co.

"4, Victoria-street, Westminster,

"October 18, 1882.

"Dear Sirs,—In reply to yours of the 17th, requesting to know whether I will act as umpire in the case of Messrs. Ridley & Co. and Mr. Winby, I beg to say that I shall be happy to do so.

"Yours faithfully,

"W. R. Crampton."

The first meeting upon the reference took place before the two arbitrators sitting without an umpire, and at a meeting held on April 7, 1883, a question arose as to the costs of the arbitration, and after a discussion, which appears from the shorthand notes before me, an agreement in writing was come to between the parties to the litigation through their respective representatives, bearing date April 7, 1883. That agreement was as follows:—"In the matter of an arbitration between Frederick Charles Winby and Ridley & Co., it is agreed between the parties that the arbitrators (Messrs. Holt & McNay) may, if they think fit, intimate their decision, each party agreeing to be bound thereby previously to the making of the final and formal award, and the parties undertake that such of them as may be directed by the arbitrators shall pay such costs and charges of the arbitrators as they may direct." Contemporaneously with this agreement, and indorsed thereon, it was also agreed between the parties "that, in the event of the arbitrators disagreeing, the matter should be referred to the umpire, W. R. Crampton, by the arbitrators, and that the umpire should with them proceed to consider the matter, and should make his award without the presence of counsel, solicitor, or witnesses, except that he might require the presence of either or both of the parties." On October 12, 1883, Mr. Holt and Mr. McNay formally, by letter, appointed Mr. Crampton as umpire, and therein expressed their desire that he would be good enough to take care that their fees, past and future, be paid to him on their behalf.

Before Mr. Crampton moved in the matter the two contemporaneous agreements of April 7, 1883, and the submission to reference of July 10, 1882, were forwarded to him, and after the receipt of these documents on December 20, 1883, he first sat as umpire.

Mr. Crampton and the two arbitrators sat from time to time to consider the matters referred to them, and difficulties arose which do not appear to me material. Ultimately, however, on July 3, 1885, Mr. Crampton made his award, and thereby, among other things, awarded that Winby and Ridley & Co. should each bear his, or their own costs of reference, and pay half costs of the award, and that if either party should, in the first instance, pay the whole or more than half the costs of the award, the other party should repay him or them so much of the amount as should exceed the half of the costs. The amount sued for—viz. £328—is made up as follows:—

Holt's fees as arbitrator	94	10	0
McNay's fees as arbitrator	94	10	0
Crampton's fees as umpire	63	0	0	or £139
Out of pocket expenses	76	0	0 making in all the	328	0	0	sued for.

It has been agreed that this amount is to be subject to taxation.

The question is whether the whole or part, and, if so, what part, of these fees can be recovered in the present action, and, if so, from whom?

On the part of the plaintiff it was, in the first place, contended that by the appointment of Mr. Holt as arbitrator and Mr. Crampton as umpire under the circumstances above narrated, and apart from any special bargain, those gentlemen became entitled at law to recover their fees from the parties litigating, or in other words that there existed an implied joint undertaking by the parties litigating to pay the plaintiffs their fees, being reasonable remuneration for the services respectively rendered by them. In the second place, the plaintiffs contended that, even if this were not so, there was an express bargain in the present case, and that upon the express bargain the action was maintainable.

Both these propositions were denied by the defendants. It was said that by the law of England, apart from express bargain, an arbitrator or umpire could maintain no action for remuneration for his services, for that there existed no implied promise by the parties appointing to pay, and that the only remedy the arbitrator or umpire had was a lien upon the award or possibly by attachment. They also insisted that there was no express bargain or evidence of an express promise by the defendants to pay the plaintiffs their fees in the present case.

If I were not fettered by authority, and were asked the simple question whether, upon a purely mercantile and business arbitration as this was, where men in the positions in which the arbitrator and umpire in this case were were appointed, there was or was not an implied promise by the parties appointing jointly to pay them reasonable remuneration for their services, I should not have hesitated to answer the question in the affirmative. This is not the case of a dispute among friends upon social or such like matters, asking mutual friends to settle the dispute between them, in which case I should agree that there was no implied undertaking to pay for the services to be rendered. Nor is it a case of counsel being retained to adjudicate. It is a purely business transaction of common daily occurrence, and which during the last half-century has become more and more in practice as a well-known way of settling mercantile and business disputes without having recourse to the courts of law; in all which cases, and I have never in my experience known one to the contrary, except there may have been an express bargain on the subject, the arbitrators and umpire have universally looked for, and been paid, remuneration for their services rendered. In fact, such arbitrators and umpires, as is well known, make the adjudicating upon such claims part of their daily and ordinary avocation, and in such cases, apart from authority, I should have held that there was the implied promise to pay insisted upon by the plaintiffs. It is said, however, that the cases have decided otherwise, and I am bound thereby.

In the year 1801, in the case of Virany v. Warne, 4 Esp. 47, Lord Kenyon certainly ruled at Nisi Prius that the appointment of an arbitrator to settle a dispute which had arisen between partners was not of such a nature as to raise a demand for payment, and that the plaintiff could recover nothing unless he could prove an express promise. In 1818, in Swinford v. Byrne, Gow's N. P. 5, Dallas, C.J., would certainly seem to have thought that an arbitrator could demand what he called compensation for his trouble, but he said he would reserve the point.

In the year 1831, in Burroughes v. Clarke, 1 Dowl. 48, Taunton, J., remembering the case before Lord Kenyon of, I take it, Virany v. Warne, held upon that authority that an arbitrator could not sue for his fees, "the office, as ruled by Lord Kenyon, being altogether honorary" as he said.

In 1842 came the case of Hoggins and others v. Gordon, 3 Q. B. 466. In this case an argument took place upon special demurrer as to whether the declaration was sufficient, it being an action by an umpire and two arbitrators to recover their fees from the parties litigant. The court decided in the case that an express promise would be intended from the averments stated in the declaration, and so gave judgment for the plaintiffs upon special demurrer. It was insisted by the defendants that there was a direct decision of the court of Queen's Bench that without an express promise no action could be maintained. It should, however, be noticed in this case that Patterson, J., referred to the decision of Dallas, C.J., in Swinford v. Byrne certainly without disapproval. Whether this is an authority binding upon me that in an arbitration such as the present no promise is to be implied to pay the arbitrators and umpire, I do not stop to discuss for reasons hereinafter appearing. I wish, however, to point out that the last decision is nearly half a century ago, when arbitrations, such as we are now considering, were not in vogue, and had not become of every-day practice, as in the last quarter of a century they have.

In 1851, however, Parke, B., in In re Coombs, 4 Ex., p. 841 (and this is the latest case upon the subject to which I have been referred), appears to have thought that arbitrator might possibly sue for his fees without an press contract, for that learned judge there said doubt he has a lien upon the award for his services, perhaps he might maintain an action for work labour." The learned judge is not likely to overlooked what was actually decided in Hoggins Gordon.

I should notice that the law of America is that fees can be sued for: see Parsons on Contracts, 5th vol. 2, p. 55. In my opinion if the point now in ever comes to be decided by a court of review, if that necessary, it will be held, and I believe the law to that upon an arbitration such as we are now deal with there is an implied promise by the parties appo ing the arbitrators and umpire jointly to pay them their services. In my judgment, in the cases abo referred to, courts were not dealing with the class arbitrators and umpires to which the case in ha applies.

But the plaintiffs did not rest their case upon an im plied undertaking to pay, but insisted that in this case there was evidence from which I should infer an express promise to pay, and in my judgment the plaintiffs are right in their contention, and if this be so the express promise would obviously override any implied promise that might otherwise exist. It seems to me that when, upon April 7, 1883, the arbitrators raised the point as to their fees, the parties then and there undertook, not only to pay them, the arbitrators, but also the umpire to be appointed, their and his fees as directed by the award to be made. By the contract of submission to arbitration of July 10, 1882, the parties to the litigation agreed inter se that the costs of reference and award should be in the discretion of the arbitrators or umpire as the case might be, and as was pointed out by Parke B., in Bates v. Townley, 2 Ex., at p. 165, although the submission is not a contract between the arbitrators and umpire on the one part, and the parties litigating on the other, yet "the contract of the two parties is evidence by their own admission that the arbitrators were to be paid for their trouble, and might be used for that purpose, if the arbitrators had to sue the parties for their services."

This, coupled with the agreements of April 7, 18 made directly with the arbitrators, both communicated as they were to Mr. Crampton before he acted, in my judgment is ample evidence of an express promise to pay as contended for by the plaintiffs, and I accordingly find such contract to have been made.

But then arises the question, express promise to what and by whom? Why, as stated in the agreement of April, 7, 1883, as I read them, an express promise by the parties litigant to pay in such manner as may be directed by the award. The award determined that each party was to pay his own costs of reference and half costs of award. This means each party has to pay his own costs of counsel, solicitor, witnesses, and so forth—viz., the cost of his conduct of his case—and each party has to pay half costs of what I will call the costs—i.e., of umpire, arbitrators, and award—and no more. In my judgment the true reading of the award by which the parties to the litigation have bound themselves is that each party was to pay half costs of award, as above defined, and if either paid more he was to be entitled to get the excess so paid from the other party. When either party had paid his half costs of award, then in my judgment, his liability ceased, and over and above such half neither umpire nor arbitrator had any claim against either litigant upon the contract. This, in my judgment, is the effect of the special bargain made by the parties to the litigation between themselves.

Mr. Crampton is, therefore, entitled to recover from the defendants, Messrs. Ridley & Co., upon the special contract, half his costs—viz., half of £139—

£69 10s., and no more. He is also entitled to a declaration that he is entitled to prove against the estate of Winby, for the other half of his charge—viz., £69 10s.—subject to any objection which may hereafter be made to such proof by the trustee. Messrs. Ridley & Co. have, in my judgment, in good faith paid their half of the costs to McNay, and are not liable to pay any more.

Holt is entitled to prove against the estate of Winby for his costs—viz., £94 10s., and has no claim against Messrs. Ridley & Co.

As to McNay, why he ever was made a defendant has not been satisfactorily explained to me. I quite understand why he was made a plaintiff, but when he wished to take no part in the litigation, or to claim at all, why he should have been made a defendant I do not understand. Anyhow he was, but no relief was claimed against him in the statement of claim. He, however, need not have appeared at the trial at all.

I give judgment for the plaintiff Crampton for £69 10s. against Ridley & Co. with costs, together with a declaration of right of proof for £69 10s. with costs against Winby's estate. I declare the plaintiff Holt is entitled to prove, subject to all just exceptions, for the amount of £94 10s. with costs against the estate of Winby. I dismiss McNay from the suit without costs on either side. If either party desire these fees to be taxed they may do so.

Q. B. Div. (Stephen and Charles, JJ.) Nov. 3.

Deutsche Springstoff Actien Gesellschaft v. Briscoe. (a.)

Arbitration—Revocation of submission—General agreement to refer—Particular arbitrators—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 11.

An arbitration clause provided that any disputes which should arise between the parties should be referred to two arbitrators (naming them). A dispute having arisen, the defendant desired to proceed to arbitration; the plaintiffs nevertheless commenced an action against the defendant, and revoked their submission.

Held, that the defendant was not entitled to have the action stayed under section 11 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, because, the submission having been revoked, there was no subsisting agreement to refer capable of being carried into effect.

Appeal from Pollock, B., at chambers.

The plaintiffs (a German firm) employed the defendant as their agent in this country, under an agreement in writing. They claimed certain moneys from the defendant under this agreement. The defendant gave notice to the plaintiffs that he should proceed to arbitration under clause 14 of the agreement. The plaintiffs nevertheless issued their writ in this action. The defendant having taken out a summons to stay proceedings under section 11 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, the plaintiffs revoked the submission to the arbitrators who were named in the agreement.

The 14th clause of the agreement was:—"If any dispute, question, difference, or controversy shall arise between the parties hereto, or their respective successors, executors, or administrators, touching this agreement, or any clause, matter, or thing herein contained, or the construction hereof, or anything to be done under any of the clauses herein contained, or any matter in any way connected with this agreement, or the operation thereof, or the agreement herein contained, or the respective rights, duties, or liabilities of either party in connection with the premises, then and in every such case the matter in difference shall be referred to the said S. B. Smith and A. F. Warr, or their umpire, pursuant to, and so as with regard to, the mode and consequence of the reference, and in all other respects to conform to the provisions in that behalf contained in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, or any then subsisting statutory modification thereof, and such arbitrators or their umpire shall have power to award and determine how and by whom the costs of the reference are to be paid."

A. J. Ashton, for the defendant.—This is a general agreement to refer, and it cannot be revoked: Piercy v. Young, 28 W. R. 845, 14 Ch. D. 200. The fact that two particular arbitrators are named in the agreement makes no difference. The plaintiffs doubtless may revoke the submission to the particular arbitrators; but the general agreement to refer remains untouched, and cannot be revoked by virtue of section 11 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854.

He cited Parkes v. Smith, 15 Q. B. 297; Fraser v. Ehrensperger, 12 Q. B. D. 310; and Randell v. Thompson, 24 W. R. 665, 1 Q. B. D. 748.

Bremner, for the plaintiffs.—When arbitrators are named, as in this agreement, the agreement ceases to be a general agreement to refer, and, therefore, it can be revoked. In re Rouse and Meier, 19 W. R. 438, 6 C. P. 212, Piercy v. Young, and Fraser v. Ehrensperger do not apply here, because in those cases no arbitrator was named. Here there is no "agreement capable of being carried into effect" within the judgment of Mellish, L.J., in Randell v. Thompson, and as laid down in Mills v. Bailey, 11 W. R. 598, 2 H. & C. 36. Therefore, section 11 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, does not apply.

A. J. Ashton replied.

Stephen, J.—I am of opinion that some passages of the judgments in Randell v. Thompson indicate the right principles upon which we ought to decide this case. The Court of Appeal there held that, in order to make the provisions of section 11 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, apply, there must be a subsisting agreement to refer capable of being enforced. It is true that the agreement to refer in this case is certainly general from one point of view, but it is not general with respect to the appointment of arbitrators. If nothing further had happened there was a submission of the dispute to the two particular arbitrators named in the agreement. Now that submission could be, and has been, revoked. It has been argued with much ingenuity on behalf of the defendant that he could then fall back upon the agreement, as being a general subsisting agreement to refer independently of the named arbitrators, and that this general agreement could not be revoked by the plaintiffs. This does not seem to be a very reasonable view. I think the true answer is that there is a general subsisting agreement to refer all matters in difference, and that the differences, when and as they arise, are to be referred to the named arbitrators. But the submission to those arbitrators being revocable, and having been revoked with respect to this particular dispute, there is no subsisting agreement to refer capable of being enforced. I do not say that a reference may not be enforced under the crude agreement (the submission now having been revoked) with respect to future disputes, but my decision is only with respect to the particular dispute before us.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave and A. L. Smith, JJ.) Dec. 6.

Ex parte BAKER.
In re BAKER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Petition by creditor—Purchase of debt—Motive—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 4, 6.

It is not an abuse of the process of the Bankruptcy Court for one creditor, whose debt may be insufficient to found bankruptcy proceedings, to purchase the debt of another creditor in order to found such proceedings bonâ fide for the purpose of preserving the estate of the debtor and of having it administered according to the bankruptcy laws.

Appeal from an order of the registrar of the Barnstaple County Court making a receiving order.

The debtor, Baker, was a member, and also acted as assistant secretary, of a death club, his duties being to receive sums collected from the members and to keep the accounts, and also to pay claims which had accrued due to persons interested under the rules of the club.

In December, 1886, the yearly account was carried in by the debtor, which showed the payment of several claims, but on the receipts being asked for it was discovered that in six cases appearing on the account payment had not been made. The debtor ultimately took this liability upon himself, and on the 29th of March, 1887, he gave to two out of the six persons, named respectively Hunt and Marsh, the sum of £50 and a promissory note for £45 each.

In June, 1887, at a meeting of the committee of the club, a deficiency was discovered in the cash box to the extent of £119, for which the debtor also assumed the responsibility, and promised that matters should be put straight within a month.

The debtor did not attend a meeting held on the 5th of July, 1887, when the discovery was made that a further sum of £119 was deficient, which, however, he subsequently promised to make good, but on the same day he left his home and went, as he alleged, to Cardiff.

On the 12th of July, 1887, with the sanction of a resolution of the club committee, Hunt purchased from Marsh his bill of £45 for the sum of £15, and on the 15th of July Hunt presented a petition against the debtor, the act of bankruptcy alleged being that he departed from his dwelling-house with intent to defeat or delay his creditors within section 4, sub-section 1 (d), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

On the 16th of July an interim receiver was appointed and a warrant obtained for the debtor's arrest, upon which he was taken at Barnstaple on the 21st of July, but subsequently discharged. Upon the hearing of the petition, however, a receiving order was made by the county court registrar, and from that order the debtor now appealed, it being contended on his behalf—(1) that no act of bankruptcy had been committed, and (2) that the petition was an abuse of the process of the court.

The case raised the question whether the purchase by one creditor, whose debt is insufficient to found bankruptcy proceedings, of the debt of another for the purpose of founding such proceedings is an abuse of the process of the Bankruptcy Court.

E. Cooper Willis, Q.C., and Herbert Reed, for the debtor.—There was no act of bankruptcy committed. Moreover, the debt was bought up after the alleged act of bankruptcy for the purpose of making the debtor a bankrupt in order to punish him in relation to the club transactions. There was no liability on the debtor for this money; and, further, if a person buys a debt with the object that he may make a man a bankrupt the court will not uphold it. Two persons may petition; but if one will not join, the other may not buy the debt in order to enable himself to petition. The purchase of a debt for the purpose of founding bankruptcy proceedings will not be allowed.

They referred to Ex parte Griffin, In re Adams, 28 W. R. 208, 12 Ch. D. 480; Ex parte Harper, In re Pooley, 30 W. R. 650, 20 Ch. D. 685; Ex parte Gratton, 2 M. D. & De. G. 401.

Thorne, for the petitioning creditor, was not called upon.

CAVE, J., after reviewing the evidence, said: I am of opinion, therefore, that the debtor did depart from his house with intent to defeat or delay his creditors. Then, as to the second point, the debtor had disappeared no one knew where, and thereupon it was desired to take steps to obtain repayment of these moneys. Hunt, who was a creditor for £45, desired to take proceedings in bankruptcy, but his debt was not sufficient, and he went to Marsh and bought Marsh's debt for £15. It is said that that is an abuse of the process of the court, and we have been referred to three cases. Now it was first said that to buy a debt under any circumstances in order to found a bankruptcy petition on it is an abuse of the process of the court. There appears to be no case, however, where that is laid down—where the mere buying of a debt in order to found a petition is an abuse. What was said in the case of Ex parte Griffin, In re Adams, was that when the court sees that a bankruptcy petition is presented, not with the bonâ fide view of obtaining an adjudication, but for a collateral purpose, and with the view of putting pressure on the debtor, it will refuse to make an adjudication. In that case the registrar reported that the debt had been acquired simply and solely to enable the person acquiring it to enforce his personal purposes against the debtor by means of the intimidation of proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court; the purpose being to stifle proceedings on the part of the debtor; and the registrar held that he was bound to dismiss the petition as being wholly outside the legitimate purposes of bankruptcy, as based upon proceedings altogether illegal, inequitable, vexatious, and oppressive. It is obvious that that case differs totally from the present one. The object was not to wind up the affairs of the debtor in bankruptcy at all. So also in Ex parte Harper, In re Pooley, it was held that to purchase a debt for the purpose of making the debtor a bankrupt with the view, not of recovering the debt, but of putting pressure upon him for a collateral object or of injurying him in some way, is an abuse of the bankruptcy law, and, undoubtedly, in that case the late Master of the Rolls said: "I must take it then that Mr. Harper knew that the object of buying up the debt was not the recovery of the debt, but to make the debtor a rn, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is nce that the debt was due from Baker to the also that he was absent with intent to defeat his creditors. Then we come to the question ankruptcy proceedings can be founded on a ht to found them. It is shown that Hunt bill for £15 in order to take bankruptcy ; and it was argued that, even if it was honestly, it was an abuse. Now let us he cases. In Ex parte Gratton the fiat was "for a wholly illegitimate purpose." In Ex a, In re Adams, the proceedings were taken, tribute the debtor's property, but to make up a just debt due to him, and Cotton, L.J., most accurate judge, said: "The proceedings ptcy were not taken to obtain payment of the the debt was purchased in order to take the gs in bankruptcy." The words are, "the gs," and there is nothing to show that, if the gs had been otherwise than oppressive, it would buse. Then, in Ex parte Harper, In re Pooley, L.J., said: "It appears to me very clear that gross abuse of the bankruptcy laws for persons debts which are due by other people for no other e than that of enabling them to carry the choice trustee in bankruptcy or to place anybody in a on of control with reference to the bankrupt's affairs." But in the present case all the elements of illegitimacy are wanting, and I do not think any case which has been cited can be held to be an authority for the proposition that a debt cannot be bought for the legitimate purpose of distributing the assets.

Practice—Writ of summons for service within jurisdiction directed to foreign corporation without address set aside as irregular—Ord. 2, r. 3; ord. 9, r. 8.

A writ of summons for service within the jurisdiction directed to a foreign corporation, but not containing any address, either of the corporation or of one of the officers of the corporation upon whom the writ may be served, under ord. 9, r. 8, will, on application of any person served with such writ, be set aside as irregularly issued.

This was a motion on behalf of the Netherlands American Steam Navigation Co., a Dutch company carrying on business at Rotterdam, in the Kingdom of Holland, to set aside the service of the writ of summons in an action of damage in personam instituted on behalf of the owners of the British steamship Rosa Mary against the said company for the recovery of the damages sustained by The Rosa Mary on the 19th of November last, when The W. A. Scholten, a steamship belonging to that company, came into collision with The Rosa Mary in the English channel off Dover without the territorial jurisdiction of the court. The writ of summons, the service of which was sought to be set aside, was in accordance with the form prescribed by ord. 2, r. 5, of the Supreme Court Rules of 1883 as the general form for writs of summons in actions in personam issued out of the Central Office for service within the jurisdiction, with this exception, that the spaces in that form intended for the address and county of the defendant were neither filled up with the address where the Netherlands American Steam Navigation Co. carried on business in Holland, nor with any other address. It appeared, from an affidavit in support of the motion, that the Netherlands American Steam Navigation Co. had no office or place of business in England, but that the writ of summons had been served within the jurisdiction on the managing director of the company, who was domiciled and ordinarily resided abroad, but was, at the time of the service, temporarily in this country. It also appeared that no application as to the issue of the writ had been made to the judge or to the Admiralty Registrar, the writ having been taken out in the Central Office of the Supreme Court in the ordinary course without any order.

The motion was now heard before Butt, J.

Finlay, Q.C., and Stokes, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—The defendant company is a foreign corporation not having an office or place of business within the jurisdiction, and the present Rules of Court do not contemplate any writ of summons being issued against such a foreign corporation other than a writ notice of which is intended to be given without the jurisdiction, and which must be in form 5 or form 6 of the forms of writs of summons in Appendix A, part 1, to the present Rules, and cannot be issued without the leave of a judge: Sedwick v. Yedras Mining Co., W. N., 1887, p. 94. The writ issued in this case is evidently intended to be in the form of writ prescribed for service within the jurisdiction: Rules of Court, 1883, Appendix A, part 1, forms 1, 2; and was issued without the leave of a judge or the Admiralty Registrar, and it is invalid on that ground alone. Further, it deviates from the prescribed form, as it does not contain the address of the defendant. Moreover, even if the writ is a good writ, there has been no valid service of it. Service on a sub-agent is not service on the corporation of which the person served is sub-agent, and service on the manager of a foreign corporation is only good if made within the jurisdiction where the corporation carries on business and is deemed to reside. A corporation cannot be said to reside wherever its officers may happen to be.

Sir W. Phillimore, Q.C., and Stubbs, for the plaintiffs, contrà.—The writ of summons is good in form, has been properly issued, and has been properly served under ord. 9, r. 8, as it was served on the manager of the company when he was within the jurisdiction on the business of the company in connection with the collision in this case. It is true there is no address of the company on the writ, but the address of the defendant on a writ of summons is only required as a means of identification, and is not necessary in cases like the present, where no mistake as to identification could occur. Even if the service of the writ is bad, the rules of procedure now in force ought not to be construed as having deprived the plaintiffs of the right of issuing a writ against a foreign corporation for service within the jurisdiction, and thereby keeping his claim alive by renewing the writ as occasion may require. A trading corporation like the defendant company might at any time during the pendency of the writ open an office in this country, and then the writ could at once be served: The Helenslea, 7 P. D. 57; and see Westman v. Aktiebolaget Ekmans Mekaniska Snickare Fabrik, 1 Ex. D. 240, where Bramwell, B. (now Lord Bramwell), said:—"I am of opinion that we ought not to set aside the order permitting the issue of this writ, because a foreign corporation is suable in this country, and so a writ may lie against it. Suppose, for example, the company should establish an office in England next year, the writ might be kept alive and made available against it so as to defeat what might otherwise be a successful plea of the Statute of Limitations." See also Palmer v. Gould's Manufacturing Co., W. N., 1884, p. 63. The forms appended to the Rules of Court are merely intended for the guidance of the practitioner in ordinary cases.

Butt, J.—The question in this case is whether the writ of summons should be set aside. If the writ ought to be set aside, nothing need be said as to whether service of it was bad or good. I have caused inquiries to be made at the Central Office, and in answer to these inquiries I am told that it is a most clear rule there that they will not, without the leave of the judge, issue a writ against a defendant whose address on the writ is a foreign one. I am further told that the clerk who sealed this writ took part of the name of the defendant for the address, and did not notice that there was no address, and that he would not have issued the writ if he had noticed the omission. By the form prescribed for use in actions in personam by the Rules of the Supreme Court now in force, the address of the defendant, as well as the name of the defendant, is required to be inserted in the writ. I am perfectly aware that the writ in this case is a writ for service within the jurisdiction, but it is clear that it would not have been sealed if the clerk whose duty it was to seal it if it was a proper writ and had been properly filled up had observed that there was no address of the defendant inserted in it, or had found that the proper addres the defendant company had been inserted in it, and t that address was an address out of the jurisdiction. seems to me quite clear that in this case the addres the defendant company was purposely left out of t writ, and I certainly shall not allow the writ to rem This being my decision, it is not necessary for me discuss the further question whether there has or not been a good service of the writ. The party appl for the issue of this writ has contravened the r which are laid down as to what is required to be c tained in a writ of summons. He has contravened t rules purposely, and I am clearly of opinion that writ has issued irregularly. Consequently, the itself must be set aside.

Will—Construction—Gift of property at R.'s bank—Share certificates.

A testator who had a cash balance and also share certificates, some of which were inscribed in his name, and others payable to bearer at R.'s bank, made a bequest of "half my property at R.'s bank."

Held, that half of the cash balance and also half of the shares passed under the bequest.

Decision of Chitty, J. (reported ante, p. 179, 36 Ch. D. 473), reversed.

Appeal from a decision of Chitty, J., reported ante, p. 179, 36 Ch. D. 473.

Horatio Prater, M.D., a domiciled Englishman, who died in 1885, by his will, dated the 25th of October, 1875, gave £500 to the Société Protectrice des Animaux, and also "half my property at Rothschild's bank," and the remaining half of his property to be divided between two public libraries in Paris—namely, the Mazarin and the library in the Rue Richelieu.

At the time of the testator's death there was a balance of about £320 in English money standing to his account at Rothschild's bank. There were also deposited in his name at the same bank certain shares in the Paris, Lyons, and Mediterranean Railway Co. These shares were actions au porteur (payable to bearer) and actions nominatives (shares inscribed in the testator's name) of the value of about £7,000. The latter shares show on their face the name of the owner, and pass by what is equivalent to transfer and registration, but payment may be obtained by the bearer.

On a summons taken out for the purpose of obtaining a decision whether these shares passed by the gift of "my property at Rothschild's Bank," Chitty, J., held that only the cash balance passed.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—We are called upon to construe this instrument, such as it is, and, speaking for myself, I certainly do not mean to lay down any general canon of construction applicable to cases of this nature, because I do not believe it possible to give any abstract meaning to words of this description. The word "property" is as wide as anything can be. But here the words are "property at Rothschild's bank." If those words are taken in their strict and proper signification there was nothing to answer to them, for there was no property at the bank. I do not think that the cases which show that debts due from persons in a particular district are included in the words "property of any kind or description whatsoever" in that district are applicable to this case, because here the words are used by the testator as part of the description of the property disposed of, and he makes it part of the description of the property that it is property at the bank. Mr. Romer has, I think, very candidly admitted that the description is inaccurate, and did not strictly apply, either to the titles to these shares in different commercial adventures or to the balance which the bankers owed to their customer. If, therefore, it is once conceded that the words were intended to operate on something, and to give something to the object of the testator's bounty, we must see what the testator intended, and consider what an ordinary testator, not possessed of special legal knowledge, using language with reference to this particular subject-matter, must be intended to mean by the use of these words. Chitty, J., says, and in that I agree with him, that you must take the ordinary and popular meaning of the words to be found in the instrument.

Now what is the ordinary and popular meaning of these words? Did anybody ever hear a man denote his cash balance by such a phrase as "my property at my bankers"? I should say, if a distinction were to be taken, that if a man had at his bankers what we popularly call a cash balance, and the bank had possession of documents of title belonging to him, he would be more likely to refer by that expression to those documents of title than to his cash balance. I am unable, however, to draw such a distinction. The testator having, in the earlier part of his will, given pecuniary legacies, gives to this society a legacy of £500, "also half of," not my money, not my cash balance, but "half of my property at Rothschild's Bank." On the most ordinary principles of construction there is nothing to cut down the wide, general term "property," and on that ground, with the additional enforcement arising from the fact that in the preceding part of the will he had words before him which point to mere money as distinguished from property, I come to the conclusion that when he said "property at Rothschild's Bank" he meant everything belonging to him with which the bank was concerned. I am unable to derive any assistance from any of the circumstances outside the will itself. I do not see anything in the circumstances which existed at the time of the making of the will, as distinguished from those existing at the time of the death, to throw any light on the meaning of the testator. I am therefore remitted to the words in the will, and, putting myself as well as I can in the position of the testator, I think that, by the language which he used, he intended to describe whatever the bank had of his, and which, on his demand, they would have been bound to give up.

I am therefore unable to concur with the learned judge in the construction he has put upon these words, and I think his judgment must be reversed.

COTTON, L.J.—What we have to decide is, what is the true construction of a gift of "also half of my property at Rothschild's Bank" in the testator's will following this: "I give to the Société Protectrice des Animaux the sum of £500." Chitty, J., has come to the conclusion that "half of the property" only meant half of the balance appearing due to the testator on his account with his bankers. I am unable to agree with that conclusion. It is true that in the previous part of his will he speaks of giving "the following pecuniary legacies," but I think that means the legacies he has expressed by sums of money. He gives to this society a legacy which he expresses in a sum of money, £500. But then he gives something which he expresses in different language. At the time of making his will, and at the time of his death, there was, in my opinion, nothing which would properly come within the description "of my property at Rothschild's Bank, Rue Lafitte." But at both times he had a balance due to him from these bankers, and he was in the habit of leaving with them the certificates of certain shares. Some of them were shares which passed by mere delivery of the certificates, and with regard to the others, as I understand the last evidence read to us, although they are nominatives, yet if anyone was entitled to have the certificates, then, on production of those certificates, his name would be inscribed as the owner of the shares instead of the name of the person to whom the nominative certificates were granted. Now, there being nothing to answer strictly the description of "property at my bankers," because I think that neither the balance due by the bankers nor the certificates of these shares could strictly or properly be described as property at his bankers, we must consider what the testator is to be taken to have meant. Property at his bankers is not an expression which a person would use to describe the balance at his bankers, he would describe it as money at his bankers. Here we have "property." Property is a word of the very largest description, and, looking at this will, I see nothing to cut it down to money so as to make it pass only the banker's balance. Though people would not ordinarily describe a cash balance at their bankers as property at their bankers, yet they might do so, but why may not the testator so describe these shares, which are not really property at his bankers, but are so in this sense, that the certificates, without which the title to these shares cannot be asserted, are in the hands of the bankers. As to the shares which are not nominative, the certificates would give the holders of them a right to the shares. As regards the other shares, it appears that whoever had a title to the certificates would be entitled to have the shares put into his name and receive the dividends. The shares might then very well be popularly spoken of as property at his bankers.

It is said that authority is against us. No doubt there are a great many cases which lay down that choses in action cannot be referred to as of any particular locality. Again, there are cases where a gift of property in any particular locality has been held to include debts due from persons in that locality. I think these latter cases go upon this—that there was in the wills a sufficient indication of intention to include, under the description of property in a particular place, that which really cannot have any locality. Those cases, in my opinion, show that the rule that choses in action have no locality, must not deter us from holding them to be included in a gift of property in a particular locality if we come to the conclusion that the intention of the testator was to include them.

Mr. Romer referred to the case of Fleming v. Brook, decided on the authority of Moore v. Moore. But in Moore v. Moore the words were "goods and chattels," and Lord Redesdale said that "goods and chattels did not properly apply to notes, bills of exchange, or bonds, and there was not anything in the context to give a more enlarged meaning to those words." I do not think that this case of Moore v. Moore has the effect which Lord Redesdale, according to the report, seems to have attributed to it. I do not at all dissent from, or desire to say that we should overrule, if we could, any of these decisions which have been quoted to us; but, having regard to the facts existing at the time when the testator made his will, I have come clearly to the conclusion that what he intended was to give, not only half the balance at his bankers, but also half the shares the certificates of which were at his bankers. It would be a very different thing if they were title deeds of real estate. I do not think that anyone would describe an estate in Suffolk, the title deeds of which were at his bankers, as a property at his bankers. There is a wide difference between real estate, having a particular locality, and shares, which may, I think, be described, by a person not having any great legal knowledge, as in the place where the certificates are. In my opinion we ought to say the bequest in question includes, not only half the balance due from the bankers, but also half the shares the certificates of which were at the bankers at the testator's death.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and if it were not for the usual practice of this court when it differs from the learned judge who has decided the case in the tribunal of first instance to pronounce severally our views, I should say nothing, but leave the matter upon the language, much better than my own, which has already been used. But out of respect to the learned judge I add my own individual conclusion in my own way.

The question we have to decide is the meaning to be given in this will to the words, "my property at Rothschild's bank." We have been pressed with a great many cases of gifts of property described as situate in or connected with a particular locality, from which cases the learned counsel for the respondents suppose that some principle can be deduced which ought to lead us to support the judgment of Chitty, J. With regard to all such cases, it seems to me to be important to remember that they must all be decisions upon the language of particular wills. The term property at a bank, or property situate locally at any other place than a bank, is not a language which has received, or is capable of receiving, a stereotyped meaning which is to last for all time and to apply to every will by whomsoever made, but is an expression which must receive light or colour from one or other of two sources—the context, and the circumstances of the testator. Though ninety-nine out of one hundred cases in which similar words have been used may have been decided in the same way, they are no authority for the hundredth case if the circumstances and the context in the hundredth case are such as to be sufficient to make a difference in the meaning of the words. As regards the context of the present will, as the Lord Chancellor has pointed out, we find that, in the pecuniary legacies strictly so called, when money is given, money is spoken of, and when for the first and only time a gift will the testator passes to the larger term "property," there is nothing in the context which should lead us to suppose he may not have intended a distinction between the larger and the narrower term.

Then as to the circumstances of this case. The testator had at this bank a money balance. He had in the bank the certificates of two classes of actual shares in commercial undertakings in France, the distinction between which classes may, I think, be neglected for all purposes of this case. With regard to one of them the effective value of the documents is gone according to French law, so that the person who has them possesses, at all events, something which would be of considerable value in enforcing his right to the shares, and, in fact, the documents represent, according to French law, nearly as much as in popular language the right to the shares. The testator, then, uses the words "my property at Rothschild's bank." If we were to apply the strictest and narrowest construction, those words, nothing that the testator possessed in connection with the bank, neither his money balance in their hands nor these shares, can properly be described as property at the bank. But to say that the testator had nothing at all at the bank would be to render the bequest insensible. We must, therefore, search and find, if we can, some popular, though less accurate, use of the term "property at the bank" which will satisfy the exigencies of the case and render sensible a disposition which was meant to have some legal effect.

Then we find this double class of property, as it may be called, at the bank, the cash balance and the certificates of the shares. Are we to draw a line between the two and say the term "property" meant one thing and not the other? Why so? I agree with what the Lord Chancellor has said, and the Lord Justice has followed him in affirming, that if one were to press on the mind in the direction of severe and strict criticism, the rights which were evidenced by share documents kept in a banker's box at the bank would much more naturally satisfy the popular description of "property at the bank" than even the cash balance. But certainly I can see no reason for excluding the shares, and including the cash balance, which is the judgment of the court below. For the reasons given by the Lord Chancellor it seems to me that we are driven to put a popular construction on words which, under other circumstances and with a different context, might well receive a different construction.

I will only add that in Stuart v. Marquis of Bute, which was relied on in the court below, there were other matters which would satisfy the words of the will without including choses in action, and in Moore v. Moore, as has been pointed out, the court had to interpret the words "goods and chattels," and the only decision in that case was that a bond in the house did not come within the description of goods or chattels in that house. I agree with the Lord Chancellor and Cotton, L.J., that this decision must be reversed.

Decision of Bristowe, V.C., affirmed.

Appeal from Bristowe, Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

By a mortgage deed executed in August, 1886, the mortgagor, "as beneficial owner," granted and conveyed to the mortgagee "all that piece of land, with the dwelling-house and buildings thereon erected, situate," [illegible] "to hold the same unto and to the use of the mortgagee in fee simple," subject to a proviso for reconveyance on payment of the mortgage-money, with interest, on the 7th of February, 1887. And it was thereby agreed and declared "that the powers contained in section 19 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, shall be exercisable at any time after the 7th of February, 1887, without its being necessary to serve the notice required by section 20 of the same Act." There was on the land some fixed "trade machinery" which was not in any way mentioned or referred to in the deed. This action was brought for the administration of the estate of the deceased mortgagor, and it sought a declaration that the mortgage was a bill of sale, and was bad as not having been registered under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and that the property comprised in the mortgage security should be handed over to the receiver in the action.

Bristowe, V.C., held that the mortgage was not a bill of sale, and was valid in all respects.

The receiver appealed.

The appeal was first argued on January 12, 1888, before Cotton, Bowen, and Fry, L.JJ., and it was then contended that, by reason of non-compliance with the Bills of Sale Acts, the mortgage, because it operated to pass the "trade machinery" to the mortgagee, was void altogether. The appeal was directed to stand over for re-argument for the purpose of considering the effect on the mortgage of the power of sale given by section 19 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. The appeal was re-argued on March 8 before the Court of Appeal as then constituted; but, owing to the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Burdett, Ex parte Byrne, ante, p. 345, 20 Q. B. D. 310, it was not contended on the re-argument that the mortgage instrument was altogether bad, but it was contended that the deed was, at any rate, void so far as it operated to pass the "trade machinery" to the mortgagee. Section 19 of the Conveyancing Act provides that a mortgagee by deed shall, by virtue of the Act, have certain powers "to the same extent as if they had been in terms conferred by the mortgage deed, but no further" (inter alia)—"a power, when the mortgage-money has become due, to sell the mortgaged property, or any part thereof, and either together or in lots."

Section 6, sub-section (2), of the Conveyancing Act provides that "A conveyance of land having houses or other buildings thereon shall be deemed to include, and shall, by virtue of this Act, operate to convey, with the land, houses, or other buildings, all outhouses, erections, fixtures, &c., . . . appertaining or reputed to appertain to the land, houses, or other buildings conveyed, or any of them, or any part thereof. . . ."

The sections of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, so far as material to the case, are as follows:—

Section 3.—"This Act shall apply to every bill of sale . . . whereby the holder or grantee has power, with or without notice, and either immediately or at any future time, to seize or take possession of any personal chattels comprised in or made subject to such bill of sale."

Section 4.—"The expression 'bill of sale' shall include bills of sale, assignments, transfers, . . . and other assurances of personal chattels, and also . . . licences to take possession of personal chattels as a security for any debt. . . . The expression 'personal chattels' shall mean goods, furniture, . . . and (when separately assigned or charged) fixtures, . . . but shall not include . . . fixtures (except trade machinery as hereinafter defined) when assigned together with a freehold or leasehold interest in any land or building to which they are affixed. . . ."

Section 5.—". . . Trade machinery shall for the purposes of this Act be deemed to be personal chattels, and any mode of disposition of trade machinery by the owner thereof which would be a bill of sale as to any other personal chattels shall be deemed to be a bill of sale within the meaning of this Act. . . .

Section 7.—No fixtures . . . shall be deemed under this Act to be separately assigned or charged by reason only that they are assigned by separate words or that power is given to sever them from the land or building to which they are affixed . . . without otherwise taking possession of or dealing with such land or building if by the same instrument any freehold or leasehold interest in the land or building to which such fixtures are affixed . . . is also conveyed or assigned to the same person or persons."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Arkle, for the appellants.

French, Q.C., and Maberley, for the respondents.

The arguments appear sufficiently from the judgments, where also the cases relied on are dealt with.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from the Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine of Lancaster, and the appeal asks for a declaration that this instrument of mortgage was a bill of sale, and that the receiver in the action should account for the proceeds of certain chattels which he had disposed of, on the ground that the bill of sale as regards them was bad. We have had the case twice argued, for reasons I will presently mention. The mortgage in question was a mortgage of freehold property on which there happened to be some trade machinery, but the mortgage was a mortgage in fee simple on the face of it—a mortgage of the lands and buildings on the lands. The mortgage does mention the buildings, though that of course was unnecessary, because a mortgage of land would carry all buildings and fixtures on the land. There is no power of sale actually inserted in the instrument, but it introduces the power of sale given in the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy contended on behalf of the appellants that the instrument was a bill of sale under the Act of 1878, and was altogether bad by reason of the requisitions of the Bills of Sale Acts not being complied with. Since the case was first argued there has been a decision of the Court of Appeal that where an instrument assigned certain trade machinery which would, under the Act of 1878, be considered personal chattels, and also certain other fixtures which did not come within the Act of 1878, if the instrument was bad as a bill of sale of the trade machinery which the Act made chattels, it was bad only as regards that, and not bad altogether. Therefore, when the present case was re-argued before us the contention, that if this was a bill of sale within the meaning of the Act of 1878 the instrument was bad altogether, was given up, and it was only contended that the instrument must be treated as void as regards the trade machinery which the Act declared to be personal chattels. That is the question we have to consider. [The Lord Justice then read sections 3, 4, and 5 of the Act of 1878, and continued:—] Section 5 causes the difficulty in this case, and it arises from the fact of the Act of Parliament saying that a thing is to be deemed to be that which in fact it is not. I think the true interpretation of the latter part of section 5 was that put on it by Mr. Cozens-Hardy—viz., that it intended only to exclude those modes of disposition of trade machinery declared by the Act to be personal chattels, which would be excluded by the previous definition of the expression "bill of sale," and which would not operate as a bill of sale as to any other personal chattels under the Act. Any instrument which disposes of trade machinery in the way indicated by the Act will operate as a bill of sale if it would have operated as a bill of sale as regards other personal chattels. It is said that this instrument does operate as an assignment of personal chattels; but it in no way assigns personal chattels, and it only assigns this trade machinery, which the Act says is personal chattels, by a conveyance of the land.

Then we come to section 7, which undoubtedly does make a broad distinction (indicated also in section 4) between trade machinery, as a particular class of fixtures, and fixtures other than trade machinery. [The Lord Justice read section 7, and continued:—] I think the real effect of this section is to exclude from the operation of the decisions in Ex parte Daglish, 21 W. R. 893, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 1072, and Ex parte Barclay, 22 W. R. 608, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 576, those trade fixtures which are not trade machinery, and to bring them within the protection given by section 7. I do not think, however, that section 7 decides how we ought to deal with the question arising on this conveyance of land with respect to the trade machinery that is upon the land.

Can this instrument be considered, within the meaning of the Act of 1878, as an assurance of personal chattels, or as an authority to take possession of personal chattels, or can it be considered that by this instrument the mortgagee has power, either with or without notice, to take possession of any personal chattels comprised in or made subject to such bill of sale, within the words of section 3? On both points I am against the appellants. This instrument is a conveyance of land, and although it does give a right to all fixtures on the land, including this trade machinery, yet it does so, not as an assurance of that trade machinery or of those things which the Act says are to be considered as personal chattels, but merely as conveying and assigning all the land and everything so fixed to the freehold as to be passed by a conveyance of the land. It does not in my opinion enable the mortgagee to seize or take possession of these personal chattels within section 3. It enables the mortgagee to take possession of the land and thereby to get possession of the trade machinery as part of the land, but in no other way. In my opinion it would be wrong to hold that this is such an instrument as is pointed at and hit by the Bills of Sale Act. In this mortgage the mortgagee has no right to sever these fixtures from the land. He could only do so if so empowered by the terms of the power of sale, and here, though the smithy shop and yard are referred to, neither the house nor the workshop nor the machinery are in any way dealt with as anything to be severed, or as capable of being severed from the freehold to which they are affixed. Until recent legislation a mortgagee, under the ordinary power of sale, could not sell minerals—any more than trees could—separate from the fee; and in my opinion a mortgagee could give a good title, to a purchaser from him, to fixtures which he severed from the land—independently and in the absence of a power given to him, a fair construction of the power of sale to do so. If sold, the transaction would operate only as a transfer of a redeemable security. He has, therefore, no power to treat fixtures as severable from the land under the mere ordinary power to sell contained in every mortgage.

We had this case re-argued because it occurred to a member of the court that possibly the power of sale given by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, might be treated as an authority given to sever the fixtures for the purposes of sale, and might, therefore, bring the case within the principle of Ex parte Daglish, and also within what is the true construction of the present Act. The words which raised the doubt are that there is a power "when the mortgage money becomes due to sell the mortgaged property or any part thereof either together or in lots," and it was suggested that that might give power to sever the machinery and sell it separately from the land. In my opinion that is not so. [The Lord Justice referred to the subject-matter of the mortgage, and continued:—] Mr. French admitted that if the mortgage consisted of a house this power might enable the mortgagee to sell the flats. I think he made an admission too much against himself. In my opinion the power of sale does not enable the mortgagee to break up the state of things existing at the time of the mortgage, and does not enable him to sell this machinery as severed from the land. It would not enable him to sell the minerals as separated from the remainder of the fee. In my opinion it might fairly be construed thus: that though what is conveyed is a piece of land with a yard and a workshop, he might break that up into lots, if advisable so to do, and sell the house separately.

Then it was urged by Mr. Cozens-Hardy that, having regard to section 6, sub-section (2), of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, this instrument ought to be construed and dealt with as if it had expressed on its face everything that passed by a conveyance of the land—viz., the house, the workshop, the yard, and trade machinery, which is a fixture upon the yard. It is true that this Act does, in order to prevent the consequences arising from the use of unnecessary words, say that the one conveyance of land shall include all these things which are sometimes expressed by conveyancers, but which really pass by the conveyance of the land. But, although that is the effect given by the Act as a matter of construction to a mere conveyance of land where these words are not put in, the effect may be different where the words are put in, because then a power to sell the mortgaged property or any part thereof might be said to mean that some of this trade machinery might be sold. But, as a matter of construction, when these words are not used it would be wrong to say that the terms of this power of sale authorize the mortgagee to do that which without the power of sale he could not do —viz., to break up that which was conveyed to him and to sell the trade machinery separately from the land to which it was affixed, and by the conveyance of which land it passed to the mortgagee.

That is my opinion of the case on the mere construction of the Acts and the mortgage, independently of authority. I think, however, that the decisions in Ex parte Daglish and Ex parte Barclay, on the previous Bills of Sale Act (1854), which is not, it is true, quite in the same terms, have a considerable bearing on the true construction of the power of sale and on the question whether this instrument ought to be considered a bill of sale within the definition in section 4 of the Act of 1878, or within section 3 of that Act. [The Lord Justice read section 7 of the Act of 1854, and continued:—] The definition of personal chattels in the Act of 1854 included all fixtures; the definition in the Act of 1878 does not include all fixtures, but does include trade machinery, which is what we are now dealing with. In Ex parte Daglish there was a mortgage with a power of sale in express terms authorizing the mortgagee to sell, as separate from the land, the fixtures that were on the land. The Lords Justices, in effect, said, 'This may not be an assignment of fixtures so as in that way to make this a bill of sale within the Act of 1854, but the power of sale does enable the mortgagee to take possession of and seize them as severed from the land, and therefore it comes within the definition of bill of sale, and we must apply the law to it.' In Ex parte Barclay there was a mortgage of land with fixtures on it, and a power to sell the property or any part thereof, and there both James and Mellish, L.JJ., held that that was not a bill of sale; they said that, though the instrument passed the chattels—passed what the Act declared to be chattels—as annexed to, and as part of, the land demised, it was not an assignment of chattels within the meaning of the Act, and that the power of sale did not authorize the mortgagee to deal with the chattels under the Act as separate from the freehold. [The Lord Justice read passages from the judgments of James and Mellish, L.JJ., and continued:—] That case, in my opinion, lays down this principle, that where there is a mere conveyance of land, which conveyance of itself gives to the mortgagee the right to all the fixtures, including trade machinery, on the land, it is not to be considered as an assurance of personal chattels (notwithstanding that the Act makes the fixtures personal chattels) so as to come within the description of a bill of sale within the Act and require registration. It was said that Ex parte Barclay turned on the fact that the mortgage was a mortgage merely by way of demise. But that contention cannot hold good. No doubt the position of a mere tenant for a term of years is different from that of an owner in fee as regards trade fixtures; but that has no bearing on the question. I do not decide this case on the authority of the cases I have mentioned, but, having expressed my own opinion as to the true construction of the Act and its effect as regards this instrument, I thought it right not to pass over those cases, because, in my opinion, they bear materially on the question of the construction of this Act and its effect as regards this instrument. The decision of the Vice-Chancellor, therefore, is, in my opinion, right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case is an important one, because it raises the question as to what are the rights of a mortgagee of cotton mills, and mortgages of that kind, where the mortgaged property includes valuable trade machinery, are frequent in the North of England. The practical question we have to decide is this, whether a mortgagee of a mill, under a mortgage framed as this is, can seize, sever, or sell, apart from the land, the mill and the trade machinery on it. If he can, then it strikes me that, as regards trade machinery, it would be impossible to avoid the conclusion that this is a bill of sale, and void because it is not registered. We must look at the mortgage and see what it is. Like other mortgages it consists of two distinct parts, first, there is the assignment or conveyance, subject to the proviso for redemption, and then there is the power of sale. These two parts must be considered separately, for it is necessary for the purposes of the Bills of Sale Acts to ascertain the character of the instrument as a conveyance or assignment. It is impossible for anyone to say with any accurate use of language that a mortgage of land in fee simple is an assurance of personal chattels, and it is not the less impossible because the land in legal acceptation carries with it things that are affixed to it, but which can be removed, and when removed are personal chattels. Trade machinery, which follows the land, does not become personal chattels for the purpose of considering the question whether there is an assignment or conveyance of it. It follows as a portion of the land, not as personal chattels at all, and, looking at this conveyance, one cannot find from first to last anything about personal chattels at all. If all the general words found in section 6, sub-section (2), of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, be imported into it, still I cannot come to the conclusion that this is an assurance of personal chattels in the proper acceptation of the word. It is a mortgage of land, nothing more, nothing less.

Pausing there, I think the point is clearly covered by authority. Precisely the same point was raised and decided by Wood, V.C., in Mather v. Fraser, 4 W. R. 387, 2 K. & J. 536, which was a case under the Act of 1854. The Vice-Chancellor says in his judgment, at p. 558, 2 K. & J.:—"If the fixtures passed in the manner I have described by the mere grant of the land and mills or factories, it was conceded . . . that the question as to the Act for Registration of Bills of Sale does not arise. It does not seem to me possible that it can arise. The Act only says that where a person makes a bill of sale of any part of his chattels, including fixtures, that bill of sale must be registered in a particular way. Here no bill of sale was ever required to be made. A conveyance is made of the freehold, and that conveyance carries fixtures. To hold that an Act of Parliament which says that where bills of sale are used they shall be dealt with in a particular manner, applies to a case where no such thing is used or required to be used, but where the whole of the property passes by the conveyance of the fee simple, would be to give a construction to the Act far beyond anything which was within its purview."

That case has been followed by many others, and, although the language of the Act of 1878 varies considerably from the Act of 1854, it appears to me those observations are just as applicable to the one Act as the other.

Then comes the other point, which is totally distinct—viz., What is the effect of this power of sale? The power of sale possessed by the mortgagee here is that conferred on him by section 19 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. [The Lord Justice read the section, and continued:—] What is the true effect of this power "to sell the mortgaged property or any part thereof"? What is the mortgaged property? It is land. "Any part thereof" is any part of the mortgaged property, which is land, and it appears to me we should be forcing this language if we held that a mortgagee of land could sell, not part of the land, but a chattel as distinct from the land. That would be a forced construction not warranted by the words or by the ordinary practice of conveyancers.

I am fortified in that observation by a precedent in Mr. Davidson's valuable "Conveyancing Precedents," 4th ed., vol. 2, part 2, precedent 6, p. 369. [The Lord Justice read the words of the power of sale in the form referred to, and continued:—] That shows pretty well what the understanding of conveyancers is. The practical result, therefore, in my opinion, is that a mortgagee of land, in a mortgage of this form, has the trade fixtures and so on as part of his security, and he can sell the land wholly or in part, but he cannot sever the fixtures and sell them separately; the power of sale does not reach to that. And if the mortgagee of a mill like this wants to have the power of selling the trade machinery apart from the mortgaged property, he must have a bill of sale and register. The Bills of Sale Acts do not touch this security in any way.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. What we have to decide in the present case is whether or not this mortgage is a bill of sale of the trade machinery. In order to make it a bill of sale of trade machinery, assuming that trade machinery is to be treated as personal chattels under the Act, it must be an assurance of such trade machinery within the Act, or a licence to take possession of them in the sense in which an assurance is defined with regard to other personal chattels, and in the sense in which a licence to take possession is defined. That raises neatly the point whether the mortgagee of premises such as these, under such a general mortgage as this, can seize and sever the trade machinery. The question may be divided into two branches—first, what would be the law supposing there was no power of sale incorporated from the Conveyancing Act, 1881; and, secondly, does section 19 of that Act make any difference in that respect?

On the first point I entertain no doubt that a mortgage of land, apart from a special power of sale, is not a bill of sale of trade machinery on it unless it assures the trade machinery as such, or gives a licence to take possession of it as such. Section 3 of the Act of 1878 indicates the scope and area over which the Act is to prevail, and provides that the Act is to apply to certain bills of sale whereby powers are given to the holder or grantee, but it leaves open for definition the question of what is a bill of sale. To find out that we must look at section 4 of the Act, the language of which has received elucidation from a judgment of this court delivered not long since,* in which we pointed out that the essence of a bill of sale was that it must be an assurance of a personal chattel or a licence to seize or take possession of it within the meaning of section 4. Section 5 really causes the whole difficulty here as to trade machinery, because it enacts that for the purposes of the Act trade machinery is to be deemed that which it is not otherwise, and which no lawyer would recognise that it is—namely, a personal chattel. But I think section 5 intends only to exclude such dispositions as would be excluded by the definition "personal chattels." In other words, assuming that for the purposes of the Act trade machinery is a personal chattel to all intents and purposes, we still have to come back to section 4 and find out whether this is an assurance of trade machinery in the sense in which the term "assurance" is used as to a personal chattel. The section does not seem to give any right to the mortgagee to sever the trade machinery from the land unless the mortgage itself gives such power. The trade machinery simply follows the land as the shadow follows the substance.

But then we have this power of sale introduced by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and no doubt a serious question arises as to whether or not, having regard to its special terms, enabling mortgagees to break up into lots, and to sell in lots, the mortgaged property, or any part thereof, it enables a person who takes a mortgage of land, with trade machinery affixed thereon, in the ordinary form, to sever the fixtures and sell them as if they were a part of the mortgaged property. I cannot think that that was the intention of the section. I think that those who drew it intended that what was sold was to be a part of the mortgaged property in the sense in which it was subject to the mortgage. Take the case of a mortgage of a house. I cannot think that the mortgagee could sell the chimney without selling the rest of the house, or could sell the fixtures—mantelpieces, for instance—in the house as part of the house. They are a part of the house in the sense that they follow the land on which the house is, as a necessary concomitant of it in a conveyance of the land, but they are not part of the house for the purposes of this section. In applying the Act of 1881 regard must be had to the subject-matter of the conveyance or mortgage; when, therefore, you have a mortgage of a workshop with machinery in it, I do not think the section enables you to sell the machinery apart from the shop any more than it enables you to sell the chimneys of the house. Some light is thrown in that direction by the 4th sub-section of section 19, which seems to show that, but for this special sub-section, it would not have been in the power of a mortgagee to sell the timber of the estate, although the timber would pass as an incident of the land. For these reasons it seems to me that the decision of the court below is right.

I agree that, if a mortgagee desire to have the power to sell the trade machinery, he cannot do so without having a bill of sale of the trade machinery. With regard to what has fallen from Cotton, L.J., as to the previous decisions, I wish to add nothing, and, indeed, I should have added nothing on the main portion of this case if it were not that the matter is one of such importance.

Bankruptcy—Receiving order—Composition deed—Secret bargain with particular creditor—Fraudulent preference.

By a composition deed the creditors of H., in consideration of the payment of the composition, agreed to release to H. all debts owing from him to them respectively, on condition that, if H. made default in payment of the composition, the deed should be void. P., one of the creditors, at the time of executing the deed, made a secret bargain with H., by which he was to receive from H. a larger proportion of his debt than any of the other creditors. H. having made default in paying the composition, P. presented a bankruptcy petition against him. The registrar refused to make a receiving order.

Held, that the effect of the secret bargain was that the release of P.'s debt was absolute and the condition void, and that the refusal of the registrar to make a receiving order was right.

Appeal from the refusal of Mr. Registrar Brougham to make a receiving order against G. C. Harvey on the petition of W. Phillips.

In June, 1886, Phillips, who was a judgment creditor of Harvey for £300, presented a bankruptcy petition against him, on which a receiving order was made. It was then agreed that the receiving order should be stayed for a time, in order that a composition might be arranged between Harvey and his creditors. Subsequently a deed of composition was executed, whereby the creditors, in consideration of the payment of a composition of 2s. 6d. in the pound, respectively released unto the debtor all debts and demands which they severally had against him, but it was provided that, in case the debtor made default in paying the composition, the deed should become void, and the creditors should not be bound by its provisions. Phillips executed this deed on the terms of receiving a secret payment in excess of the other creditors. The debtor paid part of this to Phillips, but beyond that he failed to pay anything under the composition. Thereupon Phillips presented a second bankruptcy petition against Harvey, but on receiving from him a certain sum of money partly in cash and partly in bills, he withdrew it. On the bills being dishonoured, Phillips presented a third bankruptcy petition against Harvey in respect of his original debt; and on this petition Mr. Registrar Brougham refused to make a receiving order.

Phillips appealed.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and R. G. Glenn, for the appellant.—The registrar ought to have made a receiving order. The composition deed was not an absolute release of the debtor's debts; it was provided that, in case he made default in paying the composition, the deed should become void. It is submitted that, notwithstanding Ex parte Oliver, In re Hodgson, 4 De G. & Sm. 354, and Mallalieu v. Hodgson, 16 Q. B. 689, the debtor ought not to be allowed to set up fraud, to which, if it was fraud, he was a party.

Sidney Woolf, for the debtor, was not called upon.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. I am not disposed to quarrel with the decision arrived at in 1851, and since acted on, that where there is an agreement by a creditor to release his debt subject to conditions, and there is at the same time a secret understanding which is a fraud on the other creditors, such agreement to release is binding, even though the conditions are not performed. It is clear that that decision rests on a sound basis of law. In Sheppard's Touchstone, p. 132, speaking of illegal conditions, it is said, "If the condition be subsequent to the estate, the condition only is void, and the estate good and absolute." The effect of the present transaction is this: I release the debt you owe me provided you pay me that which will be a larger proportion of what you ought to pay than any other creditor will get. Such a condition is tainted with illegality, and it can make no difference that, instead of being expressed in the deed, it was come to by a secret arrangement. The result is, that the release of the debt remains absolute, and the condition, which creates a fraudulent preference, is void. Therefore the decision of the registrar was right.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This case comes within the authorities which have been cited, and I agree with what was said in the case of In re Cross, reported in a note to Ex parte Oliver: "It is a universal rule that a fraudulent deed though operative against the fraudulent party to it, is not operative for him, and therefore confers on him no rights whatever." This deed is not void, the release remains absolute. But the condition, being a fraudulent condition made with the intention of deceiving all the other creditors, is void, and the fraudulent party has lost both his original debt and the composition.

Bankruptcy—"Final judgment"—Order for payment of alimony pendente lite*—Bankruptcy notice—Bankruptcy Act*, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g).

An order against a husband for the payment of alimony pendente lite is not a "final judgment" within sub-section 1 (g) of section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, upon which a bankruptcy notice can be founded in respect of arrears payable thereunder.

Appeal of a petitioning creditor against the order of Mr. Registrar Brougham, refusing to make a receiving order.

The facts of the case were as follows:—

The President of the Divorce Division made an order that the respondent should pay monthly to the wife alimony pending the action at the rate of £120 per annum. The respondent allowed five monthly instalments to remain unpaid, and did not comply with a bankruptcy notice served upon him in respect of these arrears. The registrar decided that the order was not a "final judgment" in respect of which a bankruptcy notice could issue, and the wife appealed.

S. Woolf, for the appellant.—The order to pay alimony is a final order in an independent proceeding: Ex parte Moore, 14 Q. B. D. 627, 33 W. R. 438. Orders for such payments can be enforced in the same way as judgments in the Chancery Division: 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 52. Though it has been decided in Ex parte Linton, In re Linton, 33 W. R. 714, 15 Q. B. D. 239, that future payments cannot be proved for in bankruptcy there is nothing to prevent such an order as this being made the foundation for bankruptcy proceedings: Dickens v. Dickens, 31 L. J. P. 183, 11 W. R. Div. Dig.

13; Prescott v. Prescott, 20 L. T. N. S. 331, 17 W. R. Div. Dig. 25.

Muir Mackenzie, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This appeal must be dismissed. It seems to me that the question whether an order which may be called a judgment is a judgment within the meaning of the Act must be determined on a view of the order taken at the time it was made. If, at that time, it was not a final judgment, it cannot be made final by the fact of its not being obeyed. This is an order to pay alimony pendente lite, and, according to the practice of the court in which it was made, it can be varied pendente lite. It is as much an interlocutory order as any that can be imagined. The case of Ex parte Moore does not go far enough to support the appellant's contention. It was only decided there that an order for the payment of costs, which formed part of a final judgment, could itself be treated as a final judgment. The order to pay £10 monthly is only part of an interlocutory order.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the first place the order to pay alimony pendente lite is not a judgment, it is a simple order. In the second place it is not final. No order could be more wanting in the characteristics of finality than this order. It must come to an end when the final judgment is pronounced, and is always subject to review. In Ex parte Moore the judgment pronounced finally settled the rights of the parties in the action, and declared that a right to damages existed. The reference involved in the judgment, it was decided, did not affect the final determination of the parties' rights in the action.

STEPHEN v. CUNNINGHAM. (a.)

Will—Construction—Vesting—Gift over without "leaving" children "surviving"—"Portions"—Loco parentis.

A gift by a testator, not standing in loco parentis to his grandchildren, to his daughter for life, and after her death to her children at twenty-one or marriage, with benefit of survivorship in case any died without having obtained a vested interest, and a declaration that, until the vesting of the "portions" thereby provided for the daughter's children, the income was, after her death, to be applied for their maintenance, and, in case of the daughter's death, "without leaving any child or children her surviving," then over. Of the daughter's children, two attained twenty-one, and all died in her lifetime unmarried.

Held, that the rule laid down in Emperor v. Rolfe, 1 Ves. sen. 208, that the vested interests of children were not to be divested by their death in their parents' lifetime, although applicable to portions given by will, as well as to cases of settlements, was not applicable to the case of portions to children to whom the testator was not in loco parentis, and that, the terms of the gift being unambiguous, the gift over took effect.

Adjourned summons.

The facts, as stated in the judgment of the court, were as follows:—

John Hamlet, by his will, dated in 1825, gave his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to sell, and, after payment of debts, to invest the residue of the proceeds and pay the income to his daughter Elizabeth during her life, and, after her death, as to the capital, "in trust to pay, and I do hereby give and bequeath the same unto all and every the children and child of her my said daughter Elizabeth Ann who, being a son or sons, shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter or daughters, shall attain that age or marry, to be divided between or amongst them, if more than one, in equal shares and proportions (with benefit of survivorship between and amongst them in case any or either of them shall happen to die without having obtained a vested interest therein), and, in case my said daughter Elizabeth Ann shall happen to die without leaving any child or children her surviving, or, leaving such, they shall all die without having obtained a vested interest in the said trust money, and without leaving any issue them, him, or her surviving, then" the testator gave the said trust moneys to Wm. Bennett and Frank Goodwin absolutely, and he declared that in the meantime, and until the vesting or payment of the "portions" thereby provided for the children of his said daughter, the trustees should, after her death, apply the income for their maintenance.

The testator had no child except his daughter mentioned in his will. He died in 1825. His daughter was then unmarried. In 1840 his daughter married a Mr. Cunningham. She had five children, of whom only two attained twenty-one, and all died unmarried in the lifetime of their mother. On the 11th of January, 1881, the mother died.

The question raised by the summons was whether the gift over, upon her death without leaving any child her surviving, had taken effect.

H. Stephen, for the trustees of the will, stated the case.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the representatives of the two children who attained twenty-one.—The benefits given by the testator to his daughter's children were in the nature of portions; their interests, therefore, were not divested by their death before their mother, and the gift over does not take effect. The rule is stated in Emperor v. Rolfe, 1 Ves. sen. 208, and recognized in Wakefield v. Maffett, 10 App. Cas. 422, 33 W. R. Dig. 184.

V. Hawkins replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 24.—Kay, J., after stating the facts as above set out, went on to say:—On the grammatical construction of the will I should come to the conclusion that, in the events that have happened, the gift over took effect. Elizabeth has died without "leaving any child or children her surviving." The other branch of the gift over, in my opinion, refers to the death, under twenty-one, of children who might survive her.

It is argued that these are portions given to Elizabeth's children by their grandfather, who for this purpose had placed himself loco parentis, and that the artificial rule of construction adopted in Emperor v. Rolfe, and a long series of subsequent cases upon settlements, where the court has overcome express words which, taken literally, would divest an interest which by previous words of gift was vested in a child, applies to portions given by will as well as to cases of settlements. I cannot deny that this doctrine may apply to gifts by will in certain cases. It was so decided in Farrer v. Barker, 9 Hare, 737; Jackson v. Dover; and In re Knowles, 31 W. R. 182, 21 Ch. D. 806.

But has any decision gone so far as to disregard such express words of gift over as I find in this will? Most of the authorities are with reference to a limitation in a settlement in trust for the parent for life, then to children who attain twenty-one, and, if the parent die without leaving children, over. If children attain twenty-one, and all die in the parent's lifetime, the court, to prevent the vested interests from being divested, has read the word "leaving" as though it were "having" or "having had"—a considerable liberty being thus taken with the actual words to effectuate what the court conceives to be the paramount intention in a marriage settlement, of securing portions to the children who live to attain a vested interest in them. But it cannot be denied that some of the cases on marriage settlements have gone beyond this. Generally speaking they are all cases in which there was some ambiguity in the expressions used.

In Torres v. Franco, by a marriage settlement stock was to be held in trust for the husband and wife, and if the wife survived, then, after her death, if there should be any child or children living at the time of her decease, upon trust for such of the said children as should attain twenty-one or be married, as tenants in common, and if there should be but one such child who should live to attain that age or be married, then for the sole use of such child, the dividends of the apparent share of an infant to be applied, after the mother's death, for its maintenance; and in case the mother should die "without leaving any child or children at the time of her decease, or in case there should be one or more such children or child then living, yet all of them shall die under the age of twenty-one years and unmarried," then there was a limitation over. Sir J. Leach said:—"The gift over is not to take effect unless all the children die under age and unmarried. This is inconsistent with the clause which imports that a child to take must survive the mother, and where clauses are conflicting the rational presumption is that a child attaining twenty-one takes a vested interest."

The words of the gift over in that case resemble those in the case before me. I confess I should have thought that the gift over in case there should be a child or children living at the mother's death, "yet all of them should die," referred only to such children as might be then living, but it was not so construed. Such a decision seems to justify the words of Turner, L.J., in Currie v. Larkins, that where in the first part of the settlement it is clear that children are to take vested interests, a gift over if they die in the lifetime of the parents would not divest them.

Lord Cottenham, in Whatford v. Moore, 3 My. & Cr. 270, said that in these cases it may be thought that courts have gone the full length that is justifiable, and that "the cases on this subject are so little reconcilable that the only reasonable course is to lean in favour of a construction which includes all the children, if the instrument affords fair grounds for doing so; but, if not, to give effect to the plain meaning of the words used."

This was approved by Turner, L.J., in Farrer v. Barker, which was a case under a will, where he said that, although "the same rule of constructions" upon this subject was applicable to wills and settlements, yet the different character of the instrument was a circumstance to be weighed, and in the case before him, although the gifts were to grandchildren of the testator, there was nothing to show that he stood in loco parentis, and accordingly the court declined to apply the rule.

In Young v. Turner there was a devise of real estate in trust for the testator's niece for life, and after her death to her issue, to be divided at twenty-one or marriage, and to their heirs and assigns, but if the niece should die leaving only one child, then to that only child in fee, but in case she should die without leaving any issue of her body at the time of her decease, or in case all such issue should die under twenty-one and unmarried, there was a gift over. The niece had only one child, a daughter, who attained twenty-one, and died in her mother's lifetime, and it was held that the gift over took effect. This case was brought to the attention of Lord Hatherley in White v. Hill, L. R. 4 Eq. 265, who said that it would be much more difficult to turn "leaving at the time of her decease" into "having" than "leaving" simply. The words "at her decease" distinguish the case from In re Thompson's Trust.

The result of these decisions is that these words in a will, if the case is not a case of portions to children to whom the testator was in loco parentis, would receive a construction according to their grammatical meaning which would exclude a child who attained twenty-one and died in the lifetime of the tenant for life. But in a settlement, or in a will where the testator was in loco parentis to the children intended to be benefited, the gift over might either be differently construed or disregarded.

The important question, therefore, is, was the testator in the case before me in loco parentis to the possible children of his daughter Elizabeth, who did not marry until after his death. The only ground for suggesting this is that in the maintenance clause he speaks of the shares of the possible grandchildren as portions. But if that is sufficient to place the testator in loco parentis to grandchildren, not one of whom was born in his lifetime, I do not see how it could be denied that any gift by a testator to his grandchildren, or any settlement under which grandchildren of the settlor would take a benefit, would put him in loco parentis to such grandchildren, whether he ever saw them or not.

In Ex parte Pye, 18 Ves. 140, Lord Eldon defines "locus parentis" as being "the situation of the person described as the lawful father of that child." This definition, which is little more than a literal translation, is adopted by Lord Cottenham in Powys v. Mansfield, 3 My. & Cr. 367; and in Pym v. Lockyer, 5 My. & Cr. 35, the same learned judge said that for the purpose of the rule against double portions, whether the donor had assumed the office of a parent may be proved by extrinsic evidence such as the general conduct of the donor towards the children, or by intrinsic evidence from the nature and terms of the gift.

In Tucker v. Burrows, 13 W. R. 771, 2 H. & M. 515, with regard to the presumption of advancement,

Lord Hatherley said that it had been applied to the case of an illegitimate child, a grandchild after its father's death, and a person towards whom the purchaser had assumed the position of a parent. But he repeats a question of Knight Bruce, L.J., "Is there any case of grandfather, father, and son, the father alive?"

No case was cited, nor do I know of any which has carried the doctrine of a testator placing himself in loco parentis to grandchildren, objects of his bounty, by the mere words of the will, anything like so far as I am asked to carry it in this case.

I decline to do this for the purpose of introducing a rule of construction which does violence to the actual words of the will. In one of the last cases on this subject, Jeyes v. Savage, which was the case of a settlement, the court intimated that these authorities had been carried far enough, and declined to apply the rule under the terms of that deed. I confess that is my own opinion. If this had been the case of a settlement, in construing which the paramount consideration of making a provision for children of the marriage who attained twenty-one might be allowed to control words of defeasance, the true principle is that before the court can do so it must be satisfied that there is an ambiguity in the terms of the instrument. I, on the contrary, am satisfied that in this case there is no such ambiguity, and I should hesitate long before I applied the rule to the words I have to deal with if they were in a settlement. This is not the case of a settlement, but of a will, to which no such stringent rule is applicable.

I must therefore construe these words according to their obvious meaning, and I accordingly hold that, in the events that have happened, the gift over to Wm. Bennett and Sarah Goodwin took effect.

Company—Winding up—Shareholder—Contributory—Payment of shares in cash—Agreement to apply debt of company for future calls—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.

A shareholder in a company which had power, under its articles of association, to receive in advance from its members the balance due on their shares, bought up a debt owing from the company, and requested the directors to transfer to him from the amount of the debt a sum sufficient to pay up his shares in full. The directors passed a resolution to this effect, but, excepting the minute of this resolution, no entry was made in the company's books of the shares being fully paid up, nor was any contract registered under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. In the winding up of the company,

Held, that there had been nothing equivalent to payment in cash for the shares within section 25, and that the shareholder was therefore liable for calls.

The 11th article of association of the above company provided that "the directors may, if they think fit, receive from any member willing to advance the same, all or any parts of the moneys due upon the shares or shares held by him beyond the sums actually called for."

H. Kent was the holder of about 800 shares of £10 in the company, and having bought up a debt of about £16,000, which was owing by the company to W. Eichholz, he, on the 18th of March, 1886, presented a creditor's petition for the winding up of the company, but the petition was not advertised, and it was withdrawn on the 17th of April, 1886. The purchase of the debt had been completed on the 2nd of April, on which day it had been resolved at a meeting of the directors of the company, "that the seal of the association be affixed to the assignment from Mr. W. Eichholz to Mr. H. Kent of the association's indebtedness to Mr. W. Eichholz, as expressed therein." On the same day Kent wrote to the directors as follows:—"Gentlemen, I request you to transfer from the amount due from the association to me in respect of the debt assigned by Mr. Eichholz to me, a sum sufficient to pay up in full the shares standing in Mr. W. Shury's name in the books of the association, and also the shares standing in my name in the said association, except those that I transferred by me to Mr. H. B. Dry." And on the same day the directors passed a resolution that "the debt assigned by Mr. Eichholz to Mr. Kent as aforesaid be applied in paying up in full the shares mentioned in Mr. Kent's letter of this date."

Beyond the minutes of these resolutions there was no entry in the company's books with reference to the transaction, nor was any contract in writing relating to these shares filed with the registrar of joint stock companies.

On the 5th of April, 1886, a creditor's petition was presented for winding up the company, on which an order was made on the 20th of April. This order was taken out by the liquidator for the purpose of enforcing payment by Kent of a call of £[illegible] on his shares, in respect of which he had been placed on the list of contributories.

Marten, Q.C., and Vernon Smith, for the liquidator. There was no payment in cash for Kent's shares within section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. But as at the date of the transaction Kent's petition for winding up the company was pending, the alleged payment cannot be supported: Companies Act, 1862, s. [illegible]

The respondent, Kent, in person.—The letter of the 2nd of April, and the directors' resolution, entered in the minute book, constitute a good appropriation of a sufficient part of the debt to satisfy future calls. This is a valid set-off of the debt against the calls: Williams, Bankruptcy, 4th ed., p. 112; Rose v. Hart, 8 Taunt. [illegible]; 2 Sm. L. C., 9th ed., p. 324; Bailey v. Finch, 20 W. R. 294, L. R. 7 Q. B. 34; Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 38; Companies Act, 1862, s. 67. The shares were paid for in cash within section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867; Spargo's case, 21 W. R. [illegible], L. R. 8 Ch. 407, and Ferrao's case, 22 W. R. 386, L. R. 9 Ch. 355.

KAY, J.—In this case, which has been very [illegible] argued, the point raised is a very short one. The facts, as I understand them, are as follows: The respondent Mr. Kent, being a holder of shares in this company, purchased a debt due by the company to a Mr. Eichholz, and agreed with the directors of the company that the debt which he had so purchased should be applied under the articles of association it might be applied in payment of calls that had been made upon his shares, but in paying up his shares in full in anticipation of calls that might be made. It is clear that such a transaction could not come within any doctrine of set-off. It is essential to the existence of a right of set-off that there should be debts on both sides; that is, in this case a debt due from the company to Mr. Kent, and a debt due from him to the company. There was no debt due from him to the company. What he wanted to do was, not to pay any debt due from him to the company, but to anticipate possible calls, which might never be made at all if the company was prosperous. It was clearly necessary that an arrangement of that kind between him and the directors should be carried out by some formal proceeding. What took place was that Mr. Kent, on the 2nd of April, 1886, wrote to the directors as follows:—[His lordship read the letter of that date, and continued:—] That is a request that part of this debt should be applied in payment up in full of the shares which are mentioned. On the same day, there being three directors present, at a board meeting this resolution was passed:—[His lordship read the second resolution of the 2nd of April, 1886:—] There I find patent primâ facie evidence of an agreement between the directors and Mr. Kent that a sufficient part of the debt of Mr. Eichholz which Mr. Kent had bought should be applied in paying up his shares in anticipation of calls which might thereafter be made. The question is, was that payment? There was no entry in the books of the company showing that the shares had been paid up, and nothing except what I have read was done to carry out the arrangement entered into between Mr. Kent and the directors. It appears that the winding up occurred very soon afterwards, and those books were taken away by the liquidator. Practically, nothing further was done in the matter. In my opinion that transaction was not payment, but only an agreement that the debt should be applied in payment. I am referred to Ferrao's case, which confirms me in the opinion I have formed.

In Ferrao's case what was done was this. A Mr. Webb had brought an action against the company which was compromised, and a judge's order was made by consent; the terms being that the company were to pay Webb £3,900, whereof £3,200 was to be paid by bills of exchange, and the company were to credit fifty shares standing in the name of Ferrao with £700, so as to make the same fully paid up. If the case had stopped there there would have been merely a contract for payment. But the case did not stop there. Bills to that effect were accordingly made in the books of the company. Then there follows the winding-up order, and Mellish, L.J., in his judgment, after referring to the judge's order, said this:—"In my opinion, the moment the company, in pursuance of that judge's order, did credit the shares of Ferrao with the £700 so as to make them fully paid-up shares, that moment the £700 was paid by the company to Webb just as much as if it was paid in cash." He does not say—"the moment the judge's order was made," the judge's order was merely a contract, but the moment the contract was carried out by crediting the shares with the £700 in the company's books. And that is made more clear by what he says later on in the judgment:—"It is exactly the same thing as if Webb had gone to the company, and the company had handed over to Webb £700 in bank notes, and then Webb had said, 'I wish to pay for the shares of my friend Ferrao, there is the £700 in bank notes back again.' There was no need to go through that form; and, in my opinion, writing it off the books is perfectly equivalent to payment." Before all question the ratio decidendi was, not that the contract was a sufficient payment, but that the actual writing off the amount in the books of the company was equivalent to payment—that is, that it was not necessary to go through the form of handing the money over and taking it back again. That is exactly the point in which this case fails to be equivalent to Ferrao's case. There there was nothing but the agreement with the directors, which was not carried out by any entry in the books or in any other way whatever. Then, of course, comes in the Companies Act, 1867, which enacts by section 25 that "every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing and filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares." Nothing of that kind has been done. The agreement, even if it would otherwise satisfy the terms of the statute, has not been registered. Therefore, I am afraid that on this ground I must hold this gentleman liable for the calls made in the winding up in respect of the shares held by him.

Wills v. Luff. (a.)

Practice—Mortgagor and mortgagee—Equitable jurisdiction—Receiver—Foreclosure absolute—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24, sub-section 7.

Judgment for foreclosure absolute ends a foreclosure action, and therefore the plaintiff cannot obtain a receiver, even though the conveyance of the property has not been settled.

This was a foreclosure action. The mortgage was an equitable mortgage by memorandum on six leasehold houses held under a demise less three days for a long term of years. The mortgagor had, before the commencement of the action, mortgaged the property to an insurance company for more than its value without disclosing the existence of the equitable charge.

The plaintiff had obtained an order for foreclosure absolute, but had not yet called for a conveyance of the defendant's interest.

The mortgagee was in receipt of the rents and profits, and applying the same to his own purposes.

The plaintiff took out a summons, which now came on to be heard by way of motion, for the appointment of a receiver without prejudice to the rights of any prior incumbrancer, and for directions that the tenants be ordered to attorn and pay their rents to the receiver, and that the receiver out of such rents pay and keep down the ground-rent and perform and observe the covenants in the superior lease, and pay the balance of such rents to the plaintiff.

Sir A. Watson, Q.C., and Rowden, for the plaintiff, based the application on the equitable jurisdiction of the court in appointing receivers: Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24, sub-section 7.

They referred to Salt v. Cooper, 29 W. R. 553, 16 Ch. D. 545.

Romer, Q.C., and A. dB. Berrell, for the mortgagee.

Chitty, J.—This is a summons which I adjourned from chambers to come on by way of motion for argument in court. The plaintiff obtained a foreclosure decree, which was afterwards made absolute. That being so, all that would remain to be said would be that the action was at an end, with the exception of one thing, and that was that the conveyance remained to be settled, and that, if the plaintiff requires a conveyance, he has the right to take proceedings to obtain it. The action, in fact, is worked out subject to that one matter. The court has no power to add to the foreclosure decree with the exception of settling the conveyance, although in a proper case it may, of course, open the foreclosure, where the defendant shows special circumstances for the reconsideration of the judgment. Subject to these observations, I hold that after foreclosure absolute an action for foreclosure is at an end.

But the plaintiff here asks for a receiver on the analogy of asking for equitable execution. But he is in error in supposing that there is any analogy. Equitable execution is a process by which the court enables a judgment creditor to obtain payment when ordinary execution will not reach the debtor. It is a process which enables the judgment creditor to reach any interests in land which ordinary execution will not reach. But the receiver is receiver of what? Why, of some portion of the defendant's real estate which is already charged, but which there is difficulty in reaching. The receiver is, in fact, a receiver of the debtor's interest in the property and of nobody else's, and the property affected is confined to the debtor's interest in it. A receivership order is a mere mode of execution. Here, however, there is no judgment on which execution can go. There is nothing in the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in Salt v. Cooper, nor is there anything in the Judicature Act, 1873, which says that in such a case as the present a receivership order should be made, because the judgment otherwise cannot be worked out. I say that the judgment has been worked out subject to what I have said as to the settling of the conveyance still remaining.

I am not, however, saying anything as to whether the plaintiff is entitled to an order for possession. The plaintiff, however, is not asking for that, because he appears to be under the apprehension that if he takes possession he may become subject to the burthen of covenants towards persons not parties to the action, and also perhaps be subject to covenants with reference to the peculiar nature of the property, with the result that he will get nothing out of the property whatever. There are, to my mind, some difficulties in the way of getting an order for possession, but I do not wish to be taken to be saying anything which may prejudice that question.

I can, however, find no ground whatever for acceding to the present motion. The defendant denies that he is in possession. He has no right whatever to the rents. If, however, I were to make the order the plaintiff asks for, I should be making, as it were, an order for a receivership in the air. The plaintiff is, in fact, asking for a receivership order against himself, for a receiver acts for all parties to the action, and the plaintiff may now be said to be the only interested party.

I decline to say anything as to the merits of the case, for the question before me is a purely technical one.

The motion is dismissed, with costs.

In re Hasties & Crawfurd. (a.)

Solicitor — Remuneration — Lease — Rent — Shares — Money payment or premium—Solicitors' Remuneration Order, 1882, schedule 1, part 2, r. 5.

A firm of solicitors were employed by a lessor to prepare for him a lease of certain property for twenty-one years to a company, the consideration for the lease being a rent of £80 and the issue of 400 shares of the nominal value of £10. None of the company's shares had been sold, so that no market value had been placed upon them; and 200 of the 400 shares had not been issued.

The solicitors charged the scale fee on the rent of £80, and also the scale fee for deducing title, perusing and completing deed as upon a premium of £4,000, the amount of the nominal value of the 400 shares.

Held, that they were not entitled to make the last charge, as the value of the shares could not be estimated, and rule 5, part 2, schedule 1, of the Remuneration Order, 1882, did not apply to such a case.

Adjourned summons.

Messrs. Hasties & Crawfurd were employed by Lord Wallscourt, the tenant for life of the Ardree Estates, the county of Galway, to prepare for him a lease of certain property to the Ardree Fishery Co. (Limited). The lease and counterpart were duly prepared, and the lease was executed by Lord Wallscourt, but the counterpart was not executed by the company. Messrs. Hasties & Crawfurd alleged that Lord Wallscourt had agreed to pay to them the scale fee for the preparation of the lease.

It was witnessed in the lease that, in consideration of the "rent and profits" thereinafter reserved and the covenants thereinafter contained, and on the part of the company to be observed and performed, the lessor thereby demised unto the company the property therein described, and the consideration was as follows: "Yielding and paying unto the lessor, his heirs, successors, and assigns, in respect of the premises hereby demised, the clear yearly rent of £80, to be paid by equal half-yearly payments, . . . and also yielding and paying unto the lessor, his heirs, successors, and assigns, the profits accruing on an issue to him or to proper parties on his behalf, of 200 shares of the nominal value of £10, such shares to be allotted and issued to the lessor or to such parties as aforesaid, and fully paid up at the time of allotment; and also yielding and paying unto the lessor, his heirs, successors, and assigns, the profits accruing on a further issue aforesaid of 200 shares of the nominal value of £10, such last-mentioned shares to be allotted to and issued to the lessor or to proper parties on his behalf as aforesaid, paid only as when the unpaid portion of £5 per share, or any part thereof, shall be called up upon the partly paid-up shares in the proportion of two fully paid shares of £10 each for each 1s. por share called up on the said partially paid shares."

The first 200 shares had been allotted to trustees for Lord Wallscourt, but the other 200 shares had not been allotted. No market value had been placed on the shares of the company, none of which had been sold.

In their bill of costs delivered to Lord Wallscourt Messrs. Hasties & Crawfurd charged, as the scale fee for deducing title, perusing and completing deed upon a premium of £4,000 in shares, £40—viz, one and a half per cent. on the first £1,000, £15; one per cent. on the second and third £1,000, £20; and one-half per cent. on the fourth £1,000, £5.

On taxation the taxing master held that the scale fee did not apply to, and could not be charged in, such a case; and, in the presence of the parties, allowed them a list of fees which appeared to him fair and customary in such circumstances.

Messrs. Hasties & Crawfurd submitted objections that the taxing master was bound by the general order and should allow the scale charge, and, if not, that he had no authority to say what sum they were entitled to without affording them an opportunity of delivering a detailed bill of costs, but the taxing master disallowed their objections, giving his reasons as follows:—"Remuneration by scale is not, as it appears to me, the proper mode of remuneration for the preparation of a lease in question, as the lease does not afford a basis for assessment of a scale fee—a premium, the value of which cannot be estimated (the shares in the fishery company not having, and never having had, a marketable value), having been given for the lease in addition to the rent (£80) reserved by it. The solicitors alleged on the 15th of December that they could produce evidence, by letters, of an agreement on the part of the petitioner to pay the scale fee demanded, but they failed to produce such evidence on either of the occasions (the 16th and 20th of December) when the matter was again before the taxing master. The list of fees in detail allowed by the taxing master for the preparation of the lease and counterpart . . . was prepared by the taxing master on the 20th of December in the presence of the parties, and Mr. Hastie himself sent to his office for documents to enable the taxing master to prepare it—the allowances are in the discretion of the taxing master, these allowed in the present case being, in my opinion, fair, and such as are customary under similar circumstances. Mr. Hastie did not at the time offer and has never offered, any objection to the allowances, beyond putting forward his claim to remuneration by scale on the basis suggested by the bill of costs under taxation."

Messrs. Hasties & Crawfurd then took out the present summons for a review of taxation.

The General Remuneration Order, 1882, sched. 1, part 2, r. 5, provides: "Where a conveyance or lease is partly in consideration of a money payment or premium and partly of a rent, then, in addition to the remuneration hereby prescribed in respect of the rent, there shall be paid a further sum equal to the remuneration on a purchase at a price equal to such money payment or premium."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the summons.—The solicitors are entitled to charge the scale fee on the premium of £4,000, the nominal value of the 400 shares which form part of the consideration for the lease. For the purpose of stamp duty on the lease the shares had to be estimated at their nominal value. [They referred to the General Remuneration Order, 1882, schedule 1, part 2, r. 5; 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, s. 97.] The taxing master ought to have directed the solicitors to make up another bill of costs to be taxed, and not allowed them a list of fees which he thought reasonable.

[NORTH, J.—I do not think that the stamp duty on the lease has anything to do with the question.]

Bramwell Davis, contrd.—The solicitors have no right to charge the scale fee for deducing title, perusing and completing deed as upon a premium of £4,000 in shares. The scale fee does not apply to a case where the value of the premium cannot be estimated. The shares of the company have no marketable value, and the second 200 shares mentioned in the lease have not yet been issued.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J.—The lessee is to receive £80 a year, and that is what is meant by the rent of the lease. The witnessing part says, "In consideration of rent and profits hereinafter reserved," and there is a distinction made between rent and profits. [His lordship then read the clause of the lease stating the consideration as set out above, and continued:—] The question is, whether this is a case coming within rule 5, part 2, schedule 1 of the General Order of 1882. [His lordship read the rule as set out above, and proceeded:—] To entitle the solicitors to more than the remuneration in respect of the rent proper, they must make out that there was some further money payment or premium within rule 5. If they admitted that they were not entitled to more than the remuneration in respect of the £80 they might have that. But they ask for the scale fee in respect of the rent and of shares, some of which have not been allotted, and they are not entitled to it. Then they claim to make out another bill. [His lordship then read the taxing master's answer to the objections to the taxation, and continued:—] That must be taken as accurate; and, under the circumstances, I do not think the taxing master was wrong in the course he took. I must dismiss the summons, with costs.

WILLIAMS v. JONES. (a.)

Specific performance—Variation of written agreement by oral proviso.

By the terms of a written agreement J. agreed to lease to W. "a shop and premises . . . which are to be built at a cost not to exceed £400, . . . at the annual rental of £75. . . ."

J. expended £750 in building the premises, and refused to grant a lease to W. at the annual rent of £75.

In an action by W. against J. for specific performance of the written agreement, the defendant set up as a defence a contemporaneous parol proviso to the agreement, to the effect that, if the outlay exceeded £400, the rent was to be raised in proportion.

Held, that, as such parol proviso did not contradict, but merely explained, the terms of the written instrument, evidence of it was admissible; and, as the evidence proved that the plaintiff had agreed to such parol proviso, that the action must be dismissed.

Lord Townshend v. Stangroom, 6 Ves. 328, followed.

This was an action for specific performance of an agreement to grant a lease. The agreement was in the following terms:—"March 19, 1886, I, John Morris Jones, hereby agree to lease to Walter Williams, a shop and premises, 86, Taff-street, Pontypridd, which are to be built at a cost not to exceed £400, in accordance with plans and specifications prepared by Mr. Rowlands, of Pontypridd, for a term of fourteen years, at the annual rental of £75 payable quarterly, to be taken from date of completion of premises.—J. Morris Jones. Witness, Frederick Pearse."

The defendant expended £750 in the completion of the house, and refused to grant the lease for £75, asserting that it was verbally agreed, before the agreement was signed, that if the cost of the building exceeded £400, the annual rent should be, not £75, but such sum as bore the same proportion to the defendant's outlay as £75 bore to £400, and he counter-claimed for specific performance of the oral and written agreement, and damages. The counter-claim was, however, abandoned at the trial. The plaintiff, in his evidence, stated that before the agreement was signed the defendant abandoned a demand which he had made that the rent should be increased in the event of the outlay being more than £400. The defendant's witnesses, however, substantially proved that the arrangement as to the increase was to hold good, and that the plaintiff knew it to be a term of the written contract.

J. G. Wood (Warmington, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff.—I rely upon the written contract. The terms are perfectly plain. The defence attempted to be set up does not vary the agreement, it contradicts it. Oral evidence will not be admitted to alter the terms of a contract to the extent of completely nullifying it. It is one thing to agree to pay £75 a year for a house, and another to agree to pay rent upon any sum the lessor likes to say will be necessary to recoup him for his original outlay. The defendant, in the latter case, is left with a free hand, he might expend £1,000 or £1,200 and then say pay me a proportionate rent.

B. B. Rogers and W. Evans, for the defendant.—The oral agreement merely explains the written contract. The defendant could not make sure of getting the house built for £400—he is not a builder. In case the outlay exceeded that sum, it does not appear from the writing what are to be the terms of letting. Oral evidence, then, is necessary to show what is to take place in this event. The plaintiff knew perfectly well that there was to be this further development of the arrangement, as is conclusively proved by the evidence. Both parties acted in accordance with what they considered the contract to be, and in that case the plaintiff cannot recover.

He cited Lord Townshend v. Stangroom, 6 Ves. 328.

Wood replied.

Kekewich, J.—This is an action for specific performance of an agreement to grant a lease. [His lordship read the agreement above set out.] Now what is the meaning of the words, "which are to be built at a cost not to exceed £400"? The defendant says they are inserted for his benefit and protection, that he is not to be compelled to expend more than that sum, and I agree with this view. But there is no proviso that if he do expend more he need not be compelled to grant the lease. Upon the construction, therefore, of this contract alone, and if this were the only question in the case, I should hold that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed.

But, according to a well-known doctrine of equity, a man may set up a parol agreement as a defence to an action of this kind—it must be compatible with and must not contradict the written instrument. Now what do the witnesses say? [His lordship examined the evidence and came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was aware that the rent was to be raised in proportion as the outlay exceeded £400.] This being the case, the oral agreement does not operate as a contradiction of the written instrument, but only as a proviso, and therefore, as the outlay came to more than £400, the defendant is not bound to let the plaintiff have the house for £75 a year.

The defendant having abandoned his counter-claim at the trial, both claim and counter-claim will be dismissed, with costs.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) April 18.

Lewis v. Graham. (a.)

Mayor's Court—Jurisdiction—Carry on business—Solicitor's clerk—Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. clvii.), s. 12.

A clerk employed by a solicitor whose office is in the City of London does not "carry on business within the City of London" within the meaning of the Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857, s. 12.

This was an application for a prohibition to the judge of the Mayor's Court, and had been referred by Denman, J., to the court.

The action had been brought in the Mayor's Court by the plaintiff, who resided at Lewisham, against the defendant, who also resided there, for £50 damages for a trespass in breaking and entering the plaintiff's dwelling-house at that place. The defendant was clerk to a solicitor whose office was situate within the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court. This application was made on the ground that the defendant did not carry on business in the City of London within the meaning of the Mayor's Court Procedure Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. clvii.), s. 12.

That section provides that "where the debt or damages claimed in any action shall not exceed the sum of £50 no plea to the jurisdiction shall be allowed, provided the defendant or one of the defendants shall dwell or carry on business within the City of London or the liberties thereof at the time of action brought," &c.

Lewis Glyn, for the defendant.—A solicitor's clerk cannot be said to "carry on business" at his employer's office: Buckley v. Hann, 5 Ex. 43; Sangster v. Kay, 5 Ex. 386. The words of the statute on which the cases were decided are practically identical with the words of the statute now in question. The case of Ex parte Brewell, In re Bowie, 29 W. R. 299, 16 Ch. D. 484, seems to be against me, but that was a bankruptcy matter, and it was only decided that under the Bankruptcy Act and Rules the jurisdiction of the court was universal, and that a division had been made in the exercise of that jurisdiction for the convenience of debtors. In that case the Exchequer decisions were not referred to. Further, the terms of the Mayor's Court Act have always been strictly construed: Tailleur v. South-Eastern Railway, 3 C. P. D. 10, 26 W. R. Dig. 109.

Probyn, for the plaintiff.—This Act must be construed as much as the Bankruptcy Acts and Rules with reference to the convenience of defendants: Dewhurst v. Patterson, 6 W. R. 768. The language of the judges in Ex parte Brewell support the view that the defendant must be taken to carry on business at the office where he was employed. In Buckley v. Hann and Sangster v. Kay the words of the Act in question were "carry on business." In the Exchequer cases the defendant was in no business, but in the employ of a State department.

Lewis Glyn was not called upon to reply.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—I am of opinion that this prohibition must go. We have to interpret the words of this section, which enacts that an action may be brought in the Mayor's Court if the defendant dwells or carries on business within the City of London or has done so within a certain time before action brought. We must look at what was intended by the Legislature to see, according to good sense, this person did carry on business within the jurisdiction. I agree with the obvious sense of the Lords Justices in the case of Ex parte Brewell that the words, "carry on business," are elastic, and that an exhaustive definition which will embrace all questions which may arise upon them cannot be made. Their meaning must be determined by considerations of good sense and by a reference to the object of the Act in question. In the present case, if the matter were res integra, I should determine in favour of the defendant's contention without hesitation. It seems to me it would extend the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court far beyond the contemplation of Parliament if in every case a person employed in any capacity in the office of any other person who does carry on a business within the City of London were to be held to be within the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court. I think the section means that he must carry on some business over which he has some control. Porters or messengers without authority or control over the operations of the business in which they are occupied cannot be said to carry on that business. It was admitted by counsel for the plaintiff that the decisions in the Exchequer, which were delivered by very learned judges, are directly opposed to his contention, if they cannot be distinguished. In those cases it was held that a clerk in the Privy Council or Admiralty offices, though undoubtedly employed in a business, did not "carry on his business" within the jurisdiction of the local court, because he was a mere servant of a department of State. Those cases are directly in point, except for the omission in this section of the Mayor's Court Act of the word "his." I think that no real distinction exists. The words, "carry on business," are equivalent to "carry on his business." If the matter had been present to the minds of the Lords Justices who decided Ex parte Brewell, it would seem that the application of that decision would be the same to a clerk in a bank as to a clerk in a public office. There is, further, a series of decisions as to railways by which it has been decided that, though a railway company carries on a large part of its business at an office within the City of London, it need not be within the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court. I am aware that there are Acts which enact that companies are to be dealt with by the courts in whose jurisdiction their head offices are situate, but the decisions I am referring to did not turn on that ground.

Those cases support the authority of the decisions in the Exchequer. Against that has been set up the judgment of the Court of Appeal, which, however, was not taken on this particular Act of Parliament. The court was dealing with different circumstances and a different Act. The question was as to an unlimited jurisdiction, and as to the manner in which rules which distributed this unlimited jurisdiction were to be determined. There are expressions of the judges in that case which favour the plaintiff's contention, but there can be no question that the decision was arrived at not as to the limit of jurisdiction but the distribution of business. Further, the court had not before it these judgments in the Exchequer, which would without doubt have been treated with respect, and the Lords Justices pointedly abstain from overruling cases which support the present defendant's contention, pointing out that they are to be considered from a different point of view and construction. Therefore I arrive at the conclusion that a series of cases is in favour of the present application, that only one is apparently against it, and that that decision is distinguishable. The prohibition must go.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. If we decided for the plaintiff, the jurisdiction of the Mayor's Court would be very greatly extended. Many people who serve within, dwell outside that jurisdiction, and no one would suppose at first sight that it could be argued that a clerk or porter could have been intended by the words of this section. The importance insisted on with regard to the word "his" imports a distinction without a difference. The words of the section imply something beyond mere service, such as exists in the case of a solicitor's clerk, who carries on his master's business wherever he is instructed to do so, and is not necessarily engaged in work at his master's office. The Exchequer cases have been acted upon for many years, and the Court of Appeal decision cannot be taken to have silently overruled them.

Rule absolute for a prohibition.

NOTE.—In the report of the case of Davys v. Richardson, ante, p. 552, the statement, to the effect that the plaintiff's solicitor immediately after the judgment of Day, J., on the trial of the action, applied for and obtained payment out of the money paid into court, is inaccurate. The application for and receipt of the money, in fact, took place immediately after the delivery of the statement of defence, and, therefore, some time previous to the trial of and judgment in the action.

REG. v. OWEN. (a.)

Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), s. 20—Evidence of prisoner—Conviction for common assault.

Upon the hearing of a charge of indecent assault, the evidence of the prisoner had been received under section 20 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885.

Held, that such evidence was admissible to support a conviction for a common assault on another count of the indictment.

The prisoner had been tried at the Worcestershire County Sessions on an indictment charging him in the first count with an indecent assault, and in the second count with a common assault, upon Julia Bevan.

Evidence having been given for the prosecution, the prisoner and a man named John Drew were called for the defence. The former was called under the provisions of the statute 48 & 49 Vict. c. 69, s. 20 (the Criminal Law Amendment Act) and being sworn admitted that he had put his arm round Julia Bevan, but denied that he had indecently or otherwise assaulted her.

No objection to his evidence was taken by the counsel for the prosecution.

The chairman directed the jury that in any case there was clear evidence of a common assault; that the question of an indecent assault depended on whether the jury believed the prosecutrix or the defendant; if they believed the prosecutrix there was ample evidence in law to convict the defendant of an indecent assault, but it was for them to say if they thought an indecent assault or only a common assault had been committed.

The jury acquitted the prisoner of indecent assault, but convicted him of a common assault.

Counsel for the prisoner then urged that the conviction could not be sustained as the evidence of the prisoner was only admissible on the charges specified in the 20th section of the statute 48 & 49 Vict. c. 69, and no other; that by law this evidence in case of a common assault was inadmissible, and that, as the Court for Crown Cases Reserved had held in the case of Reg. v. Gibson, 35 W. R. 411, 18 Q. B. D. 537, if any evidence on a charge not legally admissible is allowed to go to the jury the conviction cannot be sustained.

These objections were overruled, and the question of law for the opinion of this court was whether, on an indictment for an indecent assault which contains a count for a common assault, after the prisoner is called as a witness for the defence under the statute 48 & 49 Vict. c. 69, s. 20, he can be legally convicted of a common assault only?

Harington, for the prisoner.—On a charge of common assault the prisoner is not a competent witness, and where the indictment contains two counts it must be treated as though there were two separate juries trying two separate indictments: R. v. Latham, 33 L. J. M. C., at p. 199; therefore, the evidence of the prisoner was inadmissible upon the charge of which he was convicted, and the conviction is, consequently, bad: R. v. Gibson, 18 Q. B. D. 537. The evidence given on the one charge is not made admissible upon the other: R. v. Fuidge, 12 W. R. 351. The chairman also misdirected the jury in not telling them to disregard the evidence of the prisoner when considering their verdict upon the second count.

Amphlett, for the prosecution, was not called upon.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case the prisoner voluntarily tendered himself as a witness, and gave his account of the facts. It would, perhaps, have been a more complete direction to the jury if they had been told that the evidence of the prisoner was only admissible on the first count of the indictment, and that they should determine the second count as far as they could without reference to his evidence. But I am not at all sure that this is necessary, because, by these Acts of Parliament, the whole status of prisoners in respect of evidence given on oath is now altered. The admission of a prisoner was always receivable in evidence if not made upon oath, and now it is competent to a prisoner, upon a certain charge being made against him, to make a statement upon oath. If he chooses to avail himself of this privilege, and if, in giving his evidence, he makes any admissions, I think those admissions must stand upon the same footing as an admission formerly stood when made by a prisoner, since the law now sanctions the oath being administered, which it formerly did not.

In all probability the chairman did direct the jury that there were two cases presented for their consideration, the one quite clear, and the other a case upon which they might convict upon a certain view of the evidence. But whether there was or was not any misdirection is not a question which is open to this court, inasmuch as it is not stated in the case.

I think the prisoner's statements were rightly before the jury, and that the conviction is good.

THE QUEEN v. THOMAS WEALAND. (a.)

Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), ss. 4, 9—Evidence given not upon oath—Conviction for common assault.

Upon the hearing of a charge under section 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, the evidence of a child had been received, though not given upon oath.

Held, that such evidence was admissible to support a conviction for a common assault under section 9 of the same statute.

The prisoner had been tried before Hawkins, J., at the Central Criminal Court upon an indictment under section 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), charging him with unlawfully and carnally knowing Eliza Wheal, a girl under the age of thirteen years—to wit, of the age of five years and nine months.

The evidence of Eliza Wheal was received, though not given upon oath, under the provision contained in the same section of the Act, and she was corroborated as required.

The jury acquitted the accused of the charge under the 4th section, but found him guilty of an indecent assault under section 9.

Without the girl's evidence the evidence would have been insufficient to justify a conviction.

In the statute there is nothing to make the evidence of the girl admissible without oath upon a simple indictment for indecent assault.

The only question for this court was whether the conviction could, under the circumstances, be supported.

No counsel appeared.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This case involves a question of some importance, upon which there have been conflicting opinions, and which it is, therefore, desirable to have finally settled. I am of opinion that the conviction was perfectly good, and that, on the words of the statute, evidence is receivable under section 4, even although the conviction is obtained under section 9. The consequences may be somewhat anomalous, in that if the prisoner had been indicted for the lesser offence most material evidence could not have been given, while it would involve serious results if a prisoner were to be indicted for the serious offence in order to let in such evidence when it is only really proposed to prove the lesser offence.

W. E. Moore, late of Dunster, in the county of Somerset, died on January 4, 1888, leaving a will executed by which he appointed J. Campbell Ker and William Aubert his executors and trustees. The property of the deceased, which was of considerable value, consisted of jewellery, precious stones, coins, &c., and a reversionary interest. Before any application for probate was made, and within a few days after the testator's death, the executor, William Aubert, began to intermeddle with the estate by depositing precious stones to the value of £1,000 in the National Safe Deposit Co. in his own name; he went through the deceased's papers and destroyed some of them; he also made preparations, without consulting his co-executor, for a sale of the furniture, pictures, plate, linen, &c. The other executor remonstrated against these proceedings before probate, and, not receiving any satisfactory answer, proposed to issue a writ claiming an injunction to restrain the defendant, Aubert, from removing, dealing, or interfering with the property of the testator, and for the appointment of a receiver until the granting of probate of the will, and for an order that all property of the estate of the deceased standing in defendant's name be transferred by the defendant into the name and to the order of the receiver. He accordingly, as required in probate actions by ord. 5, r. 15, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, filed an affidavit in verification of the indorsement on the writ. MAGNUS v. QUEENSLAND NATIONAL BANK. (a.)

Mortgagor and mortgagee—Bank—Loan on security of stock by joint holders—Re-transfer to one only—Bank's liability for loss of stock.

A stockbroker obtained a loan from a bank of which he was a customer, on the security of a transfer of stock which was vested in himself and two other persons upon certain trusts, he being the acting trustee. He procured the co-trustee's execution of the deed of transfer by proposing to sell the stock and buy certain other stock instead. The transfer was expressed to be for a nominal consideration, and in favour of two persons named, who were trustees for the bank, and the bank believed that their customer was authorized by the transfer to pledge the stock to them. The customer subsequently paid off the loan, when the bank, instead of re-transferring the stock to the three former holders, without notice to them caused it to be transferred to buyers from their customer, and he received the price. He then bought therewith the same stock, as proposed to his co-trustees, but in his sole name. This he afterwards sold, and appropriated the proceeds to his own use. In an account which he delivered later to his co-trustees, he included this stock as part of the trust fund, and went on accounting to his cestui que trusts for the dividends. He absconded and became bankrupt, and the co-trustees sought to make the bank liable for the original stock.

Held, that the bank, by allowing the purchase-money of the stock to get into the hands of the customer without the consent of his co-trustees, had occasioned the loss to the trust estate, and were therefore liable to make it good. Decision of Kay, J. (35 W. R. 752, 36 Ch. D. 25), reversed.

Appeal from a decision of Kay, J. (reported 35 W. R. 752, 36 Ch. D. 25).

The facts are fully stated in the report of the case in the court below, and also in the judgment of Cotton, L.J., and may be sufficiently gathered from the above headnote.

Cur. adv. vult.

(a.) Reported by W. IVIMEY COOK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Jan. 27.—Lord HALSBURY, C.—In this case it is not denied that the defendant bank are in default. They received from three persons a certain amount of railway stock as security for a loan, and upon the loan being paid off (I will deal presently with the form of loan) the bank transferred the stock to purchasers, and allowed the purchase-money to be received by one of the three. Now it is not denied that, upon general principles, the bank were under an obligation, having received the stock from the three, to restore it to the three upon the repayment of the money which they had advanced. The doubts that I entertained in the course of the argument were, whether it could properly be alleged that the loss which is complained of, and against which relief is sought in these proceedings, was consequent upon the breach of duty by the bank. I am, however, disposed to think it clear that when once the fact is established that money belonging to this trust has got into the hands of one of the three trustees without the consent of the others, and that by the default of the bank we are not at liberty to speculate whether the same result might not have followed whether the bank had been guilty of that default or not. The bank have, in fact, been guilty of default.

As a matter of fact they concurred in the money being handed to a person who had no authority, in my view of the facts, to receive it. They ought to have taken care that the three persons interested in the fund should receive the money, and they have not done so. I think the evidence, to which reference was made, is rather calculated to mislead one from the true question which the court has to determine. I was very much struck by the accounts which were rendered to the two other trustees in the month of February; but upon looking at them more carefully those accounts are perfectly consistent with a strict compliance by the defaulting trustee with the authority conferred upon him by his fellows. Those accounts would have borne exactly the same appearance—would have exhibited the same results—if, instead of doing what has been done, the defaulting trustee had performed the function which he was intrusted to perform, and sold for the purpose of re-investing in the other investment authorized by the other trustees. In truth, the sole question which, as it appears to me, the court has a right to determine is, whether upon these facts the authority which was given to the defaulting trustee to sell was pursued? He had authority to dispose of the stock for the purpose of sale—the ultimate object being re-investment in another form of security, and he placed in the hands of the bank that which was trust property, the bank knowing at the time that two other persons were interested in it. When the money advanced by the bank was repaid the bank had before them the fact that two other persons were interested in the stock, and without authority from them, or notice to them, they pay the purchase-money of that stock, or allow it to be paid, to one. I think that the loss to the trust happened when, instead of being re-invested in the names of the three trustees, it was placed in the hands of Goldsmid alone. The inference I should derive from the evidence would be this—not what was urged upon us, that this gentleman was intrusted by his co-trustees with plenary authority to do whatever he pleased, but in fact that they trusted to him so much that whenever he came to them and said, "Now I have got a fresh investment to make, you will sanction it, and I will send a proper transfer," they did it, and I have very little doubt that he might have defrauded the trust in some other way. But as a matter of fact the specific authority given to him with reference to this particular investment was confined to the particular instrument which they then executed; and, as I say, I am not entitled to speculate whether he might have cheated his co-trustees in any other form. As a matter of fact, what he did was this. There was no authority from the other trustees to the bank to allow this money to be paid to any but the three; and under those circumstances it seems to me that the loss has happened by reason of the default of the bank, and that the bank is, therefore, responsible. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the learned judge below should be affirmed.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The facts are short but I think I had better state them. On the 27th of January, 1882, the bank received from Goldsmid, who was a customer of theirs, a transfer executed by him and by his co-trustees (I shall deal afterwards with the question raised by Mr. Rigby whether in this case we ought to hold that there was an effectual transfer), and they took that transfer from him as security for a loan, the transfer being to certain persons who were their officers and trustees for them. Now that advance which was made to Goldsmid was paid off before the 15th of February, and then the bank, knowing, as appeared on the face of the transaction, that the equity of redemption belonged not to Goldsmid alone, but to him and his two co-trustees, do not re-transfer to Goldsmid and to his two co-trustees, but, by the direction of Goldsmid, they sell the stock to purchasers and allow Goldsmid to receive the money.

Now as the loan which they had made had been paid off, although the transferees, the purchasers, got a good title as against the co-trustees, the bank would be liable to account for the money which they got for those shares. If the purchasers had known the facts they would not have got a good title, but as they did not know them they got a good title, but the bank was accountable to the trustees for the purchase-money. The only defence they could set up would be that they paid the money to, or allowed it to be received by, a person authorized on behalf of the trustee to receive and give a good discharge for it. Now we must consider whether in fact Goldsmid had on that sale any authority whatever to receive and give a discharge for the money. As I understand the case made by the bank is this: Goldsmid was a trustee, but he was also a broker; he was authorized by his co-trustees to sell, and if he was authorized as a broker to sell, that must carry with it an authority to receive the purchase-money arising from the sale, since in the ordinary course it is paid to the broker. But we must look at the evidence for the purpose of seeing what authority was really given to Goldsmid, and I think that we must decide the case as regards his authority by the documents which are before us. I think so for this reason. Although undoubtedly in cross-examination, one at least of the plaintiffs, if not both of them, said, "Well, I suppose I authorized Goldsmid to sell," yet that is only when they were referred to the transfer which had been executed by them, and of course they would say, "Well, looking at that, I cannot deny that I gave him authority to do what I contemplated would be done by that instrument of transfer." But the documents begin by a letter of the 26th of January, the day before the execution of the transfer, and that is a letter not to both of the trustees, but to one of the trustees, written by Mr. Goldsmid saying that he intended and advised a change of investment by selling the London and Brighton Stock, and by investing in North-Eastern, and then he says, "If you agree I will bring or send to you the transfers." We do not know what then took place except that one of the trustees went to the office of Goldsmid and there executed the transfer, as appears by the attestation, and the other executed it also.

Now, in my opinion, after that letter, the trustees might reasonably have considered, and would have considered, that the instrument which was so sent was to carry into effect that which had been proposed by Goldsmid to them—that is to say, they looked upon it as a transfer in order to effect a sale which undoubtedly they knew was intended, and undoubtedly they assented to its being done by means of that instrument. It is [illegible] that the instrument which they executed was expressed to be for a nominal consideration of 5s., and [illegible] therefore, they could not have meant it to be the instrument to give effect to what they had authorized—[illegible] sale of the securities and reinvestment in a different stock. But in my opinion not only do they say [illegible] they are certain that they never executed an instrument with a nominal consideration, but I think that the proper inference is that the trustees, relying as they did on [illegible] of their number who was also a broker, when, after the letter, an instrument was sent to them which was a transfer of this stock, with a sufficient stamp upon it would not look to see whether it was for a nominal consideration only, but would consider that it was executed in order to carry the sale into effect, in order that by that instrument there might be a sale and conversion into money of stock to be reinvested in other stock. And undoubtedly they must be taken to have authorized him as a broker to carry into effect the transaction of which that transfer was to be part. Now it was [illegible] here, I think both by Mr. Cookson and by Mr. Rigby, that this instrument, this transfer for a nominal consideration to certain persons who were to be trustees, was [illegible] of the ordinary mode in which brokers deal with property which they have to sell, but there was no [illegible] to that effect, and I should think it decidedly contrary, reason, because on the transfer of this security, even [illegible] nominal consideration, a heavy stamp had to be paid [illegible] it was not suggested by any person knowing anything about such transactions that a transfer to trustees where a broker is authorized to sell is part of the ordinary way of carrying out the sale. The only document referred to before Kay, J., besides the transfer [illegible] was an account of October, 1884, in which the sale of this stock was mentioned and in which the re-investment in different stock in the names of the trustees of [illegible] never took place was also mentioned. But what [illegible] more striking was an account which was rendered [illegible] previous date—we do not know when—an account down to the 15th of February, 1882. But to my mind although it is undisputed here that the co-trustees authorized a sale by Goldsmid as broker in accordance with the tranfer which they had executed, yet [illegible] no way shows that they gave him any [illegible] authority.

It is entirely consistent with their supposing and believing that he, as broker, had acted on that transfer which they had given to him, and that he then had invested the money. Now Goldsmid did not use the authority which was given to him to transfer the stock to a purchaser by means of that transfer executed by his co-trustees, he used that transfer improperly to obtain, for his own purposes, a loan from his bank, and, in my opinion, that does not justify the bank in saying that his co-trustees authorized him as broker to act for them in a subsequent sale by the bank. In my opinion the judge was quite right, though he expressed his opinion in somewhat different language from [illegible] I have done, in saying that the authority of Goldsmid as a broker was at an end before this sale by the bank. I say in different language, but to the same effect, that there is nothing to justify us in holding that Goldsmid as broker, was authorized to act as broker for the trustees on the occasion of a sale not by the trustees but by the bank, and, therefore, in my opinion, the bank having taken upon themselves to act on his authority, and having paid to him the purchase-money [illegible] person authorized on behalf of his co-trustees to receive it, must take the consequences of his not being authorized, and must be liable to pay the purchase-money to the trustees, to whom they knew that [illegible] ought to have re-transferred the property.

I should mention a point to which I said that I should revert—that urged by Mr. Rigby—that the [illegible] made by the pleadings, which we must assume to be correct, is that this transfer was not executed so as to be an effectual transfer. The statement of claim does undoubtedly allege that it had never been executed by the plaintiffs so as to be a perfect instrument. But the bank say entirely the contrary, and as they allege that it was a perfect instrument when brought to them, we thought, in my opinion, to decide, notwithstanding the allegation in the statement of claim, in accordance with that which, as between these parties and against the bank, must be taken to be the true state of things. There was no evidence in support of the allegation in the statement of claim, and we have the allegation and statement by the bank to the contrary, they being the persons who received this instrument when it was executed. Then there is one other point with which one ought to deal. It was urged very strongly that the negligence of the trustees was the real cause of the loss to the trust, and I agree that they were negligent. They ought to have seen that the North-Eastern stock had been put into their names. It never was. But in the view which I take of the case it is not necessary to consider that point, because, if the bank having this stock, in respect of which, the loan having been paid off, they were accountable to the trustees, paid the money arising from that property, not to the trustees, nor to any person authorized by the trustees to give a good receipt for it, they, in my opinion, must be held answerable to the trustees just as if the money was still in their hands. In my opinion the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—The question we have to decide is a very short one—namely, whether the property of a trust has been lost through any wrongful conduct on the part of the bank. It will be found, I think, upon reflection, that the strength of the argument on behalf of the appellants rests upon a fallacious and misleading use of the expression, "loss caused by the conduct of the bank," and that the learned counsel for the appellants in pressing home the argument that, whatever the conduct of the bank may have been, it did not cause the loss to the estate, was using the term in a popular and not a legal sense, and one which is not sufficient to support the proposition. When was the property of the trust lost? At the time when it first passed into unauthorized hands. The contention of the plaintiffs is, that the bank, knowing, as they must have known, that they were mere mortgagees, believing, as they no doubt believed, that Goldsmid had authority to mortgage to them, but having no reason to suppose that he had authority to do anything else, had no right when the purchase-money from the ultimate purchaser found its way into their hands, to transfer that purchase-money to Goldsmid, he having no actual authority to receive it, and no apparent authority to receive it. If that proposition is made out then the loss occurred at the moment when the trust money was diverted by the bank into hands which were not authorized to receive it. The case accordingly turns upon this—had Goldsmid authority to receive the purchase-money, or had the bank the right to suppose, from the way in which the stock had been dealt with, that he had such authority? It seems to me that he certainly had no such authority in fact. He cannot, in my opinion, be held to have had any further authority than that which can be collected either from the documents or from the accounts, for I entirely assent to what has been said by the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Justice, that the general language used in cross-examination by the trustees is not really a statement by them of any incidents present to their own memory, but merely a summing up in general language of what they themselves deemed to be a reasonable deduction to be made from the documents already in evidence. We must, therefore, look to the documents to see what was the authority conferred upon Goldsmid.

Before we begin we must ask ourselves what the state of the crucial and important document was at the time it passed into his hands from the trustees. It was said on one side that it was not filled up but was in blank at the time when the trustees passed it to him, and on the other that it must be taken to have been at that time filled up in the way in which it now appears to be filled up. It is a question of onus of evidence, and it seems to me, though I do not in any way dissent or desire to express any different opinion from that which has fallen from the Lord Justice, that the question may be decided by applying the simple principle of law that, in the absence of evidence, no illegality or irregular proceeding in the transaction of business is to be presumed. It is to be presumed that the law has been carried out, not that it has been broken. The document, therefore, I think, must be taken in the first instance to have passed into the hands of Goldsmid in the form in which he used it. What was the authority of which that document is the evidence? The accounts which were afterwards accepted show no more than that the trustees imagined that whatever had been done had been done regularly; they fall short of showing that they were at all aware of what had really occurred. It seems to me that the document in question is only evidence of an authority at most to sell the shares and raise the money in the ordinary and usual way in which such a document would be used for the purpose. Either the trustees must be taken to have read the document, which is in a peculiar form, or not to have read it. If they had read it they would have seen, I think, that they were committing a breach of trust in signing a document in that shape; that they ought to have seen that the proper names of the purchasers and the proper statement of the consideration appeared on the document itself. If they did not read it they must have assumed that they were placing an ordinary document in ordinary shape in the hands of their broker, and they cannot be considered to have intrusted him with anything more than an authority to sell the shares in the ordinary business way. But it seems to me he had no authority to sell the shares in the irregular way in which he did, by first mortgaging, by then paying off the mortgage, and by then nominating persons to whom the legal estate should be conveyed by the mortgagees, and who should pay the purchase-money to the bankers, who were to pay it over again to himself. But had the bank any right to assume that there was such authority? The document itself, which expresses no consideration except that of 5s., is, to my mind, cogent and complete evidence to show that the bank, as, indeed, appears from the facts generally, had nothing at all to lead them to suppose that Goldsmid's authority was anything beyond what it really was. Indeed, the learned counsel for the appellants hardly argued this matter upon the view that Goldsmid had an apparent authority in excess of his acting as broker.

Now, as soon as the conclusion is arrived at that Goldsmid had no authority to receive the purchase-money, it seems to me that the conclusion of the learned judge in the court below follows. We were asked, indeed, to believe that whatever the breach of duty on the part of the bank was, it did not ultimately lead to the loss to the fund which has been sustained. That really is an illusion; it is an ocular illusion to present the case in that way. The loss occurred as soon as the money which belonged to the trust was diverted into the hands of a person who had no right to represent the trust. The proposition presented to us by the appellants, if divested of its popular and specious look, is this, that we ought not to visit those who lose trust property with the consequence of having to make it good, provided it can be shown or surmised that, if they had made it good, somebody else would have lost it over again. Is that a tenable proposition? A man knocks me down in Pall Mall, and when I complain that my purse has been taken the man says: "Oh, but if I had handed it back again you would have been robbed over again by somebody else in the adjoining street." That is the argument of the learned counsel for the appellants as soon as the proposition for which they have contended is reduced to its bare bones. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

An action for sale under the Partition Acts having been brought by two tenants in common, one of whom, stated to be of weak mind, sued by the other as his next friend, the court held that an action in this form, being primâ facie for his benefit, could be maintained, and refused to strike out his name as co-plaintiff.

Semble, a request for sale at the trial by a next friend on behalf of a person of unsound mind not so found, assuming that such a request can be effectually made, cannot be acted upon in the same way as a request by a person not under disability, nor unless the court is satisfied that the sale is for his benefit.

This was an appeal from North, J. (reported 32 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 91).

The question was whether a partition action can be brought by a person of unsound mind, not so found, by a next friend.

This action was brought by Edward Endymion Porter and William Henry Porter (a person of weak mind, by his brother and next friend, the said E. E. Porter) against Florence Susanna Porter; and the claim was for a declaration that a sale of real estate (to which the plaintiffs and defendant and three other persons were absolutely entitled in equal shares) would be more beneficial than a partition, and that a sale might be ordered, and for ancillary relief.

A motion was made on behalf of the defendant and the plaintiff, William H. Porter, that the name of William H. Porter might be struck out as plaintiff, and that an allegation contained in the statement of claim that he was of weak mind and unable to manage his affairs or attend to business might be struck out as being unnecessary, scandalous, or irrelevant.

North, J., refused the motion.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of North, J., dismissing a motion on behalf of the defendant to strike out the name of one of the plaintiffs, who is described as of unsound mind, and consequentially to strike out certain allegations in the statement of claim. The question does not now arise as to what the court ought to do at the trial of the action, whether it should without inquiry treat as sufficient an assent to a sale request for a sale given or made on behalf of the person of unsound mind by his next friend. In my opinion the Act of 1868, s. 4, does not make it imperative on the court to direct a sale where such a majority as is mentioned desires it, but only says that the court may order a sale, unless it sees good reason to the contrary. I think that, without deciding that the next friend of a person of unsound mind is not the person to make a request, it is not a matter of course that the court, where the majority is obtained under circumstances like those of the present case, will direct a sale without considering what is for the benefit of the person of unsound mind. To act upon such a consent without inquiry would enable a person who took upon himself the position of next friend to obtain a sale without there being anything to satisfy the court (as is necessary in the case of a lunatic with a committee) that the sale is for the benefit of the person of unsound mind. The court, I think, may say, "Although there is the request of the next friend is authorized to give, I shall not order a sale unless it is shown to be for the benefit of the lunatic. The Act says I shall direct a sale unless I see good reason to the contrary, and until the sale is shown to be for the benefit of the lunatic I do see good reason to the contrary."

But, as I have said, that question does not yet arise. The case to be made out by the applicants must be that before the Act of 1868, such an action could have been brought by a next friend on behalf of a person of unsound mind, and I do not think that such was the law.

What is the principle on which the court allows a person of unsound mind to sue by a next friend? When the person is incapable of acting for himself the court allows any one of the Queen's subjects to take proceedings on his behalf as regards that which is primâ facie for his benefit. In my opinion a partition is, primâ facie, for the benefit of a holder of an undivided share. That was recognized by the Act of Hen. 8, giving the right of partition, and although that Act of Parliament has gone, yet an action for partition is merely obtained in a different way the benefit intended to be given without action by that statute to all persons who were tenants in common. I think therefore that, primâ facie, an action for partition is for the benefit of the person who is of unsound mind, and who holds an undivided share in the property.

Now, is it for the plaintiff, bringing such an action, to show that it is really, in this particular case, for his benefit? I think not. It is for those who suggest that the action is not duly constituted to show that it cannot be really for the benefit of the person of unsound mind. I do not say what would be required to satisfy the court in coming to that conclusion; that, I think, is what a person who objects to the use of the name of a person of unsound mind as plaintiff ought to make out in order to induce the court to say that, if the person of unsound mind is the only plaintiff, the action must not go on, or that, if he is one of several plaintiffs, his name must be struck out.

Now, do the Acts of Parliament make any difference? I do not think that they do. They enable the court in a suit for partition to direct a sale, and, that being so, it does not make the action improper that the plaintiff alleges that a sale will be more beneficial than a partition, and then asks the court for a sale. The action, which is primâ facie for his benefit, does not become improper because he asks for something which he may not be able to get.

No doubt the case of Halfhide v. Robinson causes a difficulty, but James, L.J., does not lay down that there can be no bill filed for partition by a person of unsound mind by his next friend, he only asks whether there is any authority for it. I asked whether there was any authority one way or the other, but none could be produced. The question is whether we are not bound by what was said by James, L.J., at the end of his judgment: "I wish it to be understood that a bill cannot be filed by a next friend on behalf of a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition for dealing with his real estate. The consequences of such a course might be monstrous." I think to a considerable extent the difficulty is obviated by the 6th section of the Act of 1868, which recognizes the fact that, as regards the property of persons of unsound mind, the guardian ad litem, and possibly also the next friend, has authority to consent to a sale of the property. That seems to show that without applying in Lunacy a sale may be directed of their real estate of a person of unsound mind. I think what James, L.J., meant was in substance this: "There is a mode given by the Legislature under the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1862, which enables the sale to be made in a different way, and that is the proper course to be taken; and it is improper that a bill should be filed for a sale in order to avoid adopting the course to be taken under the Lunacy Regulation Acts." In that case, as was pointed out by Mr. Cozens-Hardy, the court was not asked to carry out an order for sale made in a lunacy action. Apparently the application was not under any of the provisions of the Act, but was by a petition presented in the suit, not for carrying the decree into effect, but for vesting the share of a person who was of unsound mind in one of the other parties to the suit. Taking the judgment of James, L.J., reasonably, I think he only meant that the course taken was not the proper course, but that there should be a petition to the Lords Justices under the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1862, and then the court might make the order. If I had felt that James, L.J., had really decided the point which we have now to decide, such respect is due to his opinion that I should not give the judgment which I have given, but my opinion is that which I have stated, and I do not think that Halfhide v. Robinson ought to prevent me from acting upon it. The application ought to have been by the defendant alone, but as it is refused it is not necessary to amend it.

BOWEN, L.J.—This application is made on the broad ground that an action for partition cannot be brought by a next friend on behalf of a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition, and that as a person of unsound mind cannot by his next friend bring such an action himself, so he cannot be joined as a plaintiff in a suit for the same thing in another shape. Mr. Cook-Crackanthorpe says that before the Act of 1868 no such action for partition could be brought, and that there is nothing in the Acts to alter the law in that respect. This argument rests upon the dictum of James, L.J., apparently assented to by Mellish, L.J., in Halfhide v. Robinson, which has been read by Cotton, L.J. Before discussing that case and seeing whether we are bound by it or not, or to what extent it is a binding authority, I should like to examine the proposition in order to see on what principle it can rest. Why, in the first place, should it be confined to real property? and, secondly, what is the true ground upon which a next friend is allowed to ask for the intervention of the court on behalf of a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition? It seems to me to be this, as was said in substance in Beall v. Smith, 22 W. R. 121, L. R. 9 Ch. 85, and Jones v. Lloyd, that when there is a person of unsound mind who, although not so found by inquisition, nevertheless stands in need of the protection or the intervention of the court as regards his property, real or personal, then supposing he would, if sane, be entitled to the intervention of the court, a third person, a stranger, may come forward and do that which is clearly for the benefit of the person of weak mind. That that is the ground for suing by a next friend is shown by the judgment in Jones v. Lloyd if it were not otherwise clear. In that case a bill was filed for a dissolution of partnership which alleged a dissolution to be for the benefit of the person of unsound mind, and on demurrer the Master of the Rolls held that the allegation was sufficient to justify the bill, and therefore overruled the demurrer. He cited with approval the language of James, L.J., in Beall v. Smith.

Now what sort of limit ought to be put on that rule? It is obvious that, in the absence of the principal person concerned, his property ought to be left, as far as possible, and so far as his interest permits, in the condition in which it was, quieta non movere. But still, if it is for his obvious benefit, then the court ought to interfere to give him, while his senses are sleeping, the same sort of protection to which he would be entitled if they were awake and he could act for himself.

We have, in this case, to apply these considerations to an action for partition. A partition, as we all know, has for some centuries been recognized as being generally a benefit to persons who share property with others. When an action for partition is brought it certainly may be for the benefit of the person of unsound mind, and it is primâ facie to be presumed to be so. The question is, are we to stop it on the threshold on the mere suggestion that it is not an action which can possibly be for his benefit. I am disposed to think that the court, before making a decree dealing with a person's property at the instance of a plaintiff who is also the next friend, ought to be satisfied that it is interfering for the benefit or for the protection of the person of unsound mind; but that is a point to be considered at the trial.

Then I come back to the question, ought the case to be stopped in limine? If the appellant's counsel could have shown that this was an abuse of the process of the court, and that the partition action was not bonâ fide for the benefit of the lunatic, then, even at this early stage, the court might have done what is asked. But there is before us no evidence whatever to justify us in supposing that this action will not be for the benefit of the person of unsound mind. If he turns out to be of unsound mind at the trial that will be a matter to be considered before the court can make an order at the instance of a stranger affecting his property. The Lord Justice, I believe, agrees with me in that. The court ought to be satisfied, so to speak, of the title of the next friend to intervene, and that the person is of unsound mind, and that he stands in need of protection as regards his property, and it ought to be shown that it would be for his interest that the court should exercise its jurisdiction. It is not necessary to decide as a matter of strict law upon whom the onus rests of showing that a partition is for his benefit. When the case comes on for trial the question of onus and matters of that sort will have faded into unimportance, and the court will sift the whole thing and consider it.

I therefore can see nothing in reason to prevent an action for partition being maintained, when it is for the benefit of the alleged lunatic, that it should be so maintained by a next friend or a stranger, before the Act of 1876; and this is not the moment at which, nor have we the materials on which to decide, that this action is not bonâ fide brought with a view to the lunatic's benefit.

Then, if that is so, what we have to consider is really, not whether the Act of 1876, s. 6, creates this right, but we have only to see that it does not destroy it. I can see nothing in the section that prevents an action for partition being brought in any case where it could be brought before that Act was passed. I abstain from giving an opinion upon the construction of section 6, not because I have not a view upon the subject, but because this is not the time for expressing it. It will remain for serious consideration hereafter whether section 6 enables a request to be made by a next friend, and, if so, in what way, and whether the court is bound to attend to it if made.

As regards the case of Halfhide v. Robinson, I entirely concur in the view taken by Cotton, L.J. It seems to me to be distinguishable on the ground which has been stated. I do not fail to observe that in that particular case the person of unsound mind who sued by his next friend was the sole plaintiff, and the peculiar circumstances of that case were no doubt the pivot on which the reasoning in the mind of James, L.J., turned.

Bankruptcy—Disqualifications of bankrupt—Certificate that bankruptcy was caused by "misfortune without misconduct"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 32, sub-section 2 (b).

In a suit for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's alleged adultery, the jury found that the wife had not committed adultery, and the petition was dismissed. In consequence of the costs incurred in these proceedings the petitioner was adjudicated bankrupt. Subsequently the bankrupt, having obtained an immediate unconditional order of discharge, applied, under section 32, sub-section 2 (b), for a certificate that "his bankruptcy was caused by misfortune, without any misconduct on his part."

Held, that the certificate must be refused, as the bankruptcy was not caused by "misfortune," the bankruptcy being solely caused by the costs incurred in the divorce proceedings which the bankrupt had commenced of his own free will, and which were under his complete control.

Appeal by Lord Colin Campbell from the decision of Mr. Registrar Giffard refusing to grant him a certificate under section 32, sub-section 2 (b), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, that his bankruptcy was caused by "misfortune without any misconduct on his part."

The appellant had presented a petition for dissolution of marriage on the ground of his wife's alleged adultery with four co-respondents. The jury found that the wife had not committed adultery, and the petition was dismissed, the appellant being ordered to pay the costs. Subsequently, in May, 1887, a receiving order was made against the appellant upon the petition of one of the co-respondents, the petitioning creditor's debt amounting to £971, the amount of his taxed costs in the divorce suit, and the appellant was adjudicated bankrupt. His unsecured liabilities amounted to £8,622, of which £4,943 were for costs in the divorce suit, including the costs due to his own solicitors, and his assets amounted to about £144. He attributed his bankruptcy entirely to the result of the divorce proceedings, and to the costs thereby incurred, the trial having lasted eighteen days. It appeared that his wife first presented a petition for dissolution of marriage, and that he then, acting upon the advice of counsel, presented his petition. The wife's petition was also dismissed.

On the 21st of December, 1887, the appellant obtained an immediate unconditional order of discharge, and he thereupon applied for a certificate as above. The registrar refused the certificate on the ground that the bankruptcy was not caused by "misfortune."

Section 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides that "(1) Where a debtor is adjudged bankrupt he shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be disqualified for, &c. (enumerating the disqualifications); (2) The disqualifications to which a bankrupt is subject under this section shall be removed and cease if and when (a) the adjudication of bankruptcy against him is annulled, or (b) he obtains from the court his discharge with a certificate to the effect that his bankruptcy was caused by misfortune without any misconduct on his part."

Finlay, Q.C., and H. Reed, for the appellant.—His bankruptcy was caused by misfortune. The appellant acted upon the advice of counsel in instituting the divorce proceedings, and he acted bonâ fide throughout. He had reasonable grounds, upon the evidence of his own witnesses, for instituting the proceedings. He could not foresee the evidence on the other side, nor could he foresee the length of the trial, which increased the costs enormously. Misfortune is a piece of ill-luck happening to a man without his fault. Misfortune denotes the same idea as "without misconduct." The misfortune here was the unforeseen verdict of the jury.

They referred to Webster's Dictionary and Johnson's Dictionary, "Misfortune."

Sidney Woolf, for the trustee.—It was misconduct for a man of such slender means as the appellant to institute the divorce proceedings. He knew that if he failed he would not be able to pay the costs. His bankruptcy, therefore, was not caused "without misconduct." At any rate his bankruptcy was not caused by misfortune. He was responsible for the divorce proceedings. "Misfortune" has been defined to be something unforeseen that came upon a man without any possibility of remedy, or which could not be guarded against: Ex parte Burgess, 35 W. R. 702, 4 Morrell's Bank. Rep. 186, at p. 188.

Finlay, Q.C., replied.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—We must first express our opinion as to the construction of section 32 without regard to the circumstances of the present case. One ought first to consider section 28, though the two sections are not connected with each other. In section 28 certain cases are enumerated which, if they occurred, would prevent the bankrupt from obtaining an unconditional order of discharge. They may be called cases of misconduct. Section 32 deals with cases where a discharge has been obtained, and cannot come into operation where there has been such misconduct as will prevent a bankrupt getting his discharge under section 28. Yet section 32 is a highly penal section, imposing disabilities as to a bankrupt's future life. It must therefore be construed strictly, but at the same time no words must be struck out, and the words must receive their ordinary meaning. Section 32 enacts certain disqualifications attaching to a discharged bankrupt from the mere fact of bankruptcy, with a proviso that those disqualifications shall be removed and cease if and when the adjudication of bankruptcy against him is annulled, or he obtains from the court his discharge with a certificate that his bankruptcy was caused by misfortune without any misconduct on his part. Those words must be construed strictly, but, as I have said, we cannot strike out any of the words, nor can we give them a meaning other than their ordinary meaning. We have no right to strike out the word "misfortune." Mr. Finlay asked us in effect to do so, because he argued that if there were no misconduct there was misfortune. To accede to that argument we should have to read the words thus, "that the bankruptcy was caused without any misconduct." I cannot think that we are entitled to strike out the word misfortune.

Now it is impossible for me, considering the great number of different cases that may hereafter come before the court, to give an exhaustive definition of the word "misfortune" which will cover all cases. Still, I think that when the bankruptcy is not solely the result of some accident over which or over the direct conducing causes of which the bankrupt has no control, then the bankruptcy is not caused by misfortune. When the bankruptcy is caused partly by misfortune and partly by misconduct, and the misfortune is wholly independent of the misconduct, the certificate cannot be granted. The bankruptcy, therefore, must be solely the result of some accident over which or over the direct conducing causes of which the bankrupt has no control to bring the case within the words, "bankruptcy caused by misfortune without misconduct."

I come now to the facts of the present case. The accident which caused the bankruptcy was the adverse verdict of the jury. A verdict of a jury must, in a court of justice, be assumed to be a right verdict. Therefore the bankruptcy was caused by a right and proper verdict. The direct conducing cause of the verdict was the presentation of the petition and the prosecution of the proceedings. All that was absolutely within the control of Lord Colin Campbell. The suit was brought by him and the evidence was produced under his direction. Therefore the direct cause of the verdict was his presenting the petition and carrying on the proceedings up to the verdict. Whether the effect of the evidence produced on behalf of the respondent and co-respondents was to throw doubt upon the petitioner's evidence or not, the result was that the petitioner commenced a suit which his evidence failed to establish. Therefore the direct cause of the verdict was under the control of Lord Colin Campbell. Without saying that there was any misconduct on his part, and without expressing any opinion whether it was too rash for him to institute the proceedings under the circumstances, we must dismiss the appeal on the ground that the appellant has not brought his case within the provisions of section 32, sub-section 2 (b).

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Misfortune is a word as familiar in common language as it is in the affairs of ordinary life. But this is the first time, so far as I know, that it is used in a section of an Act of Parliament. The difficulty of defining it arises from the vague thought expressed by the word. We must look at the connection in which the word is used. Section 32 imposes certain disqualifications upon a person who has been adjudged bankrupt, those disqualifications ranging from the House of Lords to a select vestry. The guiding notion underlying this legislation seems to be that he who has made shipwreck of his own affairs is not fit to be trusted with the management of other persons'. By sub-section 2, however, the disqualifications may be removed by the adjudication being annulled, or by the court granting a certificate that the bankruptcy was caused by misfortune without any misconduct on his part, and the refusal of the certificate is to be subject to appeal. That enactment throws the onus of proof upon the bankrupt. He has to make out that his bankruptcy was caused by misfortune without any misconduct on his part. The Legislature seemed to think that there might be circumstances under which a person might be made bankrupt without any slur resting upon him. That seems to be the general notion of the clause. Mr. Finlay urged that that view was not the correct one, because the adjudication might be annulled merely upon payment of the creditors in full. The Legislature, however, may well have considered that if a bankrupt is able at a later date to pay his debts in full, either by means of friends or out of his own earnings, he has shown sufficient control over himself to entitle him to be rehabilitated. A man might lose his money by an unforeseen misfortune, and in that case there could be no doubt bankruptcy would be caused by misfortune without misconduct. On the other hand, if a man lost his fortune by gambling, his bankruptcy would not be caused by misfortune. Like the Master of the Rolls, I shall not attempt to give an exhaustive definition of "misfortune." We are as yet at too early a stage of the legislative development of the word. Nevertheless, we may take some steps towards a definition. For the purposes of this case I think that "misfortune" must be an adverse event not immediately dependent upon the action and will of him who suffers from it, and of so unexpected a character that a prudent man would not take it into his calculation. Mr. Finlay says that misfortune means without misconduct. I cannot agree with that construction. Coming, then, to the facts of this case, it appears that a man of slender means filed a petition in the Divorce Court, being under the impression that he would be successful. He failed, and had to pay the costs, and thereupon he was adjudicated bankrupt. I cannot think that the bankruptcy was caused by "misfortune" without any misconduct on his part. The whole control of the action rested with him. The proceedings were directly dependent upon the will and under the control of the petitioner, and so I cannot come to the conclusion that the bankruptcy was caused by misfortune without misconduct within section 32, sub-section 2 (b).

Lopes, L.J.—I also do not profess to give an exhaustive definition of the phrase "misfortune without misconduct." "Misfortune," however, must be an adverse event over which the person has no control, and over which he could not by ordinary prudence have any control. In my opinion, when the party to proceedings is master of those proceedings throughout, and bankruptcy ensues therefrom, the bankruptcy cannot be said to be caused by misfortune. I cannot agree with the argument that misfortune means without misconduct. Misfortune seems to me to be the governing word, and unless there is misfortune the certificate cannot be granted. In the present case the verdict was the cause of the bankruptcy, and the verdict was brought about by the petitioner proceeding with the action. The bankruptcy, therefore, was not caused by misfortune.

Leave to appeal to the House of Lords was granted.

Solicitor—Charging order—Priority—Claim of landlord for rent—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28—Bankruptcy court—Jurisdiction—Rehearing—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 104.

A solicitor had obtained a charging order for his costs under section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, from Cave, J., sitting in Bankruptcy, in respect of partnership property recovered or preserved by him in an action for a dissolution of partnership between partners who afterwards became bankrupt. There existed a landlord's claim for rent against the partnership. Before payment of the solicitor's costs, an application was made by the receiver of the partnership assets to Cave, J., as to the application of the assets, and Cave, J., held that the former order, having been made in ignorance of the landlord's claim, must be amended, and the landlord's claim discharged in priority to the solicitor's charge.

Held, on appeal, that the charging order must have priority over the landlord's claim for rent, and that Cave, J., had no jurisdiction under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 104, or otherwise, to vary his first order.

This was an appeal from a decision of Cave, J. (reported ante, p. 303).

An action had been brought in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice by Suffield against Watts for a dissolution of partnership. Judgment was given for a dissolution and the taking of an account, and a receiver was appointed. Both partners became bankrupt, and the action was transferred to the Queen's Bench Division in Bankruptcy. The solicitor to the plaintiff in the partnership action applied to Cave, J., sitting in Bankruptcy, for an order under section 28 of the Solicitors Act of 1860 declaring that he was entitled to a charge on the assets in the hands of the receiver, and an order was made on the 6th of April, 1887, directing the receiver out of those assets to pay the solicitor his taxed costs of the action. The order as drawn up was entitled in the bankruptcy, in the action, and in the matter of the Solicitors Act and of the solicitor. Before the order was made application had been made to the receiver by the landlord of the premises in which the bankrupts had carried on their business for the payment of three quarters' rent, two of which had become due before the bankruptcy. The landlord had not distrained. Cave, J., was not informed of the landlord's claim till the receiver, having moneys in his hands, applied to Cave, J., for directions.

The solicitor and the landlord were both represented on the hearing of this application.

The receiver had £84 in his hands; the solicitor's claim was for £100, and the landlord's for £49.

Cave, J., held that the landlord was entitled to priority, and ordered the payment of his claim out of the assets, and the residue of the sum in the receiver's hands to the solicitor.

This order was entitled only in the bankruptcy and in the action.

The solicitor appealed.

Dundas Gardiner, for the appellant.—Section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), is conclusive to show that a solicitor who has recovered or preserved property is entitled to the declaration by the judge before whom the proceeding has been heard, or is depending, of a charge for his taxed costs upon any property so recovered or preserved except as against a bonâ fide purchaser for value. Such has been the case here, and a liberal interpretation has always been given to the Act: Pinkerton v. Easton, 21 W. R. 943, L. R. 16 Eq. 490; Bulley v. Bulley, 26 W. R. 638, 8 Ch. D. 479; Greer v. Young, 31 W. R. 930, 24 Ch. D. 545; Bayley v. Burchall, 2 H. & M. 371, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 78. In Dallow v. Garrold, 33 W. R. 219, 14 Q. B. D. 543, a solicitor with notice of a prior garnishee summons obtained an order under this section.

He also cited Shippey v. Goby, 28 W. R. 877, 49 L. J. Q. B. 524.

F. Cooper Willis, for the landlord.—It is in the discretion of the court whether such an order should be made. Cave, J., did not know at the time he made the order that the landlord's claim for rent, which he could then have enforced by distress, existed. The order was made under a misapprehension, and, as it was made in bankruptcy, the judge was entitled, under section 104, of the Act of 1883, to vary it.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case it was not denied that the solicitor had in fact preserved property by his action and therefore, if nothing stood in his way, he would be entitled to a charging order on the fund preserved under the Solicitors Act, which is the only statute which enables such an order to be made. This charging order was made by Cave, J., in the court in which he exercised jurisdiction under the Bankruptcy Act. Sitting in that court, and exercising jurisdiction under that Act, he also had the jurisdiction of a judge of the High Court, which he could exercise in respect of the Solicitors Act. On the 6th of April the solicitor applied for a charging order in his favour, and, as a judge of the High Court, Cave, J., granted his application. After he had made that order he could not alter it. He had no jurisdiction to rehear, for the order had not been made under the jurisdiction conferred on him by the Bankruptcy Act. He was not asked to rehear the application, and in fact did not do so. While this order remained good and unimpeachable the receiver in the suit asked for directions as to the money in his hands in the suit—that is to say, whether the claim for rent due to the landlord should or should not have priority over the charge made in favour of the solicitor. It seems to me that a succession of cases has decided that so long as the money in question has not been paid over to anyone a charging order has effect in priority over every other claim and under circumstances, except against a bonâ fide purchaser for value without notice. In Dallow v. Garrold it was held in terms that this was the result of such an order. It is clear that the landlord was not a bonâ fide purchaser for value. That case adopted and approved of the case of Shippey v. Goby, where Lord Bramwell, Baggallay, L.J., and I came to the same conclusion. Therefore, on the authorities this charging order has priority over the landlord's claim for rent not recovered by execution or distress. But it is said that this charging order was made in bankruptcy, and that the judge had jurisdiction to rehear. I have answered that point already. The order was not made under the bankruptcy jurisdiction of the court.

FRY, L.J.—I agree with the Master of the Rolls. In the action in the Chancery Division for the dissolution of the partnership an order was made for the appointment of a receiver. After that both partners became bankrupt. The chancery action was transferred to the Queen's Bench Division, and application was made to the judge for a charging order under the Solicitors Act. That application was granted and the order was made in the matter of the solicitor and in the matter of the Act by Cave, J. That order was not made in bankruptcy but under the jurisdiction Cave, J., had under the Solicitors Act. Then the question arises whether it was competent to Cave, J., to modify the order of the 5th of April. When the order had been perfected Cave, J., had no jurisdiction to rehear the matter, and there was no application to rehear and no attempt to vary that order till after it had been made and perfected. It has been suggested that the landlord in this case stands in some different position to other creditors by virtue of his power of distress, but in that respect he only has a right to distrain—he cannot follow his tenant's goods when they are off his land. The language of the statute is clear; therefore, even if Cave, J., had known that the landlord had given notice of a claim, it would have been no reason for altering the order for a charge which had been made.

LOPES, L.J.—This charging order was made under the Solicitors Act by a judge of the High Court sitting in Bankruptcy. Is this a subsisting and binding order? It is said to have been discharged, but there was no application to rehear it, and it was not discharged or varied by the directions which the learned judge gave. Indeed, I think that, according to the case of In re St. Nazaire Co., 27 W. R. 854, 12 Ch. D. 88, there was no jurisdiction to rehear it.

Bankruptcy—Notice in bankruptcy—Foreclosure decree —"Judgment of which execution has not been stayed" —Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g).

A creditor who, as equitable mortgagee, has obtained a foreclosure decree and an order for sale of the property of the debtor is still, if no such sale is found to be possible, at liberty to serve a bankruptcy notice on the debtor and to take further proceedings; and the fact of such an order for sale not having been carried out is not sufficient ground for an adjournment by the registrar of further proceedings on the notice on the application of the debtor under rule 139 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886.

Appeal from Mr. Registrar Hazlitt ordering proceedings on a bankruptcy notice to stand adjourned on an application of the debtor under the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 139.

The petitioning creditor, Meston, had lent money to the debtor, Kelday, on the security of a building agreement. In an action by the creditor as equitable mortgagee on this agreement in the Chancery Division, Kekewich, J., had ordered a decree in the form of a decree in a foreclosure suit. Accounts were to be taken of the money due, and in default of payment power of foreclosure was given, together with an order for the sale of the property if necessary. The creditor, as plaintiff, subsequently applied for an order to enforce the sale, the proceeds to be paid into court; a sale, however, was found to be impossible on account of the inability of the debtor to give the creditor a title to dispose of the property. The creditor, thereupon, served the usual bankruptcy notice upon the debtor, but upon the petition being heard before the registrar the debtor urged that the order for sale in the chancery suit acted as a stay of the bankruptcy proceedings, and the registrar, thereupon, adjourned the creditor's petition. The creditor now appealed.

Yate-Lee, for the appellant.—The registrar had no power to adjourn the petition on such grounds. The order of sale was no stay of proceedings: sections 4 (1) (g) and 7 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 138 and 139, Lockhart v. Hardy, 9 Beav. 349.

H. Reed, for the respondent.—The mortgagee is not entitled to proceed with bankruptcy proceedings so long as the order for sale has not been executed. Lockhart v. Hardy is in his favour: Walker v. Jones, 14 W. R. 484, L. R. 1 P. C. 50; Palmer v. Hendrie, 27 Beav. 349; Ex parte Budd, 1 M. D. & De G. 436. The order for adjournment of the petition is within the discretion of the registrar. Ex parte Ford, 18 Q. B. D. 369, 35 W. R. Dig. 19.

Yate-Lee, in reply, cited Ex parte Lindsey, In re Bates, 35 W. R. 668.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The debtor, the respondent, was indebted to certain creditors, of whom appellant is one, to an amount upwards of £5,000. The appellant had at the same time a security on the debtor's property equivalent to an equitable mortgage. To secure his debt the creditor did what he had a right to do in law and equity, he applied to the court for a judgment on a debt, and at the same time asked for a decree of foreclosure on the mortgage and an order to sell the property. Under these circumstances he was in a position to claim a judgment debt together with an order to sell under a foreclosure suit. The appellant then, as such judgment creditor, served a bankruptcy notice on the debtor. It is said on the one side that the said order to sell had no effect upon the appellant's rights as a judgment creditor under the Bankruptcy Act, under which, upon notice and default after seven days, he can take proceedings in bankruptcy. On the other side Mr. Reed says that the obtaining of the order to sell is either a stay of proceedings or equivalent to such. That there is anything in the Bankruptcy Act saying that such an order is to act as a stay cannot be maintained. But is there anything in such circumstance to induce the court to stay such proceedings under statutes or in equity which may empower the court to interfere with the ordinary course of bankruptcy notice? By section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, if a creditor has obtained a final judgment against the debtor, for any amount, and, execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on the debtor a bankruptcy notice under this Act, and if the debtor does not within seven days comply with the requisition bankruptcy proceedings take place. I am not inclined to chain the power of the court as to the interpretation of the meaning of the words "execution thereon not having been stayed." Although there may be circumstances under which the court might consider that it ought to stay, I shall not say that is conclusive on this point. But where is there any equitable doctrine or justice here in saying that the obtaining of an order to sell the property which has not been executed at all, because as a fact any sale was found to be impossible, ought to act as a stay of proceedings, or ought to induce the court to order a stay. The property has not been sold. It has only been ordered to be sold. I apprehend no court of equity would interfere with the right of the creditor to obtain judgment against the debtor. There is nothing to prevent a man going on with bankruptcy proceedings in order to obtain his debt. It would be contrary to justice to say that where a man has two rights, the attempt to execute one should prevent him from carrying out the other. There is no rule of court or equity to prevent him carrying out his remedies to the full extent. I cannot, therefore, think that the registrar should have postponed judgment. This was not a matter of simple adjournment. It would alter the rights of the judgment creditor, and would postpone the period of time in which he might recover his debt if rule 139 were allowed thus to apply. There is no discretion in the registrar under such circumstances. He is bound to give a decision at once, and in this case he should have dismissed the application so that the creditor's rights might at once have taken effect. As to the creditor's taking advantage of judgment after seven days' default in spite of a possible sale of the property, I see nothing to prevent a creditor from taking such advantage. The debtor is bound to pay at once after receiving the notice within the interval of seven days. If he pays within that time there is no bankruptcy. This application of the debtor's ought to have been dismissed by the registrar, and this appeal must be allowed.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The point is an important one. The appellant is equitable mortgagee and also creditor of the mortgagor. He gets from the Chancery Division an order for payment of the mortgage, or, in default, an ordinary foreclosure judgment, and, in the alternative, an order for a sale, with, in addition, liberty to apply to sell, if he finds he can do so. For reasons given he cannot sell his security, as he finds the debtor cannot give him a title to do so. There is no evidence offered to show us that the creditor, if diligent, could sell. There is no evidence contradicting the appellant's version. He then serves a bankruptcy notice on the debtor under section 4 of the Act. He is entitled to do that by the Act. He has got foreclosure and judgment, but execution is now sought to be stayed. Has anything happened to render a stay right and to show us that execution ought not to issue? It has been argued that the order for sale was equivalent to a stay of execution. If it be asked whether the court can stay any execution under any circumstances which might render it unjust to levy execution, it must be answered that terms can be imposed such as are laid down in Lockhart v. Hardy and Ex parte Budd. But those cases do not apply here. A mortgagee, such as the appellant, may have recourse to all his remedies at once —foreclosure, ejectment, &c. The only limitation is that he cannot have the estate pledged and the money too. That is clear. To prevent any such injustice an ordinary power of sale came to be inserted among the orders in foreclosure suits. This case is not within the principle of the cases, nor the terms of rule 139; the registrar ought, in regard to the evidence, to have refused the application.

Bates v. Moore. (a.)

Practice—Payment out of court—Petition or summons—Fund exceeding £1,000—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 55, r. 2, sub-section 1.

The mere fact that a fund in court exceeds £1,000 is not of itself sufficient to justify the presentation of a petition for payment out if the title to the fund depends only upon proof of the identity or the birth, marriage, or death of any person.

Petition.

This was a petition for the payment out of court of a sum of £2,849 6s. 11d. Consols, and a sum of £98 [illegible] cash, standing in court to an account entitled, "The account of the infant defendant, Mary Elizabeth Moore."

By an order made on the further consideration of the action on the 17th of July, 1872, it was ordered that one moiety of the residue of a sum of £[illegible] (after providing for certain payments thereby directed to be made) should be carried over to a separate account entitled, "The account of the infant defendant, Mary Elizabeth Moore." The moneys were duly carried over and invested in Three per Cent. Consolidated Annuities, and the dividends thereon (subject to the payment thereout to the infant's father of an allowance of £[illegible] a year for her maintenance and education, pursuant to an order dated the 17th of February, 1873) were accumulated. The infant attained twenty-one on the [illegible] of February, 1888. The petition was presented by her and her father, and it asked that out of the cash sum of £6 17s. might be paid to the father in respect of the allowance for maintenance from the 16th of January, 1888, to the 28th of February, 1888, and that the residue of the cash and the Consols might be respectively paid and transferred to Mary Elizabeth Moore.

The petition was not served on anyone.

Dibdin, for the petition.—[North, J., asked why the application was not made by summons in chambers under rule 2, sub-rule 1, of order 55.] Having regard to the decision of Pearson, J., in In re Rhodes, [illegible] W. R. 270, 31 Ch. D. 499, it was thought that the application ought to be by petition.

He referred to In re Broadwood, 55 L. J. Ch. [illegible], [illegible] W. R. Dig. 214.

North, J.—In the present case I will not [illegible] the costs of the petition, but I can see no reason why this application should not have been made by summons in chambers. In any case of real difficulty I [illegible] always allow the costs of a petition even if the application might have been made by summons, but I [illegible] go the length of saying that in all cases where the sum exceeds £1,000 a petition should be presented. I do not think the mere fact that the fund exceeds £1,000 is sufficient to justify the presentation of a petition. Rule 2, sub-rule 1, of order 55 prescribes no limit of amount in a case where the title to the fund "depends only upon proof of the identity or the birth, marriage, or death of any person." If Pearson, J., in In re Rhodes, intended to decide that a petition could properly be presented in every case in which the fund exceeds £1,000, I cannot agree with him. I do not, however, think he did so intend to decide. The [illegible] in In re Rhodes shows that the title of the account in that case must have been entirely different from that of the account in the present case. Under the circumstances, however, the fund belonging to the petitioner I will allow the costs of the petition.

Practice—Jurisdiction—Originating summons—Question arising between legal devisee and another person—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 55, rr. 3, 5.

The court has no jurisdiction, under ord. 55, r. 3, to decide, on an originating summons as between a legal devisee and another person, any question which would not have arisen in the administration of the testator's estate or the trusts of his will.

Originating summons.

This was an originating summons taken out by John Davies, one of the legal devisees under the will of William Davies (who died on September 20, 1846), for an order declaring that upon the true construction of the will the freehold hereditaments mentioned therein were devised to, and became vested in, the plaintiff and Timothy Davies in fee simple as joint tenants and not as tenants in common. Timothy Davies was dead, and the summons was served on the devisees in trust and the residuary devisees under his will. The executors and trustees of the original will were not served.

The summons was adjourned into court.

J. G. Wood, for the plaintiff.

Everitt, Q.C., and Stutfield, for the defendants.—The court has no jurisdiction under ord. 55, r. 3, to decide questions arising between a legal devisee and someone else, and which would not have arisen in the administration of the estate or the execution of the trusts of the will, and this is shown by rule 5 (b), which directs that where the summons is taken out by any person other than the executors, administrators, or trustees the summons must be served on the executors, administrators, or trustees.

They referred to In re Carlyon, Carlyon v. Carlyon, 35 W. R. 155.

NORTH, J.—I am of opinion that I have no jurisdiction to decide this question on an originating summons. In my opinion rule 3 of order 55 only gives the court jurisdiction to try on an originating summons questions arising in the administration of an estate or the execution of the trusts of a will, and which under the old practice could not have been decided without a general decree for administration of the estate or execution of the trusts.

It does not give the court jurisdiction to decide between a legal devisee and someone else any question which would not have arisen in the administration of the estate. I adhere to the view which I expressed in In re Carlyon. The summons must be dismissed, with costs, but, as the objection to the jurisdiction was not taken in chambers, I shall not allow the defendants the costs of the adjournment into court.

WHELAN v. PALMER. (b.)

Power to jointure—Escrow—Corrupt bargain for the benefit of third party.

W. had, under his father's will, a power of appointment to the extent of £200 per annum for the purpose of jointuring his wife. An arrangement was come to between W. and his wife, from whom he was living apart, in pursuance of which W. was to execute an appointment to that amount in favour of his wife, who was thereupon to assign £60 per annum, part of the appointed sum, to one T., with whom W. was living. The deed of appointment was executed, but the wife refused to execute the assignment of the £60 to T.

Held, in an action by the wife claiming a declaration that the power of appointment was validly exercised to the extent of £140, that the appointment would never have been made at all except for effectuating an unauthorized purpose, and, therefore, that the action must be dismissed.

The statement of the law in Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., p. 712, disapproved, but followed.

Held, also, that the appointment in favour of the wife was an escrow, being intended, to the knowledge of the husband and wife, only to take effect on condition of the wife assigning a portion of the jointure-moneys to a third party not an object of the power.

In April, 1886, W. H. C. Whelan had, under the will of his late father, a power of appointing in favour of his wife a rent-charge not exceeding £200, to be charged on certain estates devised by the will. Whelan was, however, at this time separated from his wife (the plaintiff) and was living with a Miss Thompson. He had no property at his disposal, but was anxious to make some provision for Miss Thompson. The person entitled to his father's estate after his death was his sister, Mrs. Palmer, the first defendant, and he at first attempted to make an arrangement with her, under which the power of jointuring was not to be exercised at all if Mrs. Palmer made a provision for Miss Thompson. This, however, never came to anything, and Whelan accordingly entered into negotiations with the plaintiff for an arrangement under which he was to execute the power of jointuring to the full extent (£200 a year) in her favour, and she was to execute a deed securing an annual sum of £60 to Miss Thompson. On the 23rd of April, 1886, he accordingly signed and sealed a deed poll appointing, as from the day of his decease, a rent-charge of £200 a year out of the estate. Three days afterwards Whelan died. The £60 a year was never secured to Miss Thompson, and in the present action Mrs. Whelan sought a declaration that she was entitled to a rent-charge of £140 a year, and consequential relief.

Barber, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the plaintiff.—The law is more favourable to the recognition of the execution of powers when the power is one of jointuring the wife—this power is validly exercised to the extent of £140 for the wife's benefit: Aleyn v. Belchier, 1 Eden. 132, 1 W. & T. L. C. in Equity, 6th ed., at p. 437; Lane v. Page, Amb. 233; Baldwin v. Roche, 5 Ir. Eq. 110. The exercise of a power by a father in favour of his children is a different thing, and it is this that distinguishes Daubeny v. Cockburn, 1 Mer. 626. There is no fraud on the power—the remainderman is not injured by this appointment. We admit the appointment is bad as to the £60, but we say it is good as to the rest: Sugden on Powers, 7th ed., vol. 2, p. 188, 8th ed., pp. 609, 612; Rowley v. Rowley, Kay, 242, 259, 2 W. R. Dig. 22. The court will lean towards upholding this appointment, as, but for the bargain, we do not know that the appointor would have exercised his power at all, in which case the wife would have been worse off.

Warmington, Q.C., and Alexander Young, for the defendants.—The plaintiff is entitled to relief neither on the law nor the facts. [KEKEWICH, J.—If Lord St. Leonards and Wood, V.C., treat the question as settled would it be right for me, as a judge of first instance, to treat it as unsettled?] Lord St. Leonards cannot alter the effect of the decisions. Daubeny v. Cockburn is directly against the plaintiff: Topham v. Duke of Portland, 11 W. R. 507, 1 De G. J. & S. 517. Here the first object is to benefit Miss Thompson, but the appointment expresses the wishes of the appointor, without mentioning her; you cannot give effect to an intention against the clear and express wish shown in the deed. It would be a fraud on the appointor. Again, Whelan never appointed at all. The appointment was subject to the performance of a condition which was never fulfilled, therefore the appointment never took place, and the instrument is merely an escrow. The plaintiff wants to have the benefit without complying with the condition. This the court will not assent to. The desire to benefit Miss Thompson was the causa sine quâ non, so the appointment is bad: In re Turner's Settled Estates, 33 W. R. 265, 267, 28 Ch. D. 205, 217, per Fry, L.J.

Barber, in reply.—There is no fraud on the appointor; he made a bargain with the plaintiff, which she agreed to. As to the question of escrow, the plaintiff has merely to execute the agreement as to the £60 now, and that will make the deed good. [KEKEWICH, J., referred to Columbine v. Penhall, 1 W. R. 272, 1 Sm. & Giff. 228, and Fraser v. Thompson, 7 W. R. 678, 4 De G. & Jo. 659.]

Farwell, for the trustees of the will.

KEKEWICH, J.—This case raises a question which has not been raised for a great many years. The plaintiff's main argument is that, although the appointment to Mrs. Whelan, if made under any other sort of power, could not have stood, the law makes an exception in the case of appointments under powers of jointuring. This contention is based upon a passage in Sugden on Powers (vol. 2, p. 188, 7th ed.) and the case of Rowley v. Rowley, Kay, at p. 259, where Wood, V.C., comments upon Lord St. Leonards' deductions; and the learned author, in his 8th edition, p. 612, refers to this case before Wood, V.C., as supporting his own previous statement. With all respect to the memory of Lord St. Leonards, I am unable to see how he arrived at the conclusion stated by him, or how the cases he cites support it. Wood, V.C., at p. 260, quotes Sugden on Powers as follows:—"Notwithstanding the case of Daubeny v. Cockburn, 1 Mer. 626, it is now too late to have that principle as to jointures changed," and he considers himself bound by these words, though he does not approve of them, and is careful not to make them his own. I have been urged to disregard this case, but the judgment was pronounced thirty-four years ago. No doubt numerous deeds have been executed on the faith of its being a correct and reliable statement of the law, and I cannot, as a judge of first instance, disregard it. I do not hesitate to say I do not understand it—it warps the principle of Lane v. Page, Amb. 233; but I am bound by it, and any departure from this principle must begin in a higher court. But the defendants took the point that the instrument was never delivered as a deed, but was merely an escrow. If the evidence of what occurred when the appointment was made had stood alone, I should have held that there was a good deed by delivery. But the deed was intended to benefit Miss Thompson, for whom Whelan was morally bound to provide. He had then no property of his own, and, with the help of his solicitor (who acted perfectly rightly in the interests of his client), availed himself of his power to jointure. But he had no intention of benefiting his wife. They were living apart, and he had revoked a will he formerly made in her favour, his intention being to benefit Miss Thompson, and, the bargaining with the remaindermen under his father's will having come to nothing, negotiations were made with the plaintiff to carry out an arrangement by which Miss Thompson was to have £60 a year out of the £200, for that is the effect of it, though this does not appear on the face of the deed. On the face of it it is a simple deed of appointment in favour of Mrs. Whelan, but, with her concurrence, there had been a deed prepared, securing £60 a year to Miss Thompson, and she knew that the jointure to herself was only to be made on these terms.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the appointment was taken by the lawyer's clerk to Mrs. Whelan with instructions that it was not to be delivered unless she executed the other deed. As far as Whelan could, he made her execution of that deed a condition precedent. When he executed the appointment it remained on the table, and was not taken possession of by anyone. It is not necessary, in delivering an instrument as an escrow, to say that it is so delivered; if the instrument is delivered upon condition, that constitutes it an escrow: Nash v. Flyn, 1 Jo. & Lat., at p. 175; Kidner v. Keith, 15 C. B. N. S., at p. 43. I have no doubt that the delivery was not intended to be absolute till the condition as to the provision for Miss Thompson was fulfilled, so the instrument was merely an escrow, as Mrs. Whelan had not fulfilled her part of the arrangement, and declined to do so. Mr. Barber says the condition is even now capable of fulfilment. The point is not at present open for decision, but it may some time be worth considering whether Mrs. Whelan can now fulfil it or whether she has not already elected to refuse to do so. Another point taken was, that the appointment of £200 was a fraud on the power. I dismiss the term "fraud" and prefer to speak of "execution." In law there was an execution of the power, but I know of no reason or authority why a power to jointure should be different from any other power with regard to the necessity for its being honestly exercised. Was this an honest exercise of the power—that is to say, for the purpose contemplated by the instrument creating the power? The power was created for the benefit of the wife, and it is said that to exercise it in any other way would be a fraud by defeating the object of the power. Without saying it was a fraud on the appointor, it might have that effect on the remaindermen, who get less by there being a charge on the estate under what was not a proper exercise of the power.

This view is supported by the cases cited in argument: Wigson v. Garrat, cited Ventr. 278, and Raym. 2[illegible]; Digges' case, 1 Rep. 173. On the evidence I hold that Whelan would never have given anything to his wife unless she would have benefited Miss Thompson. The bargain between them was that Mrs. Whelan was to have £200 if £60 a year out of it went to Miss Thompson. I look at the purpose of the parties and if the purpose is not an honest exercise of the power, the exercise of it is not good: Topham v. Duke of Portland. The power was exercised only for the benefit of Miss Thompson, and to hold that that was a good exercise of the power would be to decide that it might be exercised to effect something which was never intended by the settlor. On the other hand, to hold it good, excluding Miss Thompson, would be quite contrary to the intention of the parties. It was settled in Topham v. Duke of Portland, that where the honest part could be severed, effect could be given to that; and it is said here that £140 was attributable to honesty. The answer is that an appointment for an authorized purpose would never have been made at all except for effectuating the unauthorized purpose. The action must be dismissed with costs, including those of the trustees.

REG. v. JORDAN. (a.)

County courts—Committal for contempt—Jurisdiction of superior court to review committal—Form of warrant for "fine or imprisonment in default"—Form of release—County Courts Act, 1856 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95), s. 113—County Court Rules, 1886, ord. 25, r. 35, and Forms 55 and 297.

The superior court will decline to exercise any appellate jurisdiction over the county court in matters of fine or committal for contempt, except where there is no reasonable evidence of any contempt having been committed, and the liberty of the subject requires protection.

Ex parte Pater, 12 W. R. 823, 33 L. J. M. C. 142, followed.

In cases of committal for imprisonment simply, or for imprisonment in default of payment of a fine, the form of warrant No. 297 in the County Court Rules, 1886, is the only one applicable, and the gaoler has no power to remise the fine or to discharge the prisoner upon its payment, but the fine must be paid into court and application be made to the judge who committed the prisoner to order his discharge. The form of the order for commitment under the Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), given in Form 55 of the County Court Rules, 1886, does not apply to imprisonments in default of the payment of a fine.

To observe to a judge, in the course of and in reference to his judgment, that "That is a most unjust remark" is an insult to the court in whatever manner expressed, and, if not withdrawn, it amounts to such a "wilful insult" as is contemplated by section 113 of the County Courts Act, 1856.

Appeal by way of rule nisi to show cause why an order of committal made by his Honour Judge Jordan in the county court of Staffordshire, sitting at Newcastle-under-Lyme, should not be quashed.

The facts of this case were as follows:—

An action had been tried in the county court at Newcastle-under-Lyme between a Mrs. Rose, as plaintiff, and William Turner, a solicitor, as defendant, for the recovery of £10 which the plaintiff said that she had paid to Turner for the purpose of obtaining a Queen's Counsel's opinion, but which she alleged had not been so expended. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. Turner applied to Judge Jordan for a new trial. While the judge was in the act of refusing the application, Turner remarked that he was about to take proceedings against the plaintiff for perjury. The judge said that "because the jury had found a verdict against him, he (Turner) thought they must be wrong. Turner was now threatening the plaintiff with a prosecution and all sorts of things, but he (the judge) might say that he would have found the same verdict himself, for he considered that Turner had got the £10 from the plaintiff in order to obtain counsel's opinion, which he did not get." Thereupon Turner rose and said, "That is a most unjust remark." The judge committed Turner into custody for contempt, and upon his declining to apologize at the end of the sitting, on the ground that to submit to such remarks would be a reflection on his own character which he could not admit was due, the judge ordered him to pay a fine of £5, or, in default, to be imprisoned for six days.

The warrant was subsequently made out in the form given under the County Court Rules, 1886, for warrants of attachment, reciting that, "Whereas, at a court holden on this day, A. B. wilfully insulted his Honour the Judge during his sitting in court. These are, therefore, to require you, the said high bailiff, &c., to take the said A. B. and to deliver him to the governor of the above-named prison, and you, the said governor, to receive the said A. B. and him safely to keep in the said prison for days from the arrest under this warrant or until he shall be sooner discharged in due course of law."

The appellant obtained a rule nisi to show cause why the above order of and commitment by Judge Jordan should not be quashed.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and C. Russell, showed cause for the county court judge against the rule.—The words used imported contempt such as the judge had power to deal with under section 113 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. This court will not review the exercise of such discretion: Ex parte Pater, 12 W. R. 823, 33 L. J. M. C. 142. The judge has either power absolutely to commit or to impose a fine, with imprisonment only in case of default of its payment. Here he imposed a fine and committed in default, not until payment of the fine. The warrant need not disclose any other sentence than the committal: Heywood's County Court Practice, p. 809.

Willes, Q.C., and V. Williams, for the appellant, in support of the rule.—There was no "wilful insult"; there was no evidence of "intentional" insult. The judge's sentence was £5 fine or in default six days' imprisonment. The warrant was only in the form for committals under the ordinary jurisdiction of the court. The prisoner was ordered to be detained for six days without any power to obtain release on payment of the fine. This is expressly given by the form of warrant in schedule A of the Debtors Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62). The warrant should be made out exactly in the terms of the order, and the only order is on the judge's note to the above effect. "Fine of £5 or six days' imprisonment."

Cur. adv. vult.

April 23.—CAVE, J.—A rule was obtained in this case to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to remove into this court all orders made by Judge Jordan, in a county court held at Newcastle-under-Lyme, against one Turner, a solicitor, for contempt of court, for the purpose of having such orders quashed; on the ground, first, that there was no reasonable ground for the court to conclude that a wilful insult had been offered, and, secondly, that the commitment of Turner was illegal in form. The proceedings were taken under the County Courts Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95), s. 113, under which, "If any person shall wilfully insult the judge . . . during his sitting or attendance in court . . . or shall wilfully interrupt the proceedings of the court, or otherwise misbehave in court, it shall be lawful for any bailiff or officer of the court, by the order of the judge, to take such offender into custody and detain him until the rising of the court; and the judge shall be empowered, if he shall think fit, by a warrant under his hand, and sealed, to commit any such offender to prison . . . for any time not exceeding seven days, or to impose upon such offender a fine not exceeding £5 for every such offence, and in default of payment thereof to commit the offender to prison for any time not exceeding seven days, unless the said fine be sooner paid."

Now it has been decided in Ex parte Pater that this court is not a court of appeal from inferior courts in matters of contempt. Its only power to interfere is to protect the liberty of the subject where there is no reasonable evidence on which the inferior court could come to the conclusion that any contempt had been committed or wilful insult been offered. I am not sure that even then the court was not going somewhat beyond its jurisdiction in regard to ordinary cases of contempt. That case, at any rate, must not be pressed as a precedent for the interference of this court in every case where it is alleged that there has been an excess of jurisdiction. It simply lays down the rule that for the protection of the liberty of the subject, where there has been no reasonable evidence before the inferior court of any contempt or insult, this court may interfere. In this case there is abundant evidence upon which the county court judge could conclude that a contempt had been committed. Turner interrupted the judge in the course of his judgment with the observation, "That is a most unjust remark." However said, such an observation is a gross insult to any court of justice. To accuse a judge of corruption might be a worse insult, but a charge of injustice is as gross an insult as can be imagined short of that; and justice cannot be administered with respect if every disappointed suitor is to be allowed to indulge in such observations to the court. That would be enough to dispose of this case on its merits, but having regard to the preservation of due respect for, and decorum in, county courts, I must express my own view of this case more fully. [The judge here recapitulated the facts of the case, and expressed his opinion to the effect that, although in applications for new trials judges might generally confine themselves to remarking that there was sufficient evidence upon which the jury might rightly have come to their decision, yet, in this case, when the judge learnt from Turner that proceedings for perjury were to be taken against the plaintiff, he would have been wrong in keeping silence, and was right in not letting such proceedings be announced without his expressing an opinion that they did not seem to him justifiable, as the verdict of the jury was one in which he absolutely concurred.] As to the argument that there was no evidence that the insult was "wilful," that might have been reasonably maintained had Turner afterwards expressed any regret for words possibly uttered in the heat of the moment; but he did not do so. On the contrary, he insisted on the propriety of the observation, and declined to make any adequate apology.

On the second point, as to the informality of the commitment, on the ground that the sentence of the judge was for a "fine of £5 or imprisonment in default," while the warrant did not express such a sentence, but merely ordered "imprisonment for six days or until discharged in due course of law," I have to observe that the warrant is in the only form given by the County Court Rules, 1886. Only one form is given for commitment, whether for imprisonment simply, or for imprisonment in default of payment of a fine. It is said that the warrant ought to have included the words "or until he shall pay £5," under the form given in schedule A of the Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), and in accordance with the provisions of section 5 of that Act. But on examination of the case of commitment under the Debtors Act, 1869, there is a difference in practice in two respects from commitment in default of fine for contempt. By ord. 25, r. 35, of the County Court Rules of 1886 it is provided, as to commitments under the Debtors Act, that "the sum indorsed on the order of commitment as that upon payment of which the prisoner may be discharged may be paid into the court from which the commitment order was issued, or to the gaoler in whose custody the prisoner is." That order expressly applies to cases of commitment under the Debtors Act, 1869. Mr. Willes could not point to any section of an Act, or any order, which give power to the gaoler to receive payment of fines in such a case as this of commitment for default of payment of a fine. There is a further difference. In commitment for non-payment of a judgment debt the warrant is really in the same form as the present warrant—namely, in the form given under Form 55 of the Rules of 1886 ending with the words "or until discharged by due process of law"—but the gaoler has power to receive the amount of money due under a judgment debt as stated in the order of commitment, which statement is necessary for the information of the gaoler, on tender of which, by virtue of the order, the prisoner is entitled to his discharge. There is no form of order here which entitles a prisoner committed for a wilful insult to a judge to his discharge upon such tender of the fine, nor is the gaoler entitled by any order to receive it. The ordinary rule, therefore, prevails. The money must be paid into the court whence the order for commitment issued, and on the certificate of the registrar of such payment application is made to the judge for an order of discharge. That is the only way, so far as I can discern, by which a prisoner committed for the non-payment of a fine can obtain his release. On the merits, therefore, of the case the order of the county court judge was clearly right, committing Turner for contempt, and on the technical objection the order is clearly good and within the authority of the Act. The motion, therefore, fails, and the rule must be discharged.

FARMER v. LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 133—Liability of railway company to make good deficiency in poor rate—County rate—Borough rate—County Rates Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 81), 26—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 145.

Where a railway company is liable to make good deficiency in a poor rate under section 133 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in calculating the deficiency both the county rate and, in the case of a parish wholly within a borough, the borough rate are to be included in the poor rate.

Special case.

The plaintiffs, the overseers of the township of Salford, claimed from the defendant railway company the payment of a sum of money to make good a deficiency in a poor rate caused by certain land having been taken and used for the purposes of the defendant's railway. The land was in the township of Salford, and had been taken by the company under the powers of their special Act, with which the Land Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, was incorporated; and in consequence of the land being so taken and used there was a deficiency for the year 1886-7 in the assessment to the poor rate in respect of the said land.

Section 133 of the Lands Clauses Act enacts that the promoters become possessed under their compulsory powers "of any lands charged with the land tax or liable to be assessed to the poor's rate, they shall from time to time, until the works shall be completed, be assessed to such land tax or poor's rate, be liable to make good the deficiency in the several assessments of land tax and poor's rate, by reason of such lands having been taken or used for the purposes of the works."

The township of Salford was situate within the borough of Salford, and was, therefore, liable to each bute to the borough rate; it was also within the county of Lancaster, and, therefore, liable to contribute to the county rate. The plaintiffs claimed that they were entitled to reckon both the borough rate and the county rate as parts of the poor rate for the purpose of calculating the deficiency. The defendants contended that neither the borough rate nor the county rate ought to be so reckoned.

Henn Collins, Q.C. (Howland Roberts with him), for the plaintiffs.—By section 145 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, the plaintiffs, as overseers, are expressly bound to pay the contribution of the parish to the borough rate out of the poor rate. By section 26 of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81, the county rate is to be paid by the overseers, and the only fund out of which the overseers can get the money is the poor rate. Clearly, borough rate and county rate are included in poor rate.

Bousquet, Q.C. (Moon with him), for the defendants.—Section 133 of the Lands Clauses Act ought to be construed according to the intention of the Legislature in 1845. At that time borough rates and county rates existed and were well known, and were quite distinct from the poor rate; and section 133 imposes on the railway company a liability to make good two things only—viz., the land tax and the poor rate. The county rate is imposed by the justices, and was at the time of the passing of the Lands Clauses Act regulated by 55 Geo. 3, c. 51: see section 12.. And 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81 does not say that the county rate is to come out of the poor rate. Similarly, the borough rate was then regulated by the Muncipal Corporations Act, 1835, s. 92, which created a borough rate in the nature of a county rate. Moreover, under the present Act of 1882 the borough rate may, in the case of a divided parish, be assessed and levied as a separate rate: see section 146.

Field, J.—This case raises an important question with regard to the liability of the defendants to make good a deficiency in the assessment to the poor rate of certain property which they have taken for the purposes of their railway—viz., whether in estimating the deficiency they are entitled to deduct certain amounts included in the poor rate assessment as and for a borough rate and as and for a county rate. The question turns on the construction of section 133 of the Lands Clauses Act. [His lordship read the section.] Is the amount contributed by the overseers in respect of the borough rate and the amount contributed as county rate to be taken into account in calculating the deficiency? I think there is a difference between the question as to the borough rate and the question as to the county rate. As to the borough rate, the matter appears very simple. The borough rate is the creation of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835, section 92 of that Act enabling the council to make a borough rate in the nature of a county rate. But that Act is now repealed, and by the Act of 1882, s. 145, where a parish is wholly within a borough, the overseers are to pay the borough rate out of the poor rate. This does not apply to the case where a parish is partly within a borough and partly without, which case is provided for in the next section, and as to which I do not intend to give any decision. But Salford is a parish wholly within a borough; therefore, clearly section 145 applies, and the borough rate has to come out of the poor rate; and consequently the deficiency in the borough rate is a deficiency which the defendants are liable to make good. As to the county rate, the matter is not quite so clear. Originally the county rate was made on a distinct assessment. But 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81 has provided a machinery by which it is to be raised. The justices make the rate, and send precepts to the guardians, and the guardians have to raise the moneys required in the same manner as the money required for the relief of the poor. That is, it is raised by precepts sent to the overseers. And it must be that they are to pay it out of the poor rate, as they have no other source from which they could pay it. Therefore I think that the borough rate and the county rate are parts of the assessment to the poor rate, and that the defendants are liable to make good the deficiency therein.

Landlord and tenant—Exclusive right of grazing—Protection from distress—46 & 47 Vict. c. 61, s. 45.

Cattle placed in a field under an agreement between their owner and the tenant for the exclusive right of grazing the field are not "taken in to be fed" by the tenant so as to be protected from distress for rent by virtue of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61), s. 45.

Semble, 46 & 47 Vict. c. 61, s. 45, only applies to stock which is agisted, the words of the Act being a mere paraphrase of that term.

This was an appeal from a decision of the county court judge of Bath. It appeared that the defendant Green was the landlord and one Sterry was the tenant of a certain field. Sterry verbally agreed with the plaintiff Masters that he (Masters) should have "the exclusive right of eating the grass of the said field for four months" at a certain price. Rent being due from Sterry to the defendant, the defendant distrained on some beasts belonging to the plaintiff which were in the said field, and thereupon the plaintiff brought his action against the defendant in the county court. Judgment being given for the defendant, the plaintiff appealed.

Clay, for the plaintiff.—These animals are within the limitations in the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, s. 45. That Act was intended to protect any animals of third persons which are on the land of a tenant, and the words of the enactment should have a wide and popular meaning given to them.

Blake-Odgers, for the defendant, was not called on.

Field, J.—This point arises in an action by a grazier against a landlord for distraining his cattle. The county court judge, looking at the facts of the case, construed the 45th section of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, as not protecting these cattle. The question for us to decide is whether that construction be the correct one, and whether these cattle do come within the protection of the section. Looking at the ordinary course of farming practice, the farmer having surplus eatage and wishing to turn it to profit may do so in two ways, he may either take in other persons' stock along with his own—a proceeding which is known as agistment—or he may sell the right of occupying the surface of the soil for a given period of time. The latter of these courses was pursued in the present case; and although there is authority for saying that such a transaction amounts to a letting, yet in the present case we are not bound to decide whether it does or does not do so, because Mr. Clay has to satisfy us that this transaction is within the statute. The section enacts that stock taken in by the tenant to be fed at a fair price shall not be distrained where there is other sufficient distress to be found, and if distrained, there shall not be recovered by such distress a sum exceeding the amount agreed to be paid for the feeding. The landlord can still distrain the beasts, but he cannot get more than the price of the agistment. In this case there was no "taking in by the tenant," and I very much doubt whether there was a fair price, for the price was paid for the occupation of the land, not for the feeding. It seems to me, therefore, that the case does not come within the statute, and that this appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Wills, J.—The only question for us to decide is whether the agreement come to between the parties falls within the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, s. 45. And the answer to this question depends on the further question whether in this case live stock has been taken in by the tenant to be fed at a fair price. It is no doubt the case that this statute was passed to prevent the property of one person being taken for another's debt, but it is also quite plain the words of the statute do not cover all cases in which a person may thus suffer. The only safe rule is to follow the words of the statute, and these only apply to a proceeding perfectly well known as agistment; and it must not be taken that the Act which paraphrases this term and accurately describes this proceeding ought to be construed to mean something else. The transaction between the parties in this case, which was the granting of an exclusive right to feed any number of cattle for a lump sum, cannot be called an agistment, and therefore does not fall within the statute. In my opinion the county court judge was right and this appeal must be dismissed.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Solicitor—Costs—Sale of mortgaged property by trustee in bankruptcy—Percentage—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), General Order, s. 2, and schedule 1—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, Appendix, part 2, s. 7, r. 2.

Certain property of the bankrupt which was subject to a mortgage was sold by the official receiver as trustee in the bankruptcy, the mortgagee executing a reconveyance, and his debt being paid out of the purchase-money.

Held, that a percentage on the whole amount received for the said property was properly allowed by the taxing master to the solicitors who acted for the official receiver in carrying out the sale.

Appeal by the trustee in bankruptcy from the taxation by the registrar of the Brighton County Court of certain bills of costs.

The case raised the important question whether, upon a sale of property of the bankrupt which is subject to a mortgage by the official receiver as trustee, his solicitor is entitled to be paid a percentage under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act upon the whole amount received or only upon the value of the equity.

On July 26, 1887, a petition was presented against the debtor Gallard, upon which he was adjudicated bankrupt, the official receiver acting as trustee in the bankruptcy until October 14, when a creditor's trustee was appointed and received his certificate.

During the time that he was trustee the official receiver entered into a contract for the sale of certain property of the bankrupt for £4,750, the property being subject to a mortgage for £3,000, and on October 18 the sale was duly completed by the trustee and the official receiver. The mortgagee did not join, but a reconveyance was executed by him, and the trustee paid the £3,000 out of the purchase-money.

On taxation the county court registrar allowed to Messrs. Griffiths & Eggar, who had acted throughout for the official receiver, a percentage upon the whole amount of £4,750, but an objection to this allowance was taken by the trustee in bankruptcy.

Sidney Woolf, for the trustee.—What the trustee contends is that the percentage should only be allowed on the £1,750 which the estate actually received. The effect of rule 2 of section 7, part 2 of the appendix to the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, is to give the trustee's solicitor his percentage only on the proceeds of sale so far as the trust estate receives them. He is to be paid only out of the proceeds of sale. If the trustee's solicitor is to receive a commission on the whole amount, including the mortgage, the estate would be very heavily burdened, especially where, as in this case, there are several incumbered properties.

He referred to the General Order made in pursuance of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, s. 2, and also to In re Greys Brewery Co., 56 L. T. N. S. 298, 35 W. R. Dig. 193.

Muir Mackenzie, for the solicitors.—The matter is clear under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act and the Bankruptcy Rules. No part of the proceeds of sale were chargeable with the percentage of the mortgagee's solicitor, and the trustee's solicitors are entitled to percentage on the whole amount.

Cave, J.—The decision of the taxing master was right, though some little difficulty does seem to arise on the Bankruptcy Rules. The provisions in the Solicitors' Remuneration Act are tolerably clear. Where there is a vendor of mortgaged property, and the solicitor sells free from incumbrance, there is no reason why he should not have his percentage on the amount received. Occasionally the property is sold subject to incumbrance, and such a case is provided for by rule 9 of the schedule to the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881. The incumbrance is to be deemed part of the purchase-money, and the solicitor gets his percentage. Whether the solicitor sells subject to or free from incumbrance, therefore, his percentage is reckoned on the total value of the estate. Then we come to the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886. If rule 2 of section 7, part 2 of the appendix to those rules stopped at the words immediately preceding the proviso it is clear that the solicitor would be entitled to percentage on the gross value of the property. But the rule goes on, "Provided that, in cases of sales of mortgaged properties, the trustee's solicitor, if his remuneration shall be under schedule 1 of the existing order, shall only be entitled to percentage upon so much of the proceeds of sale as shall not be chargeable by the mortgagee's solicitor with the percentage, and such percentage shall be payable only out of the proceeds of sale." Now, whether there is or is not a state of affairs to which that is applicable I cannot pretend to say offhand. The taxing master, who is a man of great experience, appears to doubt whether any such state of affairs can arise. But, whether the circumstances can occur or not, it is clear that the meaning is that the percentage is not to be paid twice over—once to the mortgagee's solicitor and once to the trustee's solicitor—so that the estate may not be charged with a double Appeal from a decision of Chitty, J. (reported 32 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 240).

On the 1st of April, 1885, a company called the Almada and Tirito Co. (Limited) was incorporated under the Companies Acts. The objects of the company, as stated in the memorandum of association, were to acquire the undertaking and property of a former company called the Almada and Tirito Consolidated Silver Mining Co. (Limited), thereinafter referred to as the old company, to carry on the business of mining in all its branches and to purchase, work, hold, and sell mines and property for such purposes.

Clause 5 of the memorandum of association was as follows:—"The capital of the company is £210,000, divided into 210,000 shares of £1 each, and on any increase of capital by special resolution the company may attach to shares any preferential rights as to dividend or capital or any other special incidents or restrictions."

The articles of association provided as follows:—

Article 1.—The regulations of Table A. in the schedule to the Companies Act, 1862, shall apply to the company, except so far as the same are modified by or are repugnant to the following regulations.

Article 2.—The company may reduce its capital in the manner and with any of the incidents prescribed or allowed by the Companies Acts, 1867 and 1877.

Article 3.—The company may accept surrenders of shares, but no part of the company's assets shall be employed in the purchase of the company's own shares.

The greater portion of the original 210,000 shares was issued to persons who had been shareholders in the old company, and the directors of the new company, finding the capital of the company insufficient to properly develop and carry on the business of the company, communicated with the shareholders, and the following special resolution was duly passed at an extraordinary general meeting of the members of the company held on the 6th of June, 1887, and confirmed at a subsequent extraordinary general meeting on the 22nd of June—viz., "That the capital of the company be increased from 210,000 shares of £1 each to 420,000 shares of £1 each by the issue of 210,000 shares of £1 each, credited with 18s. per share paid with a deposit of 6d. per share."

This resolution was registered at the registry of joint-stock companies on the 7th of July.

On the 25th of June, 1887, the directors issued a circular referring to this special resolution, and proposing to offer the above 210,000 shares with 18s. per share credited as paid, and proposing that the sum of 6d. per share be paid on application, and the remaining 1s. 6d. per share be called up in sums of 6d. per share at intervals of not less than three months between each date of payment. There was appended to the circular this form of application to the directors for shares: "Gentlemen, having paid to your bankers the sum of £ , 1s. per share on shares of £1 each, being a deposit of 6d. and first call of 6d., with 18s. per share credited as paid thereon in the above company, I hereby agree to accept such shares and to pay the remaining calls thereon as mentioned in the circular of June 25, 1887; and I hereby authorize you to enter my name as owner of the said shares on the register . . .; and I hereby further authorize Mr. James Arthur Morgan to execute an agreement on my behalf for the purpose of effectually carrying out the resolution under which the new capital of 210,000 shares of £1 each was created by issuing the said shares, with 18s. credited as paid thereon."

On the 21st of December, 1887, the present appellant, T. C. Allen, signed the above form of application for 200 shares, and paid the sum of £10 to the company's bankers. On the 4th of January, 1888, an agreement was made between the company and James Arthur Morgan, on behalf of persons whose names appeared in the schedule thereto as applicants for the number of shares to be issued under the said special resolution set opposite their names respectively; the agreement, after reciting the special resolution, and that the subscribers to the agreement had respectively applied for the number of shares to be issued under such special resolution set opposite their names respectively, and had deposited with such application a sum equal to 1s. per share on the number of shares which the subscribers had respectively applied for, declared that the company should forthwith procure the agreement to be filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, and after the filing thereof should forthwith allot and issue to each subscriber the number of shares specified opposite their respective names; and that the said shares should be issued and held as shares of £1 each, with 18s. per share credited as paid up thereon, making, with the said deposit of 1s. per share, the sum of 19s. paid up on each share. Allen's name was entered in the schedule as a subscriber for 200 shares, numbered on the register 379,101 to 379,300. This agreement was duly filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies on the 4th of January.

On January 5 the directors sent an allotment notice to Allen informing him that he had been allotted, in accordance with his request, 200 shares in the company, and had been duly registered in the books of the company as the owner of the shares specified with 19s. paid thereon. No certificates of the new shares had as yet been issued. Allen and other shareholders subsequently became acquainted with the judgment of the Court of Appeal in In re Addlestone Linoleum Co. (ante p. 227, 37 Ch. D. 191), and on January 14 Allen and other shareholders wrote requesting to have their applications for shares at once cancelled and their names struck off the register, and a return of the amounts respectively paid by them, on the grounds that the judges in the case referred to had expressed an opinion that shares issued as partly paid up under special resolution were really issued at a discount, and that if so, even if an agreement had been registered the shareholders remained liable to pay the full amount of their shares in the event of a winding up, and, therefore, that the company were not in a position to carry out their undertaking to issue shares as 18s. paid. The company refused to accede to this, contending that the issue of the shares with 18s. credited as paid was legal, and that Allen and the other shareholders were not subject to any liability further than the liability of 1s. per share.

On February 3 Allen moved before Chitty, J., under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, to have the company's register rectified by striking out the applicant's name as the holder of the shares referred to, and for repayment of the amount paid by him on application for the same.

Counsel for the applicant, on the motion, admitted that the case was governed by the decision of Chitty, J., in In re Ince Hall Rolling Mills Co., 23 Ch. D. 545n, but stated that doubts had been thrown on that decision by the dicta in the Addlestone Linoleum Co. case, and, therefore, that it was desired to have the matter in question decided by the Court of Appeal. It was admitted both at the hearing of the motion and on the appeal that the company was solvent and a going concern. Chitty, J., following his own decision in In re Ince Hall Rolling Mills Co., dismissed the application.

Allen appealed.

Buckley, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for the appellant.—In In re Addlestone Linoleum Co. both Cotton and Lindley, L.JJ., expressed an opinion that the issue, by a company incorporated under the Act of 1862, of shares at a discount in pursuance of a contract entered into with the subscriber for that purpose is invalid, even though the contract be registered under section 25 of the Act of 1867. No doubt Chitty, J., in In re Ince Hall Rolling Mills Co. and in In re Plashynaston Tube Co., 23 Ch. D. 543, 32 W. R. Dig. 41, had previously decided that a power to issue shares at a discount contained in the articles of association of a company was not ultrâ vires, and, therefore, that a contract made with subscribers in pursuance of that power and duly registered under section 25 of the Act of 1867 was valid. Those decisions are inconsistent, however, with the dicta in In re Addlestone Linoleum Co. and also with the principles laid down in Trevor v. Whitworth, ante, p. 145, 12 App. Cas. 409; per Lord Macnaghten, p. 432 of 12 App. Cas. Section 8 of the Act of 1862 shows that the provisions of the memorandum of association are to define particularly the capital of the company for the express purpose of defining the amount of each of the shares, and it has been held in Trevor v. Whitworth that the company cannot vary that by a special resolution diverting the money to repurchase shares, and the same principle applies to the issue of shares at a discount. The contract which the company purported to make with the appellant is therefore ultrâ vires, and is not helped by registration; the appellant is therefore entitled to the relief he claims. [COTTON, L.J.—Was it a contract entered into by the appellant to take the shares as fully paid-up shares and run the risk?] No; the appellant when he applied for the shares, believed the company had power to make the contract to issue them at a discount; he has done nothing to ratify the contract, and there has been no intervention of other rights.

Phipson Beddle, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the respondent company.—In re Ince Hall Rolling Mills Co. decides that a power to issue shares at a discount may be given by the articles of association, and if such power may be conferred, as here, by a special resolution. [COTTON, L.J.—We shall have to consider if that case was rightly decided.] There is nothing in the statute to make this bargain illegal. The capital of a company which the statute refers to is the nominal capital; the capital is the sum agreed to be treated as the liability of the shareholders, a liability on capital account. [COTTON, L.J.—The Act does not speak of issuing capital, but of issuing shares which would entitle the company to call for so much money.] Trevor v. Whitworth is distinguishable, for the effect of purchase of its own shares by a company is either to wipe out that which appears as a liability on capital account or to put down as an asset that which is in fact such. Here the agreement of the company with the appellant was this, "Find us 2s. only, and, with the consent of the other shareholders, you shall be put on an equality with them." The liability of the shareholder is to be measured by his contract as based upon the documents which the statute requires to be registered for the purpose of protecting both shareholders and creditors. Waterhouse v. Jamieson, L. R. 2 Sc. App. 29, 32 W. R. H. L. Dig. 8. [COTTON, L.J.—In that case the memorandum of association stated that so much of the capital had been paid up, and that so much remained unpaid, and the allottee took the shares on that footing; but here the memorandum does not state that the 18s. has been paid on these shares. The Legislature only requires the contract to be registered, and the adequacy of consideration for the contract cannot be gone into so as to make the contract illegal: Anderson's case, 26 W. R. 442, 7 Ch. D. 67; Spargo's case, 21 W. R. 306, L. R. 8 Ch. 407; Ex parte Beer, 33 W. R. 233, 9 App. Cas. 605; Cumbrian v. Wane, 1 Str. 426. If the contract had been to accept from the appellant a Russian bond as consideration for the issue to him of a £1 share and the contract had been registered, that would have been valid. It is a common practice among companies to give commission to get capital subscribed; and that has never been held illegal.

They also referred to Hippisley's case, 22 W. R. 113, L. R. 9 Ch. 12; In re West India and Pacific Steamship Co., L. R. 9 Ch. 11n.

Grosvenor Woods, in reply.—The argument on the other side is that two is or may be equal to twenty. No doubt x may equal twenty, as there is potentiality of increase there. The expression "The whole or a part of the amount remaining unpaid on any share or shares" in section 24, sub-section (2), of the Act of 1867 shows that the amount of the shares is not an imaginary thing.

COTTON, L.J.—I understand Mr. Beale that it has been agreed between the parties that the result of this application is to depend on our decision as to the validity of the contract, and that you do not take any objection as to the form of the application.

Phipson Beale.—That is so.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Chitty, J., who really did not decide the question, but only made an order in accordance with previous decisions of his, and sent the parties here. The question is this: The directors and shareholders of this company determined that there should be an increase of capital of £1 shares, but that they should be issued on this footing—that 18s. should be credited as paid, and that those who took the shares should only be liable to pay 2s. That was in accordance with resolutions of the company which were passed, and there was an offer of shares on that footing to Mr. Allen and others who have accepted those shares. Is that right? Were the directors in a position to give the shares which they offered to their shareholders, and which some of the shareholders have accepted? In my opinion they could not do so, because it is really saying that these shares, which are £1 shares, shall be taken on the footing of 2s. only being paid. That, it appears to me, is quite wrong. I decide it on the provisions of the Act of 1862, also taking into consideration the Act of 1867, on which both Mr. Phipson Beale and Mr. Chadwyck Healey relied. When one looks at the Act of 1862, one finds that that is an Act giving limited liability, and on what terms does it give limited liability? There is to be a memorandum of association, and there are to be articles of association. I will assume that here there is that which is equivalent to an article of association enabling what has been proposed to be done to be done. In my opinion that could not effectively be done in order to protect anyone who held shares, and who had only paid, in accordance with that article, 2s., from being called upon at some future time, if this company is wound up, to pay 18s. more.

Now let us look at section 7 of the Act of 1862. "The liability of the members of a company formed under this Act may, according to the memorandum of association, be limited either to the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares respectively held by them, or to such amount as the members may respectively undertake by the memorandum of association to contribute to the assets of the company in the event of its being wound up." Of course, I need not consider the latter part of that, because it applies to companies of a different description. This was a company limited by shares, and we shall find presently the number of shares and the amount of the shares is to be defined by the memorandum of association, and the liability of the members in such a company depends on the question of what amount they had paid on the shares, having regard to the amount fixed by the memorandum. This appears from section 8, which is this: "Where a company is formed on the principle of having the liability of its members limited to the amount unpaid on their shares, hereinafter referred to as a company limited by shares," that is this company, "the memorandum of association shall contain the following things"—the name of the proposed company; the part of the kingdom in which its registered office is; the objects for which it is established; a declaration that the liability of the members is limited; the amount of capital with which the company proposes to be registered divided into shares of a certain fixed amount. Now, going on those two sections only, this being a company to be limited by shares, the memorandum of association is to define how many shares there are to be and the fixed amount—that is the amount fixed by money—of each of those shares. Then everyone is liable for so much of that amount fixed by the memorandum as it can be shown he has not paid. Then is there any power to alter in that respect the memorandum of association?

That is shown in section 12, and there we find how, and how only, the memorandum can be varied: "Any company limited by shares may so far modify the conditions contained in the memorandum of association, if authorized to do so by its regulations as originally framed, or as altered by special resolution in manner hereinafter mentioned, as to increase its capital by the issue of new shares of such amount as it thinks expedient, or to consolidate and divide its capital into shares of a larger amount than its existing shares, or to convert its paid-up shares into stock; but save as aforesaid, and save as is hereinafter provided in the case of a change of name, no alteration shall be made by any company in the conditions contained in its memorandum of association"; that is to say, it cannot diminish the quantum of its shares, the money amount of its shares, and it cannot limit the liability to pay that amount so as to limit each shareholder and protect him against being called upon to pay what under the 7th section he is liable to pay in the event of being wound up. One must remember one is not dealing with a case where the liability is imposed by the Act itself on persons who join in these companies, but with a case where the liability which they otherwise would have incurred if this Act had not been passed is limited. I do not, of course, refer to the power given by a subsequent Act to reduce the amount of capital, which has not been followed here, but in my opinion, looking to those sections of the Act of 1862 only, it is perfectly clear that an agreement that you should pay 2s. on the shares you take and not pay up the other 18s. which would make up the amount in money fixed by the memorandum of association would be entirely ultrà vires. It has been held that no company can return to its shareholders any of the money which they have paid, and in my opinion, without relying upon the fact that this is in substance returning the money as if it had been paid and then paid back again, there is no power to limit the liability of the shareholders to pay the amount unpaid on their shares. In my opinion it is tolerably clear here that the terms offered to the shareholders were, not that the 18s. should be treated as paid in a particular way, but that the 18s. should not be paid, just the same as if there had been a release given by the company for 18s. of the amount (Mr. Beale calls it the nominal amount, but I call it the amount) fixed in accordance with the Act of Parliament by the memorandum of association. That being so, so far the company and the directors could not issue shares such as they proposed to issue in this case.

Then there comes the Act of 1867, the 25th section of which was relied upon. Does that cover it? I will not rely on the opinion expressed by Lindley, L.J., and I think also by myself, in the Addlestone Linoleum Co. case, for the point really was not for our decision there. I will deal with it as entirely free from and untouched by the expression of opinion in that case. Section 25 enacts that "Every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing and filed." Was that intended to enable this to be done: that the sum fixed by the memorandum of association should not be paid at all in any way? One must see what difficulties had arisen in these companies at the time when this Act was passed. There had been shares taken and there had been agreements entered into—some perfectly fairly—that the amount of the shares should be treated as satisfied by goods to be supplied or goods which had been supplied to the company by the persons who took the shares. That was the prominent mischief intended to be dealt with by this section, and it was therefore really pointing only to the way in which payments for the shares should be made, and not to the question whether the whole amount of the shares should or should not be required to be paid some way or other. In my opinion that is the true construction of this section. If it is paid otherwise than in that which is the ordinary common measure of value—viz., money—then that must be done under some agreement which is to be registered, such as an agreement that persons who shall supply goods shall be paid for those goods in shares, and that they shall be taken as payment for the shares, and that they shall not be paid for in money. It was asked in the argument, "How can you measure the value of goods which are to be given and to be taken in payment of the shares?" If the contract does not define their value, then, unless that contract is set aside as fraudulent, that will fix the shares as paid up, if the contract is that a certain property or quantity of goods is to be taken in payment in full of the shares in the company. But suppose in such a case as this there was a contract that the person taking the shares should give to the company goods or an acre of land fixed by the contract and fixed by the parties as worth, not the amount of the shares, but only 10s., then, although it does not arise for decision here, I in no way intimate any opinion that if such a company were wound up, a person who took shares on an admission that he was only giving half their value would not be held liable for the remainder as a sum which, on his own admission, and on the contract on which he took the shares, must be considered as only payment of part of the amount of the shares, leaving the other half unpaid, and therefore to be called up if there was a winding up. That we have not to decide. But here it is so perfectly clear that 2s. never can be in any way treated as payment of 20s.—because that is what they propose here, and really it is not even put in that way, but thus—that the directors are to treat 18s. as paid and only to call upon the person who takes the shares for 2s. That is equivalent to this: You take the shares, pay 2s., and we will give you a release for the other 18s. However valuable it might be, and however important to the company it might be to get the 2s., yet that, in my opinion, can never make the amount unpaid on these shares less than 18s.

In my opinion that is the true effect, as I mentioned, of this section 25; and I may add this—if it had been intended by this section to do away with those provisions in the Act of 1862, to which I have referred, requiring the amount in money of the shares to be fixed by the memorandum—requiring the number of shares to be stated, and making every shareholder liable for everything which was unpaid on the shares, in my opinion Parliament would have put the section in very different language, and would have really provided for something which they have not provided for here, and stated that there might be a modification of those terms of the original Act in the way in which it is suggested by Mr. Beale it can be done under this 25th section. In my opinion the 25th section in no way intended to provide for any portion of the money value of shares not being paid, but only provided that it might be paid by money value and not by mere money. In my opinion, therefore, there was no power at all to issue shares on the footing of this resolution. If these shareholders were put on the list and remained on the list, they would, in the event of winding up, be liable to pay, not only the unpaid shilling which is now unpaid, but the whole 19s. which still remains unpaid—that being the limit of their liability, and the only limit of their liability in accordance with section 7 and the other sections of the Act of 1862.

The result, therefore, must be that, as the company has put these gentlemen on the list of shareholders, and they did nothing which in any way was an assent to that being done, the contract being one which the company could not carry into effect, we must make an order that their names be removed from the register.

There is no question raised as to the return of the money they have paid. It might probably come within this—that we might direct payment of such damages as we may think right; but, there being no question raised on that point, the order will be to take them off the register of shareholders, and to return to each of them the money per share which they have paid.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I find myself quite unable to agree in the decision of the learned judge. The question which we have to solve, I think, is simply and shortly answered by a reference to this inquiry—what is the nature of an agreement to take a share in a limited company? In my opinion it is an agreement to become liable to pay to the company the amount for which that share has been created. Further, it appears to me to be clear that the liability of the shareholder is limited only by the amount unpaid on the shares. Now, observe, it is the amount unpaid; it is not the amount remaining due. The result is that a release by the company will not diminish the liability—accord and satisfaction between the company and the shareholders will not diminish the liability; nothing will diminish and extinguish that liability but payment. The consequence is we are driven to this short inquiry, Is an agreement to take 2s. for 20s. a payment of 18s.? I say it is not. That appears to me to be the whole question.

Then a supplemental question is raised in this way. It is said that, however it stood under the Act of 1862, the result is to be altered by the 25th section of the Act of 1867. That section is in these words. [The Lord Justice read the section and continued:—] What the exact words to which "the same" refer may be, it is a little difficult to ascertain; but I think the view suggested by Mr. Phipson Beale is the true one—that it means unless terms of payment otherwise have been determined.

Then we come to the inquiry, Is an agreement to take 2s. for 20s. a term or mode of paying 18s.? I have already said in my judgment it is not a payment of 18s. It, therefore, cannot be a term or mode of payment. Consequently the registration of this agreement, which is an agreement in effect to release the 18s., is entirely inoperative under the 25th section of the Act of 1867. When we have determined this question the rest of the matter is arranged between the parties. Mr. Beale has, I think very properly, not thought fit to argue whether such a contract as this, entered into under a common mistake of law, is or is not capable of being rescinded, or whether the 1s. can be returned as damages. It has been agreed between the parties that the result of our application is to depend upon our decision as to the real nature of the contract.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree with the judgments which have been delivered, and I will in a very few words express my views. Every limited company is required to state in its memorandum the amount of capital with which it proposes to be registered divided into shares of a certain fixed amount. Now to my mind this cannot be intended to be an idle or objectless requirement, but the amount of the share is to be the real sum to be paid, either in cash or subject to the restrictions of section 25, that is, in kind, which the company contracts to accept as of that cash value. In section 25 there can be found no provision of any sort or kind excepting the shares from being paid up in full. I can see no practical distinction between issuing shares at a discount and returning to the member a portion of the capital to which the creditors have a right to look as that out of which they are to be paid. Issuing the shares at a discount, to my mind, would be rendering one of the statutory requirements of the Act an empty form. The case of Trevor v. Whitworth has been referred to, and it appears to me the reasoning and the decision in that case is applicable here. Another case referred to was the case of the Addlestone Linoleum Co., where, no doubt, this question whether shares might be issued at a discount was not directly raised it is perfectly true, but there are expressions of opinion by Cotton, L.J., and Bowen, L.J., with which I concur entirely, in harmony with the decision at which the court has now arrived. I am of opinion, therefore, that there is no power to issue these shares at a discount, and that the names of the shareholders in question must be removed from the register.

COTTON, L.J.—I did not in my judgment refer to the case of Waterhouse v. Jamieson in the House of Lords, as I thought I had sufficiently disposed of it in the course of the argument. I do not think it has any application in this case.

In re TIPPETT AND NEWBOULD'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Summons under Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, s. 9—Jurisdiction—Question not affecting purchaser—Married woman—Separate use—Restraint on anticipation.

The court has no jurisdiction, upon a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, to decide the question whether a restraint on anticipation affects the purchase-money, the question being one which does not concern the purchaser.

Where a fund has, subject to a trust for accumulation for a particular period, been bequeathed to a married woman for her separate use absolutely with a restraint on anticipation, that restraint will be construed as operable only to the antecedent period when, and only when, the testator has shown an intention inconsistent with the confinement of the restraint to that period.

In re Bown, O'Halloran v. King, 33 W. R. 58, 27 Ch. D. 411, distinguished.

Decision of Kay, J., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Kay, J.

Leonard Lloyd, by his will, dated the 1st of March, 1869, devised his real estates and chattels real to trustees in fee, upon trust to accumulate the rents thereof, with the income of his residuary personalty, until his youngest child should attain twenty-one, and after that period he directed his trustees to stand possessed of his residuary personal estate and the accumulated income thereof, upon trust for his three children, Annie Maud, Alice, and Alexander, share and share alike, as tenants in common; provided always that the share of each of the daughters should be for her sole and separate use, and that she should not have power to dispose or deprive herself of the benefit thereof by anticipation.

The testator died in 1877. The youngest child, Alexander, attained twenty-one in 1882. Both the daughters married, and in 1883 Alexander assigned his share in the leasehold house, which formed part of the testator's estate, to H. Hall, the husband of Alice.

In 1885 the two daughters and Hall entered into a contract to sell the house. The purchaser objected that by reason of the restraint on anticipation contained in the will the married women could not sell the property. A summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, was taken out by the vendors, asking for a declaration that they had power to sell.

On the hearing of this summons in chambers, Kay, J., was of opinion that the sale was beneficial to the married women, and he directed that, notwithstanding the restraint on anticipation, if it was in force, their interests should be bound for the purpose of giving effect to the contract of sale, and that the purchase-money should be paid to the trustees of the will. And upon the question whether the interests of the married women in the purchase-money were bound by the restraint on anticipation, Kay, J., adjourned the summons into court and directed that the trustees should be served with it. This was done, and, upon the subsequent hearing of the summons in court, Kay, J., held that the married women were, during their respective covertures, entitled only to receive the income of their respective shares of the purchase-money without power of anticipation.

The vendors appealed.

A. Underhill, for the appellants.

[The COURT (Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., and COTTON and BOWEN, L.JJ.), held that there was no jurisdiction, upon a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, to decide the question whether the restraint on anticipation affected the purchase-money, this question being one which did not concern the purchaser. But the court gave leave to amend the summons by making it an originating summons to obtain the opinion of the court upon the construction of the will. And as the trustees were before the court the argument was allowed to proceed on the undertaking of the appellants to amend the summons accordingly.]

The gift to the married women being an absolute one for their separate use after the termination of the trust for accumulation, the restraint on anticipation applies only during the continuance of the particular estate: In re Bown, O'Halloran v. King, 33 W. R. 58, 27 Ch. D. 411. The case of In re Grey's Settlements, Acason v. Greenwood, 35 W. R. 287, 560, 34 Ch. D. 85, 712, is distinguishable. There the gift was immediate.

A. J. Allen, for the trustees, was not called upon.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the order under appeal is right. In construing a will the object is to arrive at the intention of the testator, and in considering what intention is to be gathered from his language we must assume him to have used words in their legal sense, unless there is something in the context to show the contrary. In the present case what we have to determine is, whether the testator meant his daughters to take shares of the capital absolutely, or whether he intended their shares of capital to be held by his trustees for them during their coverture with a restraint on their anticipating the income. Apart from authority, I should have thought it clear that he intended the share of each married daughter to be held in trust for her with a restraint on anticipation. If there had been judicial decisions on words similar to those in the present will, we must have given due weight to them, but there are none. Two cases were cited, but the one which was relied upon by the appellants is quite distinguishable from the present. In that case, In re Bown, it was held that the testator intended the legatees to have the capital paid to them; but in the other case, In re Grey's Settlements, it was decided that the testator must be taken to have intended the legacies to remain in the hands of the trustees, with a restraint on anticipation by the legatees. Both these decisions are, in my judgment, right, and consistent with each other. In In re Bown there was a direction to "pay" to the legatee after the death of the tenant for life. This showed the testator's intention to be that the shares of that legatee should then be handed over to her, and the restraint on anticipation was, therefore, held to be confined to the antecedent period. In In re Grey's Settlements there were no words showing an intention that the legacies should be paid over, and the restraint on anticipation was held to be general.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The point we have to decide is, whether this case comes within In re Bown or within In re Grey's Settlements. In each case the principle is the same. The point to be ascertained is, did the testator mean the money to be handed over to the legatee, or to be held by the trustees for her subject to a restraint on anticipation? In In re Bown there was a direction to pay to the legatee at the death of the tenant for life, which was inconsistent with her being restrained from anticipation after that period; and it was, therefore, held that the restraint was only intended to prevent her from dealing with her share before it came into possession. In In re Grey's Settlements there was no expression of intention that the shares should be paid over to the legatees, and full effect was given to the restraint on anticipation according to its terms.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 523, 19 Q. B. D. 610) in favour of the Crown.

The facts are fully stated in the report below. The question was whether the property of the Institution of Civil Engineers came within the exemption in sub-section 3 of section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, section 11 imposing a duty in respect of all real and personal property of any body corporate or unincorporate at the rate of £5 per cent. upon the annual value, income, or profits of such property, subject to exemption from such duty in favour of (sub-section 3) "property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied . . . for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts."

The arguments were the same as in the court below. Reg. v. Royal Medical Society, 21 J. P. 789, 30 L. T. (O. S.) 133, was referred to as well as the cases cited below.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 22.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question in this appeal arises under section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, which, by sub-section 3, exempts from duty "property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts." The question we have to determine is whether, within the meaning of the statute, the Institution of Civil Engineers is in receipt of an income which is legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science.

The interpretation of the statute is not in dispute. It is well expressed by the Lord President in the case of The Society of Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 14 Court of Sess. Cas., 4th series, 34, where he said:—"But I apprehend that the meaning of this clause of exemption is that the property or income shall be, if not exclusively, yet certainly in the main and as its chief object, devoted to the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts." By this I understand that an institution or body of persons may still be said to exist for the promotion of science, though it may have another and subsidiary object. The question always is, What is the main object. The interpretation of the statute is not in dispute, and upon that we do not differ from the court below. The question we have to determine is whether the subject-matter object of this institution and the application of its property are for the promotion of science.

Now this institution is incorporated, and the charter defines its nature and object as being for "the general advancement of mechanical science, and more particularly for promoting the acquisition of that special knowledge which constitutes the profession of a civil engineer"—not for promoting the profession of a civil engineer—"being the art of directing the great sources of power in nature for the use and convenience of man." The question depends largely upon the way in which that object has been carried out. Giving the best consideration I can to the case, I do not think that the institution is a mere school for civil engineers. I do not think that the object, or the mode of carrying out the object, can be said to be for the promotion of the practice of the civil engineers' profession. The case is not like that of the Society of Writers to the Signet. It is not necessary for a civil engineer to belong to this institution, though it may perhaps give him a higher rank in the profession if he does. It is true that no one can enter as a student there without declaring his intention of becoming a civil engineer; but, as I have said, a man may be a civil engineer without being a member. The object, therefore, does not seem to me to be to educate men as practical engineers; indeed, I think a man must be a qualified civil engineer before he can appreciate the lectures. I think that the main object of this institution, and the mode in which that object is carried out, are for the promotion of the highest form of mechanical science.

FRY, L.J.—The question which has to be determined in this case is whether the funds of this institution are property which, or the income or profits whereof, are legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science. Before going further, let me make one or two observations on the construction of the statute. It appears to me that, in order that the exemption may apply, it must be shown, in the first place, that the property or income is legally appropriated for promoting science; furthermore, it must be shown that it is applied—that is, that it is actually applied—to the promotion of science. The two questions, it is obvious, are distinct. In the next place, I express my concurrence in the rule laid down by the Lord President in the Scottish case (wherever that rule can be found to be applicable), that the inquiry is not whether the property is exclusively, but whether, in the main and as its chief object, it is devoted to the promotion of science. One other observation upon the statute. There is no qualification of the word "science." It is not required that it shall be science in all its branches, nor is it required that it shall be science which produces no practical result; it is not necessarily useless science. The science described does not cease to be science because it may prove, in the language of a great master of science, to be "a rich storehouse for the relief of man's estate." And, again, there is nothing in the statute which indicates that the persons who promote the science must be of a general character; there is nothing to prevent the exception applying, even where the class of persons who are advancing the science may be defined or limited in some particular manner.

Now let me take the first of the two questions which have to be answered in this case. Is the fund in question legally appropriated to the promotion of science as its main object? That question must be answered by a consideration of the charter of the institution. The preamble to that charter shows that a voluntary society then existed for the general advancement of mechanical science, "and more particularly for promoting the acquisition of that species of knowledge that constitutes the profession of a civil engineer;" and then the Crown constitutes the Institution of Civil Engineers as a body corporate for the purposes aforesaid. It appears to me that the fair result of that charter is this, that the society was made a body corporate for the purpose of advancing mechanical science, but that that advancement was anticipated from the activity and the intelligence of a body of men, who were indicated by the name of the association and by the description of the science which was to be advanced—namely, that practised by civil engineers. The question which arises upon this charter may be stated in this way: Is the object of the charter the promotion of the interests of a body of men by their acquisition of science, or, on the other hand, is it the promotion of science by the activity of the men of a particular profession? In my view it is the promotion of mechanical science by the activity of the body of civil engineers. I think, therefore, that the main object to which the fund is appropriated is the promotion of science.

Then arises the second question, which is this: Is the fund or its income actually applied for the promotion of science? In order to answer that question we must consider in what mode this Institution of Civil Engineers acts. On the one side I find that all the corporate members are members of the profession; that all students who are admitted to the lectures of the institution must be the pupils of corporate members; and that there is no sale to the public of the transactions or proceedings of the society. Those three facts tend towards the view that the body is a professional one. But on the other hand it must be observed that membership of this institution is not essential to the exercise of the profession of a civil engineer; that the institution has claimed and exercised no jurisdiction whatever with regard to the professional remuneration or charges of engineers, with regard to the etiquette of the profession or the conduct of its members; and, further, that it does not appear ever to have taken any steps to promote the interests of the profession as contrasted with the general interests of the public. Furthermore, their proceedings are of a highly scientific character, and, though not sold to the public generally, are distributed to a considerable extent to various libraries and persons who are likely to be interested in them. Looking at all these facts, my conclusion is that the institution has not departed from the purposes indicated by its charter, and that the money is in fact applied for the promotion of science through the activity of the members of the Institution of Civil Engineers. I think, therefore, that the money is actually applied for the promotion of science as well as legally dedicated to it. One other observation I will make, which is this: It has been pressed upon us that the membership in this society is of pecuniary value to engineers, and I have no doubt that that is the case; but the observation does not appear to me to go far. It is obvious that membership in many bodies formed for the cultivation of science is of pecuniary value to certain classes of persons. A fellowship in the Royal Society is undoubtedly of pecuniary value to medical men, to engineers, chemists, and others; nevertheless, it is plain that the object of that society is the promotion of science.

In the result I agree with the Master of the Rolls, and I am unable to concur in the judgment of the court below.

LOPES, L.J.—I am unable to agree with the conclusion arrived at by the rest of the court. I agree with the interpretation placed upon the words of the exemption in question, but I am unable to concur with the application of that interpretation to the facts of this case.

The funds of the institution are clearly within section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, and would be subject to duty unless the exemption in subsection 3 applies. This exemption is in favour of "property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied for any purpose connected with any religious persuasion, or for any charitable purpose, or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts." The question which arises in this case is whether the income or profits of this institution are legally appropriated and applied to science within the meaning of the exemption —i.e., legally appropriated by the charter, and, in fact, applied.

In the case of Reg. v. Institution of Civil Engineers, 28 W. R. 253, 5 Q. B. D. 48, the question arose whether the same institution was exempted from payment of poor rates under section 1 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 36 (which exempts from rateability societies instituted "exclusively" for the purpose of science, literature, or the fine arts), and it was held that the exemption did not apply, because it was property appropriated and applied, not for the promotion of general education or science, but for the promotion of a particular branch of knowledge in order to enable the members of the institution to practise with more success the profession of a civil engineer. It is true the statute in that case contained the word "exclusively," which does not occur in section 11 of the Act of 1885, but I do not think that makes any substantial distinction between the principle which applied there and the principle which ought to be applied here.

The Scotch case decided in 1886 was a decision on the exemption now in question. The eminent judges who decided that case seem to have proceeded on the same principle as the learned judges proceeded in the case of Reg. v. Institution of Civil Engineers just cited. The Lord President says:—"I apprehend that the meaning of this clause of exemption is that the property or income shall be, if not exclusively, yet certainly in the main and as its chief object, devoted to the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts." Lord Shand says:—"The object of this society is the maintenance of a permanent body of professional men, with recognized privileges, and the object which anyone joining the society has in view is not education, or the promotion of education, literature, or science, but that he shall become a member of the society in order to the practise of his profession as a writer to the signet." Recognizing the distinction between that case and the present—viz., that it is essential that anyone intending to become a writer to the signet should join the Society of Writers to the Signet, and that it is not essential or necessary that anyone intending to be a civil engineer should join the Institution of Civil Engineers—I am still of opinion the principle of the Scotch case applies and governs the case now before the court. In my opinion the test of exemption or non-exemption may be thus stated: If the primary and direct object for which the institution exists is the promotion of science it is within the exemption, and the fact that it indirectly and subordinately promotes the advancement of a particular class will not deprive it of the protection of the exemption. If, on the other hand, the primary and direct object of the institution is the advancement of its members in a particular profession so as to enable them with more success to practise their profession in a particular branch of science (such advancement of its members being the primary and direct, and the promotion of science the secondary and subordinate object), it is not within the exemption.

I have now to determine under which of these two descriptions the Institution of Civil Engineers should be classed. I think under the latter for reasons, some of which I will state. The institution in the charter and bye-laws is called "The Institution of Civil Engineers," and the declared object of the society is "for the general advancement of mechanical science, and more particularly for promoting the acquisition of that species of knowledge which constitutes the profession of a civil engineer." Under the head of "Constitution" the bye-laws state that the Institution of Civil Engineers shall consist of three classes—members, associates, and honorary members, with a class of students attached. Students are defined as persons not under eighteen years of age, who are or have been pupils of members or associates of the institution, and who have the object or intention of becoming civil engineers. It is of members or intending members of the profession of a civil engineer that the society is composed; the slight admixture of persons other than members of this profession fails to destroy the distinctive character of its constitution. Everything in the bye-laws, the regulations, and the reports, and in the application of the funds of the society points in the same direction. The predominating idea is the education and advancement of civil engineering as a profession. I am of opinion, therefore, that the primary and direct object of the institution is the advancement of its members in the profession of a civil engineer, so as to enable them with more success to practise that profession, and not the promotion of science within the meaning of section 11, sub-section 3, of the Act.

In my opinion the decision of the court below was right and should be affirmed.

Appeal from Charles, J.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Charles, J in favour of the Crown, at the trial of a return to mandamus, whereby the defendants, justices for t city of Manchester, were ordered to hear and determin pursuant to the statutes in that behalf, the matter of t application for a certificate authorising Richard Mo "to hold an excise licence to sell by retail, wine, to consumed on or off the premises, or that they show ca to the contrary thereof." The return and answer of th defendants was that they had "heard and determined the application, to which there was a reply traversing th return, and alleging that the premises were licensed f the sale of beer on May 1, 1869, to which there was rejoinder that the reply was bad in law, on which issu was joined.

Morley was the assignee of a licence to sell beer existing on May 1, 1869. He had applied for a wine licence to the justices of Manchester at the licensing sessions in 1887, who refused to entertain the application. Morley then applied for a mandamus to the justices to hear and determine his application, on the ground that he was entitled to it by way of renewal, as being the holder of a beer licence existing on May 1, 186 The justices treated the application as one for a new licence, and refused it on general grounds.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and R. Wright, for the appellants.—The justices here were ordered to "hold adjourned sessions to hear and determine, in pursuance of the statute," the application of the prosecutor. The return is that they have done so. That is a plea "obedience," and cannot be replied to where there is question raised of the non-exercise of their jurisdiction In re Mainwaring, 6 W. R. 594, 27 L. J. M. C. 278; R v. Justices of Middlesex, 25 W. R. 510, 2 Q. B. D. 5 The application for a wine licence was not for a renew subject only to the four conditions under section 8 the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, nor is it made by transferee under section 7 of the Wine and Beerhou Act, 1870. It is an application for a new licence for t sale of wine by the assignee of a beer licence exist on May 1, 1869, and it may be granted or refused at t absolute discretion of the justices.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and Patterson, for the respondent The return of the justices to the mandamus can pleaded to where they have assumed jurisdiction wh did not properly belong to them, as here, where, ass ing the application to be one for a renewal of a lice the justices can only refuse it on one of the four grou specified in section 8. But they have admittedly refu the application on general grounds. Alternatively t may be said to have declined to "hear and determine the matter as an application for a renewal: Reg. v. J tices of Pire Hill, 33 W. R. 205, 14 Q. B. D. 13. By section 19 of the Act of 1869 any existing holder of a beer, cider, or wine licence might apply for a renewal of any one or more of those licences, provided he held an existing licence on May 1, 1869. Section 10 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 91, explaining 23 Vict. c. 27, especially specifies holders of beer or cider licences as entitled to wine licences. All their then existing rights are preserved by section 14 of the Act of 1869.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case a mandamus had been issued ordering the justices "to hear and determine" certain matters in regard to the licence in dispute. The justices have pleaded in effect that they have obeyed this order, and have "heard and determined" the matter in question. To that the prosecutor replies, traversing as a matter of fact this return of the justices, and alleging that they have not so "heard and determined." To that the replication of the justices is in form what looks like a demurrer. If so, that is an admission by them of the reply, but an allegation that no such reply can be legally made to their return. Where justices, then, make a general return of "obedience" to a writ of mandamus, can any answer be made to that return, or is the court bound to accept it? That question was discussed in Reg. v. Justices of Pire Hill, and it was there determined that some answer can be made, and in certain cases ought to, and legally must, be allowed—namely, where there is a direct traverse of the truth of the statement that the justices have heard and determined the matter. On the true construction of the statutory rules and orders there is an opening left for some answer. Unless it were so, the justices might, from motives of policy or of right, however much they rightly think or justly decide, oust the jurisdiction of the superior courts wherever they decided matters within their jurisdiction, and thus prevent parties questioning the legality of their decision, except by putting them to the expense of raising the question by some other form of procedure. Some answer clearly can be made to the return. The question is, to what extent can that answer go? It is clear that if the replication to the return admits that the justices have heard and determined, but states only that their determination was wrong in law and fact, that is no answer. But if the replication is a traverse of the fact that the justices had heard and determined, that alone might be a bad return. Can the replication, however, go further? If it showed that the justices had declined to exercise jurisdiction in a matter which properly belonged to them, but had exercised it in a matter which did not, then the justices either have not "heard and determined" the matter at all, or, if we are to adopt the true construction on the replication in this case, the justices have declined to entertain one question which it is alleged ought to be within their jurisdiction, but did decide on another matter in regard to which they had no jurisdiction at all. In either case the replication can raise the question whether the justices have fulfilled the order under the mandamus wherever, upon the true construction of the statute, the justices had jurisdiction to entertain the matter, but declined to entertain it. Any such replication, I should say, would be good. The question, therefore, can be raised and determined now by us whether the justices have truly exercised their jurisdiction in this matter in that they have declined to enter upon the question urged by the prosecutor, and in that the true construction of the replication to their return is that they did not in fact enter upon the question which they were ordered to hear and determine at all, but decided only another matter. The justices wholly refused to consider the application of the prosecutor as coming within the conditions for the renewal of licences, and declined the application on other grounds. It would have been no answer to their return had it been alleged merely that they had wrongly decided the application on one of the four grounds on which they are entitled to refuse such applications. The next question for us is, therefore, had the justices any jurisdiction upon this application for a licence to enter upon other questions than those four, which limit their jurisdiction in regard to refusing the renewal of licences? Had they jurisdiction to deal with any matters other than those four named in the statute 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, s. 8? That depends upon what is the true construction of section 19 of that statute. For that purpose section 10 of 23 Vict. c. 27 has been alluded to, but I am of opinion that that section does not assist or derogate from the argument on either side. It affirms nothing, except that there had been a doubt raised as to the construction of a former statute of 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 61), and is merely declaratory of what was always intended to be the true construction of that statute. It is not a new enactment at all. Now two arguments are presented to us. It is said first that if a person had on the 1st of May, 1869, in respect of the premises which he then occupied, a licence to sell cider, or beer, or wine, he was entitled to have under that Act, not only a renewal of the licence for the sale of one or other of those articles which he then held, but also to have one or both of the other two licences, provided that he was not disqualified for holding these by not complying with the four conditions laid down in section 8. It is said, on the other hand, that if such a person had at that date only one of those three licences, he was only entitled to the renewal of that one identical licence subject to the four above-mentioned conditions; that, in fact, he was not entitled to the other licences as a matter of right, but was in the position of a person subject to all the discretion of the justices when hearing an application for a licence for the first time.

It is suggested that the ordinary grammatical construction must apply to section 19, unless there is something contradictory in that construction to the general purport of the section, but is the grammatical construction in any way repugnant to the view urged upon us by the appellant? To avoid any confusion it would have been best to use no conjunction or disjunction at all, but to make each sentence run separately; but it is customary to use conjunctions and disjunctions in English. To get at the true construction of this section, however, you have only to construe the sentence separately in regard to each of the several licences alluded to. Thus, where, on the 1st of May, 1869, a licence under any of the recited Acts is in force with respect to any house or shop for the sale by retail therein of beer . . . it shall not be lawful for the justices to refuse an application for a certificate for the sale of beer . . . in respect of such house or shop, except upon one or more of the grounds upon which an application for a certificate under this Act in respect of a licence for the sale of beer . . . may be refused. By repeating such sentence separately in regard to licences for cider and for wine, the grammatical construction is made quite plain, and the meaning comes to be that if a man holds, on the date specified, one or more of these licences, and applies for its or their renewal, such renewal only applies to the licence or licences which he then holds, and as to these can only be refused upon one of the four conditions specified, but on an application by such a holder of one of these licences for another of the licences specified, that is an application for a new licence altogether, and can be refused at the discretion of the justices. The fact of the applicant's holding a beer licence does not in any affect any application he may make for a wine or a cider licence, and the notice required under section 7 of this Act is equally necessary as in the case of any other application for a new licence. That is my opinion of section 7. If it is wrong as regards that section, can that section be said to be so clear as to overrule our construction of section 19? That would be to explain one puzzle by presenting another puzzle. Even if our construction of section 7 be wrong, I think that makes no difference to our construction of section 19, which is clear, and I am of opinion that our construction is right as regards section 7 as well as regards section 19. I am of opinion, therefore, that the justices had full discretion to grant or refuse the application for the wine licence in this case, and, if so, they have acted within their jurisdiction. This appeal must be allowed; the judgment of the court below must be set aside; and the return of the justices to the writ of mandamus must be held to be good.

FRY, L.J.—Two grounds have been placed before us for this appeal. One is, that if the justices have returned an answer to the mandamus of "obedience," that is a plea within order 53, and is a sufficient answer to any question as to the doubt of such a return. However that may be, it seems to me that here the appellants have not so pleaded. The return by the justices says that they have "heard and determined." This the prosecutor denies by stating certain specific facts. To this the justices rejoin that the reply of the prosecutor to their return is "bad in law and in substance," and then they go on to show this by stating that "the matter alleged did not entitle the prosecutor to apply for a renewal of his licence, nor limit the justices to the four conditions upon which alone they may refuse to renew licences." That amounts to a plea that the justices have admittedly acted out of their jurisdiction if they were, under section 8 of the Beerhouse Act, 1869, limited to refuse the licence only on one of the four conditions applicable therein for the renewal of certain licences, but that if they were not so limited then they had acted within their jurisdiction. Had they jurisdiction, then, to refuse the licence on general grounds? That depends upon the construction to be given to section 19 of the Act of 1869. That construction has been already rightly given by the Master of the Rolls. To construe such a section correctly one must consider two things; the circumstances existing at the time the statute was passed, and the object of the statute. What were the circumstances applicable when this statute was passed? There were, then, two kinds of licences. There were those granted at the discretion of the justices for the keeping of refreshment houses, and those granted by the excise for the sale of beer or cider to any keeper of a beershop, and of wine to any keeper of a refreshment house.

The preamble of the statute recites and declares the system of granting licences at the time, and then proceeds to place beer and cider licences on the same footing as the wine licences to be granted at the discretion of the justices. It further deals with what was to be considered the "moral" rights of persons already holding beer or cider or wine licences, and fixes a date on which those rights are to be determined to accrue. Continuance of life is assured to three classes of those holders of existing licences subject to the four conditions, for non-compliance with which their renewal may be refused. But it is not intended, as it appears to me, that a holder of one or of one or more of these three classes of licences should be qualified to have the other licence or licences which he did not hold at that date. With regard to any such licence, the person applying is put on the same footing as any other of her Majesty's subjects, to be determined in the like manner. The scope of the statute is to effect a continuity for then existing licences and no more. As to the construction of the particular language of the sections referred to, I agree with the Master of the Rolls. The sentence of section 19 contemplates three classes of cases and three distinct classes of licences. Three events are contemplated as following on this hypothesis, and the section must be construed on the well-known principle of Singula singulis reddendo. That is the effect of the grammatical construction, and I am unable to agree with the construction put upon it by Charles, J. As to section 10 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 91, and the plea urged before us on that section, that the holder of a beer licence was granted by it some special right to claim a wine and spirit licence as well, that was merely enacted because some doubt had arisen as to whether the holder of a beer licence could, under any circumstances, claim a wine licence. That doubt was removed by this enactment, which is merely declaratory, and prevents the preclusion of a beer-licence holder from holding a wine licence. It does not qualify him for holding it.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The return of the justices here to the mandamus amounts to a plea of "obedience." I think that such a return can be questioned where the reply is that the justices did not "hear and determine" the matter ordered to be heard and determined. Or, again, in cases where the justices have declined to "hear and determine" a matter on the ground that it would be exceeding their jurisdiction, the reply would be good that they "had not heard and determined." But if the reply was merely to the effect that they had determined the matter wrongly, that would be a bad plea, and the justices' return would be a sufficient answer to it. Here the reply says that the justices did decline to hear and determine the matter submitted to them. That is sufficient to enable us to review the question whether they have, in fact and according to law, obeyed the mandamus. As to the construction of section 19, I should feel no difficulty as to its grammatical construction had not Charles, J., come to a different conclusion. I still think it is clear, for an Act of Parliament. Having regard to the state of things when this Act was passed, I am of opinion that it was intended to provide for the then existing licences only. Such existing licence was to be renewable subject to the four conditions on which refusal to renew is allowed. The holder of such licence must be taken to have a vested interest in that particular licence and in that only; and, in regard to any licence which he did not then hold, he had no vested interest, but must be treated as any other applicant for a new licence was to be treated under the statute.

Not having done this, the defendants issued a summons to dismiss the action for want of prosecution. The plaintiffs thereupon paid the defendants' costs, and at the hearing of the summons they appeared, and consented to an order dismissing the action as against the defendants. The plaintiffs having brought a fresh action against the same defendants for the same matter, the defendants raised the question of law whether the plaintiffs were not estopped by reason of the order on the summons.

On the 13th of May, 1885, the present plaintiffs brought an action against the present defendants and the Great Eastern Railway Co., claiming that a transfer of certain preference stock in that undertaking, purporting to have been executed by the plaintiffs Magnus and Halford, and by B. G. Goldsmid, in favour of the defendants Robertson and Ness was void, and that the railway company should be compelled to register the stock in the plaintiffs' names; or, in the alternative, that the defendant bank might be declared answerable for the value of the stock.

The statement of claim was delivered on the 1st of June, and the statement of defence on the 21st of July, 1885. On the following day the defendants obtained an order on the plaintiffs to file an affidavit of documents, and leave to deliver interrogatories to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs neither made discovery nor answered the defendants' interrogatories within the time allowed, nor had they delivered a reply. Thereupon the clerk to the defendants' solicitors called on the plaintiffs' solicitors and asked them whether, as they had abandoned similar actions against other banks, they intended to abandon their action against the defendant bank. The plaintiffs' solicitors replied that this was their intention, and they offered to pay the defendants' costs. The bill was sent in to them on the 27th of August, and on the 26th of October they wrote to the defendants' solicitors, again promising to pay their costs shortly. In the interval the time for the plaintiffs to give notice of trial had elapsed.

On the 26th of November the defendants' solicitors issued a summons, returnable on the 7th of December, for dismissal of the action for want of prosecution, and wrote to the plaintiffs' solicitors that, unless the costs were paid on or before the 4th of December, they would file evidence in support of the summons.

On the 4th of December the plaintiffs' solicitors paid the defendants' costs, and on the 7th of December they attended with the defendants' solicitors before the chief clerk upon the summons of the 26th of November, and an order was made in the following form:—"Upon the application of the defendants, and upon hearing the solicitors for the applicants and for the plaintiffs, and upon reading the certificate of the fund in court"—which consisted of the sums paid into court by each party to a "security for costs account" to answer the costs of interrogatories—"it is by consent ordered that this action do stand dismissed out of this court as against the applicants, the defendants." The fund in court was accordingly ordered to be paid out to the defendants.

On the 14th of February, 1888, the writ in the present action was issued by the same plaintiffs against the same defendants, except the Great Eastern Railway Co., in respect to the same sum of stock; and on the 24th of March the statement of claim was delivered.

Both this and the former action were occasioned by frauds committed by Bartle Goldsmid, who was co-trustee with the plaintiffs of the stock in question, and through whose acts the fund had been lost to the trust under circumstances which will be found stated in the report of the case of Magnus v. Queensland National Bank, 35 W. R. 752, 36 Ch. D. 25, on appeal, ante, p. 577, 37 Ch. D. 466, which was commenced on the same day as the plaintiffs' former action against the present defendants.

The defendants now applied by motion that the question of law might be tried, before any evidence was given or issue of fact tried, "whether the plaintiffs are not estopped from bringing the present action by reason of the order made on the 7th of December, 1885 (in an action wherein the same parties were plaintiffs and the same parties defendants, and the relief sought was the same as in the present action), dismissing the said action by consent after hearing the solicitors for the plaintiffs and defendants," and that in the meantime all other proceedings in this action might be stayed.

Marten, Q.C., and Farwell, for the motion.—The order by consent dismissing the former action is a bar to this action. Under the old practice dismissal was no bar to another suit unless the order was made at the hearing, but under the present rules dismissal on the plaintiffs' application is equivalent to a dismissal on the merits: see ord. 26, r. 4; ord. 36, r. 12. In Parker v. Simpson, 18 W. R. 205, the dismissal of a bill by consent was held to be a bar to another suit for the same matter.

Renshaw, Q.C., and G. Henderson, for the plaintiffs, were not called on.

KAY, J.—The practice in this court was well settled long before I went to the bar. In Lord Redesdale's book I find the law thus stated on p. 238 of the original edition:—"A decree or order dismissing a former bill for the same matter may be pleaded in bar to a new bill, if the dismission was upon hearing, and was not in terms directed to be without prejudice. But an order of dismission is a bar only when the court determined that the plaintiff had no title to the relief sought by his bill, and therefore an order dismissing a bill for want of prosecution is not a bar to another bill." That practice was somewhat modified by the Consolidated Orders, 1860, ord. 23, r. 13, which has since been repealed. That rule provided that, "If the plaintiff, after the cause is set down to be heard, causes the bill to be dismissed on his own application, or if the cause is called on to be heard in court and the plaintiff makes default, and by reason thereof the bill is dismissed, such dismissal, unless the court shall otherwise direct, shall be equivalent to a dismissal on the merits, and may be pleaded in bar to another suit for the same matter." That order is repealed, and if you look at the Rules of 1883, ord. 72, r. 2, you find, "Where no other provision is made by the Acts or these rules, the present procedure and practice remains in force." That surely cannot be intended to keep on foot a repealed order. I should imagine that to mean the general jurisdiction and practice of the court, such as they are stated to be in the passage I have read from Lord Redesdale. Then in the orders there are directions for the discontinuance of an action before reply. That would be no bar whatever to the bringing of a new action.

The facts I have to deal with are these. The plaintiffs in this action brought, I am told, on the same day, similar actions against other defendants, all of them arising out of the same cause of action, though relating to different subjects, the cause being the dishonest appropriation of certain moneys, to which the plaintiffs are entitled, by a notorious swindler. The plaintiffs have prosecuted one of these actions, and have succeeded, but, pending the prosecution of that action, they were in default in this action, because, the writ having been issued on the 13th of May, 1885, and the statement of claim delivered on the 1st of June, on the 22nd of July, 1885, an order was made against them to deliver an affidavit of documents, and interrogatories were administered. They made default and did not answer, and on the 25th of August, according to an affidavit before me by a clerk to the defendants' solicitors, that clerk called upon the plaintiffs' solicitors, and asked them whether they intended to abandon their action against the National Bank of Scotland, as they had done in actions against other banks. The answer was that they did, and would pay the defendants' costs of the action.

Now if they had merely discontinued the action that would have been no bar whatever to another action. The costs were not sent. The 22nd of September was the last day for giving notice of trial, and the notice was not given, and then there was another inquiry by the defendants' solicitors whether the defendants' costs would be paid. The answer was that they would be paid shortly. Then, that answer having been made on the 23rd of October, the defendants were not content to leave the matter in abeyance. Accordingly, on the 26th of November, they issued a summons to dismiss the action for want of prosecution. That was right, and, as everybody knows, such an order would have been no bar whatever to another action. Then came a letter from the defendants' solicitors saying to the plaintiffs that unless the costs were paid by the 4th of December they should file affidavits in support of the summons. That was answered by a letter of the plaintiffs' solicitors enclosing a cheque in payment of the costs of the action. And on the 7th of December, the day when the summons was returnable, the solicitors on both sides attended before the chief clerk on the summons to dismiss for want of prosecution, and, be it noticed, an order was made in this form: [His lordship read the order, and continued:—] Now if that consent order had proceeded on a compromise of the cause of action, it would have been an absolute bar to a new action. But here the order was made on a summons to dismiss for want of prosecution, an order on which would not be a bar, and therefore, unless it is shown that the consent proceeded upon the compromise of the cause of action, I cannot see how it is possible to say this would be a bar. Can it be said that when you attend on a summons to dismiss for want of prosecution, and submit to an order by consent, that order is a bar to another action? That seems to me against all the rules of the court. There is a great deal more in this than mere technicality, because the principle of the court is that unless the merits of the case have been dealt with, the dismissal of one action is not a bar to another action of the same kind. That is a very ancient rule of the Court of Chancery which I should be sorry to see disturbed. Now when I come to the facts of the case I find there never was any compromise of the action, nor anything like a compromise. It is quite true the plaintiffs were in default, and proceedings might have been taken against them for contempt in order to compel them to put in an answer to interrogatories. But no such proceedings were taken. The object of this summons to dismiss for want of prosecution was to prevent the plaintiffs going on with that action. Everybody knows that would not prevent another action being brought. Of course the plaintiffs were compelled by the terms of the order to pay all the costs of that action.

Now there being no attempt to compromise the cause of action, no agreement whatever amounting to a compromise of the cause of action, how can it be justly said that this order taken on summons to dismiss for want of prosecution, and taken by consent, ipso facto prevented another action being brought? It seems to me that where an order obtained on such a summons is expressed to be made by consent, the court may look behind the order, and see upon what terms that consent was given, and whether there be any ground for saying that it was intended to compromise the action altogether. On the other hand, if it is plain that there was no such agreement, no agreement whatever to put an end to the cause of action by compromise, then the mere fact that the order was worded "by consent" does not, in my opinion, in the least degree prevent the bringing of this action. But the order having been taken in that form, I do not see how it is possible to give any costs on this motion, which I dismiss.

The order should be in this form:—The court being of opinion that there was no agreement to compromise the cause of action, and therefore that the order made on the summons to dismiss for want of prosecution, although expressed to be made by consent, is no bar to the present action, dismiss the motion, but without costs.

Motion dismissed.

BESLEY v. BESLEY. (a.)

Practice — Parties — Amendment — Adding plaintiff — Consent — Trustee and cestui que trust — R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, rr. 2. 11.

The rule of practice that no person shall be added as a plaintiff without his own consent in writing thereto does not admit of an exception where the plaintiff in an action seek to add as a co-plaintiff a person who is a trustee for the plaintiffs.

This was an application by procedure summons on the part of the plaintiffs to amend the writ and pleadings in their action by the addition of the name of C. R. Besley as a co-plaintiff.

By ord. 16, r. 11, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, it is (inter alia) provided that "No person shall be added as a plaintiff" . . . "without his own consent in writing thereto," and a question was raised whether this provision was not subject to qualification where the person proposed to be added as co-plaintiff was a trustee for the plaintiffs.

The facts were as follows:—

By an indenture of lease, dated the 23rd of February, 1871, Ellen Besley and C. R. Besley demised to the defendants certain leasehold hereditaments for a term of twenty-one years, subject to the covenants and conditions therein contained, including a covenant by the defendants not to assign and a power for the lessors to determine the lease and resume possession upon breach of any covenant.

Ellen Besley and C. R. Besley were the executors and trustees of the will of a testator, who was the father of the plaintiffs, who were beneficially interested under the will.

In the year 1885 Ellen Besley died.

In the month of February, 1887, the defendants were alleged to have committed a breach of their covenant not to assign.

On the 13th of May, 1887, the plaintiffs became entitled to the reversion expectant on the termination of the lease of the 23rd of February, 1871.

On the 1st of June, 1887, the plaintiffs commenced an action to recover possession of the premises.

By the defence it was pleaded that in the month of February, 1887, the plaintiffs were not entitled to the legal estate in the reversion.

(a.) Reported by A. D. MACLAREN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Another action was commenced by the plaintiffs for administration of the estate of their father, the testator, and on the 12th of December, 1887, an order was made in the administration action that the plaintiffs might be at liberty to take such proceedings as they might be advised in the name of C. R. Besley (who was a defendant in the administration action) for obtaining possession of the premises and for rent and mesne profits in respect thereof upon the plaintiffs indemnifying C. R. Besley against any liability for costs, such indemnity, unless agreed upon, to be settled by the judge, and the order provided expressly as follows:—"But this order is to be without prejudice to any right which the said C. R. Besley may have to object to his name being added as a co-plaintiff in the existing action, Besley v. Besley [1887 B. 2751], if the plaintiffs shall apply for leave to add him."

C. R. Besley refused to give his consent in writing to be added as co-plaintiff with the plaintiffs in this action [1887 B. 2751], and the plaintiffs accordingly took out this summons.

Maclean, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady referred to ord. 16, rr. 2, 11, and contended that the provision in rule 11, that no person shall be added as plaintiff without his own consent in writing thereto, only applied when the person whom it is sought to add as plaintiff is a stranger to the applicants: Tryon v. National Provident Institution, 34 W. R. 398, 16 Q. B. D. 678; but does not apply when that person is a trustee and the applicants are his cestui que trusts who are entitled to require their trustee to protect them. [CHITTY, J., referred to Mason v. Harris, 27 W. R. 699, 11 Ch. D. 97, and to Duckett v. Gover, 25 W. R. 455, 6 Ch. D. 82.]

Romer, Q.C., and Oswald, Stallard, and Bremner, who appeared for parties opposing the summons, were not called on.

CHITTY, J.—In an existing action the plaintiffs apply to join a co-plaintiff, and the person whom they propose to join will not consent. The question depends on ord. 16, rr. 2 and 11. Unquestionably those two rules must be read together. In rule 11 there is an express statement that no person shall be joined as a plaintiff without his own consent in writing. I am asked to modify in some way or other those words, and dispense with the consent in writing of the proposed co-plaintiff on the ground that he is a mere trustee for the applicants. I am unable to do so. It is a negative clearly expressed and without any exception, and I consider that I am not at liberty to introduce an exception into the general rule of the court on the ground that it might be convenient so to do. The observations of counsel for the applicant might or might not have weight with those who framed the rules, but as a judge sitting here to interpret the rule I must take it exactly as it is.

It is said that the plaintiffs who propose to join this person have a right to use his name, he being a trustee, and that it has been decided in the administration action that they have such right. But the order in that action was made without prejudice to any right which the gentleman proposed to be added, who was the trustee, may have to object to his name being added as co-plaintiff to this action. So that the order which was made giving the plaintiffs liberty to use the name of the trustee was made particularly without prejudice to this question.

The argument in substance is, that I ought to introduce, by way of exception, words which would exclude from this negative proposition the case of a trustee where the cestui que trust has a right to use his name. In my opinion I cannot introduce that exception, and the conclusion I have come to, independently of the case that has been mentioned, is, that I am not at liberty to depart from the express language of the order. It is said that the point now before me was not decided in Tryon v. National Provident Institution, because it does not appear from that case that the person proposed to be joined as co-plaintiff was a trustee for the persons who proposed to join him. I am not satisfied that that is a correct statement of the case. It appears to me, as well as I can make out the facts, though I am not clear on all the facts, that the person proposed to be joined did stand in the relation of trustee to the person who proposed to join him. If so, that would be an express decision on the point. But, however that may be, I decide this case as if it were new, on the express words of ord. 16, r. 11, which are sufficiently clear to enable me to dispense with authorities.

GASCOYNE v. RISLEY AND OTHERS. (a.)

Inn—Licence—Renewal—Objection by justices—No notice—No evidence on oath—35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 42, sub-sections 2, 3.

It is not competent for justices to refuse to grant the renewal of a licence on account of an objection originated by themselves, unless they have first given notice of objection and taken evidence in accordance with the provisions contained in the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 42, sub-sections 2, 3.

This was a case stated for the opinion of a divisional court by the chairman of the Oxfordshire Quarter Sessions.

At the general annual licensing meeting of the justices for the North Wootton Division of the County of Oxford, held on the 2nd day of September, 1887, the appellant, though he had not been required to attend, applied in person for the renewal of his licence to sell intoxicating liquors by retail, to be consumed either on or off the premises, at his house, known as the Pole Axe Inn, situate in the village of South Newington, in the county of Oxford, he being a licensed person entitled to apply for such renewal. No objection to the renewal of the licence was made at any time by any outside objector, nor was any notice of an intention to oppose the renewal served upon the appellant, nor was any adjournment of the granting of the licence to a future day made. But the justices refused to grant the renewal of the licence.

The appellant appealed to the next General Quarter Sessions of the Peace of the County of Oxford, which court confirmed the decision of the justices, subject to the opinion of a divisional court as to whether the provisions of the 42nd section of the Licensing Act, 1872, applied, "not only to an objection preferred before the licensing justices by some person other than such justices, but also to an objection arising in the minds of the licensing justices themselves and actuating them to refuse to grant a licence." If the court should be of opinion that the said section did apply to such an objection by the justices themselves, then the order of the quarter sessions confirming the justices to be quashed.

"Where a licensed person applies for the renewal of his licence:

"(2) The justices shall not entertain any objection to the renewal of such licence, or take any evidence with respect to the renewal thereof, unless written notice of an intention to oppose the renewal of such licence has been served on such holder not less than seven days before the commencement of the general annual licensing meeting. Provided that the licensing justices may, notwithstanding that no notice has been given, on an objection being made, adjourn the granting of any licence to a future day, and require the attendance of the holder of the licence on such day, when the case will be heard and the objection considered as if the notice hereinbefore prescribed had been given"; and "The justices shall not receive any evidence with respect to the renewal of such licence which is not given on oath.

(a.) Reported by CECIL CHAPMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"Subject as aforesaid licences shall be renewed, and the powers and discretion of justices relative to such renewal shall be exercised as heretofore."

Mackarness, for the appellant, contended that the justices were bound to comply with the provisions of the section, and that they had not done so in this case.

He cited Ruddick v. Justices of Liverpool, 42 J. P. 406, and R. v. Merthyr Tydfil Justices, 14 Q. B. D. 584, 33 W. R. Dig. 122.

No counsel appeared for the magistrates.

Cave, J.—Under the 42nd section of the Licensing Act, 1872, the evidence against the renewal of a licence must be upon oath. Here the magistrates entertained an objection in their own minds in regard to which no evidence on oath was taken. It is most important that the functions of judge and litigant should be kept distinct. The magistrates must comply with all the provisions of the statute, which enacts that all evidence must be given upon oath.

The order of quarter sessions, and consequently the order of the justices refusing the renewal of the licence, must be quashed.

A. L. Smith, J.—I agree. I think that, if the requirements of the section had been complied with, it would be open to the magistrates to start an objection to the renewal. In giving this decision it seems to me that we are only following the cases of R. v. Liverpool Justices and R. v. Merthyr Tydfil Justices.

County courts — High bailiff — Wrongful execution — Recovery of possession-money — County Court Rules, 1886, ord. 27, r. 1.

A high bailiff, being a creation of statute, is not in an analogous position to a sheriff.

(a.) Reported by Spencer L. Holland, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Williams, sitting at the county court of Swansea.

This was an action brought by the high bailiff of the county court of Swansea to recover from the defendant, a judgment creditor, the costs of four days' possession of premises taken under a writ of execution, but in which the execution had been fruitless owing to the goods being seized not having been found to belong to the judgment debtor. Judge Williams held that the plaintiff could so recover, from which decision the defendant now appealed.

J. G. Witt, for the defendant.—The fee of 3s. 6d. per day for every day in which possession is kept under an execution is here claimed by the plaintiff as high bailiff, and the county court judge held that such fee was payable, notwithstanding that the execution was fruitless, under the County Court Rules, 1886, ord. 27, r. 1, and schedule B., part 1 and part 3. Assuming the validity of such order, the order only applies to cases of interpleader, and impliedly negatives any claim to the fee where the execution has failed owing to the wrong goods having been seized. The order and fee given in the schedule are invalid. The only subjects for fees allowable are those enumerated in schedule C. of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108—i.e., the fee of 6d. per pound on value of goods seized and a charge for possession, to be allowed at the judge's discretion in actions of interpleader. The County Court Rules are authorized under sections 32, 78, and 79 of that Act and section 16 of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 99, but such powers only extend to the matters scheduled and to the drawing up of new tables of fees. The rules cannot make fees payable for other occasions. A high bailiff is in a similar position to a high sheriff. No fees can be charged for a public duty unless expressly given by statute. A rule or schedule allowing such a new fee is ultrà vires. Fees for possession where there have been no beneficial results from execution have been disallowed for sheriffs by the courts: Newman v. Merriman, 36 L. T. N. S. 397, 20 W. R. C. L. Dig. 78; Royle v. Busby & Son, 29 W. R. 315, 6 Q. B. D. 171. As to sheriffs' fees, see 28 Eliz. c. 4; 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 55.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Wills, for the plaintiff.—Ord. 27, r. 1, is intrà vires. It merely gives the high bailiff the right to claim such fee in cases of interpleader as he had already in other cases. No limitation is mentioned as to when the fee shall not be payable. The schedule simply says "keeping possession, for every day the bailiff is actually in possession, 3s. 6d." The high bailiff is of statutory creation, and is not comparable to the analogous office of high sheriff. His rights in interpleader cases are specially protected by section 72 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. The rules of 1886 only adapt and apply the power given to the court to allow fees for possession under schedule C. of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108.

Witt replied.

April 13.—A. L. Smith, J., delivered the written judgment of the court.

In this case the plaintiff, the high bailiff of the county court of Swansea, sought to recover from the defendant four days' possession-money, at the rate of 3s. 6d. per diem, for having recovered the possession of certain goods under an execution issued, in which the plaintiff defendant was execution creditor. The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant has now appealed, and on his behalf it has been argued that the judge was wrong, because no authority could be shown by which the high bailiff, in the events that have happened, could possibly be entitled to the possession-money he claimed from the execution creditor.

It must be taken, in my judgment, as a fact in this case, that the execution levied by the plaintiff was useless to the defendant—in other words, that the execution levied was not upon the goods of the execution debtor. It was argued as follows—that the high bailiff could only recover from the public fees which by statute were appended to his office, and if no such fees were appended he could recover none. To that proposition I agree. It was further argued that a high bailiff was analogous to a sheriff, and that if a sheriff levies and recovers possession of goods other than those of the execution debtor, without any special order from the execution creditor, he cannot recover possession-money from the creditor for such possession.

As regards a sheriff that is so, and the case cited of Newman v. Merriman supports that contention. In my judgment, however, it is fallacious to liken a high bailiff to a sheriff, for the high bailiff is the creation of statute, and it is by what the statute enacts, no more and no less, that he and his office is regulated. The real question is, what do the statutes and orders made pursuant thereto enact?

By the County Courts Act of 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 83), the high bailiff is to be paid by salary, and the fees are appointed for keeping possession of goods under execution. By section 78 of the same Act such fees are to be those set forth in schedule C. By this schedule it is provided as follows, "High Bailiff's Fee.—For keeping possession of goods till sale, per day, not exceeding five days, 6d. in the pound on the value of goods seized, to be paid by appraisement." This is re-enacted in the rules of 1886. This, as it seems to me, applies when the bailiff has taken the execution debtor's goods in execution, and not when he has taken another man's goods. Also, in cases of interpleader it is enacted that the judge may allow at the hearing the actual costs incurred by the high bailiff in keeping possession of the goods claimed, and no more. By section 79 of this Act power was given to the Commissioners of the Treasury to alter these fees, and a large general power to lay down a scale of fees to be levied is also contained in section 7 of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 50. I find that, in pursuance of this statute an order of the Commissioners of the Treasury, regulating fees, was made, dated the 30th of December, 1867, and also another dated the 26th of October, 1875; both of which are set out on pp. 44 and 45 of Mr. Pitt-Lewis's book on County Courts (ed. 1880.) It would seem that, upon reading these two orders, the result is that only those fees included in schedule C. of the Act of 1856 are abolished, for which new fees are substituted in lieu thereof. The regulation, therefore, quoad costs of possession to be allowed by a judge to the high bailiff under schedule C., remains intact, except so far as the order hereafter referred to may have cut down the power to award such costs of possession to a high bailiff in certain circumstances. In the year 1886 the County Court Rules of that year were duly framed and promulgated pursuant to statute. The all-important rule upon the question in hand is ord. 27, r. 1, which will be found on p. 622 of Mr. Heywood's County Court Practice (4th ed., 1886.) The material parts are as follows: "Where a claim is made in respect of goods taken in execution," if the execution creditor admits such claim, and gives notice thereof in manner by rule provided, . . . "he shall only be liable to the high bailiff for any fees of possession or other expenses incurred prior to the receipt of such notice." The appellant argued that this rule did not give the right to the fee now claimed. The respondent urged that it did. In my judgment it did not, but the true construction of the rule is that it is a limitation of a right which theretofore existed in the high bailiff to get the judge to give him possession-money if he could. As I read the legislation upon this point, by schedule C. of the Act of 1856 the judge may allow at the hearing of an interpleader to the high bailiff the actual costs of possession incurred by him. By section 31 of the Act of 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142) the high bailiff may set in motion an interpleader where a claim is made to the goods he has taken in execution, and in such proceedings the judge may award to the high bailiff the costs of possession. It seems to me that there is here no limitation upon the power of the judge so to award as is suggested by the appellant, nor that he could only award possession-money where the execution was effective to the execution creditor," though, obviously, if not effective, that might be a good ground for the judge refusing the same. There may, however, be circumstances in which, although the sheriff has taken and held wrong goods, he should be entitled to possession-money. The judge, in my judgment, had the power to award such possession-money to the high bailiff, though the execution had been non-effective by reason of not having been upon goods of the execution debtor, and whether he would do so or not was a matter purely for his discretion. The difference in this respect between a sheriff and a high bailiff, as it seems to me, is that under the scale of fees set forth under 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 55 the sheriff is not entitled to his 3s. 6d. per diem possession-money if he has levied on the wrong goods, because that statute does not give such fees in that event, whereas, in the case of a high bailiff, he may, under like circumstances, get possession-money if the judge so directs. In my judgment provision is made by ord. 27, r. 1, that where an execution creditor admits the claimant's claim to the goods seized as by the rule provided, such execution creditor is only to be liable for the high bailiff's possession fee or expenses up to the date on which he (the execution creditor) gives notice that he admits the claim and not after, and in such a case the judge could not award him more; whereas, before this rule, he would have been liable to have been mulcted by the judge of the whole possession-money up to the date of hearing, if possession had been so long kept, and if the judge had so determined. In my judgment ord. 27, r. 1, not being a grant of a new fee, but, as before stated, a limitation put upon what might theretofore have been allowed by a judge against an execution creditor in favour of a high bailiff, is well within the powers given by the statute to make rules and regulations relating to procedure and practice.

I will also add that, in my opinion, considering the eminent persons by whom the rule was passed and adopted, the phraseology of it is cogent to show that there had existed theretofore the power in the judge to award costs of possession as I have before pointed out in fact to have existed. I am therefore of opinion that, under the circumstances, the county court judge had the power to award the plaintiff possession-money for the four days he was in, that there was no excess of jurisdiction or error in law in his having done so, and that this appeal must be dismissed. The judgment must stand against the execution creditor alone, and not against his solicitor, if it has been so entered, but as each party was wrong in the position he took up before the judge—viz., the one insisting that by law he was entitled to the fees and the other that by law he was not—the appeal should be dismissed, without costs.

I think the defendant is entitled, if he desires it, to go before the county court judge in order to contend that such award being, as we hold, within his discretion, he, the defendant, should not have the whole amount here claimed awarded against him. Otherwise the judgment of the county court must stand.

Bankruptcy—Scheme of arrangement—Sale of assets without the jurisdiction—Amount of security—Discretion of court—Benefit of general body of creditors—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 18, sub-section 6.

A proposed scheme of arrangement between creditors and debtors who had assets in America, without the jurisdiction, provided (inter alia) that the American assets should be sold at rather more than their estimated value to one of the American partners, the only provision as to security being that the trustee in bankruptcy should insure the purchaser's life for about one-sixth of the purchase-money. The scheme was approved by the trustee, by the committee of inspection, consisting of creditors to a large amount, by the accountant employed by them to examine into the Chilian affairs, and by the official receiver.

Held (reversing the decision of the county court judge), that the scheme ought to be approved as being reasonable and for the benefit of the general body of the creditors within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 18, sub-section 6.

Appeal from the decision of the county court judge sitting at Manchester.

The appellants were a firm of merchants carrying on business in Manchester and Chili. Their unsecured liabilities amounted to £63,000 and their American assets to about £50,000. A scheme of arrangement with creditors was proposed as follows:—

(1) That the American assets should be sold to Mr. Hodgkinson, one of the Chilian partners.

(2) That the trustee and the committee of inspection should have an absolute discretion to decide as they thought proper all claims by creditors to liens or security.

(3) That the payment of the purchase-money was to be guaranteed by a policy on Mr. Hodgkinson's life for £10,000.

This scheme, which it was thought probable would produce a dividend of 12s. 6d. in the pound, was agreed to and recommended by the committee of inspection, acting on the report of an accountant whom they had sent to examine the affairs of the Chilian house, by the purchaser, and by the trustee in bankruptcy. It was objected to by the respondents, Messrs. Samuel & Isaac, of Manchester, creditors for £7,000, for £4,000 of which they held security in America, on the ground that it involved a too complete surrender of the American assets without containing any adequate security for the payment of the purchase-money. Before the learned county court judge also they had made certain imputations on the conduct of Mr. Hodgkinson, which were subsequently shown to be baseless.

The official receiver also approved of the scheme as reasonable and for the general benefit of the creditors, leaving it, however, to the court to decide the question of sufficiency of security.

The judge refused to approve the scheme on the ground that it was "not calculated to benefit the general body of creditors" within the meaning of section 18, sub-section 6, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. The approval of a scheme of arrangement is no doubt a matter for the discretion of the court, and I am not disposed to interfere unless I think, as I do in this case, that the court has not proceeded upon right principles.

The case is peculiar. The assets are nearly all in Chili, out of the jurisdiction of the court, and the collection of them by the trustee would be most expensive, and might result in a very small dividend or in no dividend at all.

Under these circumstances one of the Chilian partners offers to buy the Chilian assets for a sum representing about their estimated value, the purchase-money to be payable in sixteen instalments within four years. The committee of inspection, composed as it is of competent men of business, who are acting on the report of an experienced accountant whom they sent to Chili to examine the affairs of the Chilian house, are in favour of the sale.

The trustee proposes the scheme, and the official receiver, as the representative of the Board of Trade, approves it as reasonable and for the general benefit of the creditors. It is an obvious feature of the scheme that it contains no provision whatever by way of guarantee, but depends solely for its success on the honesty and capacity of Mr. Hodgkinson. This feature of the scheme the committee, who are creditors of the firm for a large amount and who have had opportunities of forming a just estimate of Mr. Hodgkinson's character, perfectly well understood when they gave it their sanction.

The refusal of the learned judge to approve the scheme seems to have been due partly to imputations on Mr. Hodgkinson's conduct, which were unfortunately made at the hearing, and which have now been shown to be baseless, partly to the feature of the scheme to which I have alluded—the absence of any guarantee. It is said that this is a matter with respect to which the judge was entitled to exercise an absolute discretion; but I cannot assent to this. If the judge supposed that no scheme of arrangement, involving a sale of assets difficult to collect, can ever be approved by this court unless the payment of the purchase-money is to some extent guaranteed, his view was, in my opinion, erroneous. There is and ought to be no such general doctrine. If Mr. Hodgkinson were proved to have wealthy friends, there would be more force in the contention that he ought to find a surety, but this is not proved. As to the suggestion that the payment of the claims of the creditors who disapprove of the scheme should be guaranteed by the creditors who approve of it, nothing can be more unreasonable.

The scheme, then, may be expected to turn out well if Mr. Hodgkinson proves honest and capable, but not otherwise. The majority of the creditors, who are well qualified to judge, believe Mr. Hodgkinson to be both honest and capable, and there is nothing before the court to show that they are mistaken in their opinion, or that the scheme is otherwise than reasonable and for the general benefit of the creditors. The scheme ought, therefore, to be allowed.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. No doubt caution is very desirable as regards the approval of schemes of composition and arrangement, but want of security is not of itself a sufficient reason for rejecting a scheme of this nature. The question is commercial rather than legal, and a scheme approved by such a com-

Practice—Service of writ out of jurisdiction—Discharge of order on ground that no cause of action—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1, sub-section (f).

On an application under order 11 for leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction, it is the duty of the court, in considering whether or not such service ought to be allowed, to go into the facts of the case in order to see if there is any probable cause of action.

Decision of Pearson, J. (33 W. R. 823, 29 Ch. D. 239), reversed.

Appeal from a decision of Pearson, J., reported 33 W. R. 823, 29 Ch. D. 239, where the facts are fully stated. They were shortly as follows:—

Dreyfus Bros. brought an action against the Peruvian Guano Co., claiming, by virtue of a traité with the Peruvian Government, the ownership of certain cargoes of guano. On the 13th of January, 1885, the proceeds of sale of the disputed cargoes which came to England, to the amount of nearly £200,000, were paid into court to the credit of the action of Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co.

The present action was brought by the Société Générale de Paris, a French company, whose offices were in Paris, against A. Dreyfus, a domiciled Frenchman resident in Paris, and sued as Dreyfus Bros., the Peruvian Guano Co., an English company, and Premsel, a domiciled Frenchman resident in Paris, claiming a declaration that the money in court to the credit of Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co. belonged to the Société Générale and other parties interested under a contract of the 6th of July, 1869, for a receiver, and for an injunction restraining Dreyfus Bros. from receiving or dealing with these funds.

On an application by the plaintiffs for leave to serve the defendants with the writ out of the jurisdiction under ord. 11, r. 1, sub-section (f), Pearson, J., held that the evidence showed that there was a possibility of a good cause of action, and in the exercise of his discretion, gave the necessary relief.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

Since that decision it had been decided by the French courts that the defendants had an unfettered right to receive the proceeds of the guano, subject only to the liability to account to the plaintiffs.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the appellants.

Rigby, Q.C., Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Butcher, for the plaintiffs, took the preliminary objection that the order allowing service out of the jurisdiction was a matter of course; and that, at any rate, it must depend on the facts before the judge when service was allowed whether the order was rightly made.

They referred to Call v. Oppenheim, 1 Times L. R. 622.

The COURT overruled the objection.

The appeal was then proceeded with.

COTTON, L.J.—This is a motion by way of appeal from a decision of Pearson, J., to discharge an order made by him for the issue of a writ for service out of the jurisdiction, and for liberty to serve notice of that writ out of the jurisdiction—namely, in France. It is a somewhat singular case, because both plaintiffs and defendants are French people domiciled in France, and there are courts in that country. But the plaintiffs come here saying that it is a case which is within ord. 11, r. 1, for it is an action in which it is sought to get an injunction with reference to a large sum of money which is in court in this country. That is so, and it is really, therefore, within one of th sub-divisions of ord. 11, r. 1. But was it right to bring the action here? Or was it right, of the court, in the discretion given to it to authorize the issue of the writ, and to authorize notice of that to be served in France?

When the case was before Pearson, J., on the evidence by affidavit he declined to discharge the order, and, as I understand, he declined to discharge it on a view of what were the rights of the parties under a particular clause in the contract of participation which had been entered into between the plaintiffs and defendants. He thought that the evidence was doubtful on what must be a question of fact—namely, the rights of the parties under this contract, which was a French contract made between domiciled Frenchmen. I call the Société, Frenchmen because it is a French society. But now we have a great deal more. At the time the order was made by Pearson, J., there was an action brought by Dreyfus in France, in order to have the rights established under the contract as against the other contracting parties, but since that order was made by Pearson, J., refusing to discharge the issue of the writ and the order for service, there have been other proceedings taken by the Société as against Dreyfus in order to have it established in the French courts that the Société had a right to receive this sum, either under the general law applicable to such cases, or under the particular terms of the contract on which Pearson, J., rested his decision. That has been through all the courts there, and the Court of Appeal in Paris and the Court de Cassation have decided against the claims which were raised by the Société.

Now, that really shows that the Société were wrong in trying to establish their claim to this fund in England on the grounds which were relied on by them. In the writ which was authorized to be served they put their claim in this way—these funds are assets of a partnership, we have a right to receive them as against Dreyfus, or, at any rate, the court ought to grant a receiver and injunction. That was expressly decided against the Société in these proceedings taken by them, and so it was ultimately conceded by Mr. Rigby. That being so, we must take it that on that point as to the right to a receiver, and the right to receive the fund personally, the Société were wrong in their contention as plaintiffs here.

Then it was said there was another point, although not raised before the tribunals in France, which would, on the evidence before us, entitle the Société to a receiver, or make it probable that the Société was entitled to that relief. That was the evidence of Mr. Barboux who is their witness. It is pointed out, and it has not been displaced at all either by Mr. Rigby or Mr. Cozens-Hardy, that the very fact on which Mr. Barboux says the further right to get a receiver would depend—namely, that the participation or partnership was in liquidation—was actually before the Court of Appeal when the proceedings were before it, and when it made the order of the 22nd of April, 1886, affirming the decision of the court of first instance, which decided that the Société had no right personally to receive and no right to get a receiver of this fund.

That being so, really the whole case of the defendants has been proved. That is to say, it has been established by the best evidence possible that the matter of fact on which the right of the plaintiffs in England depends does not exist.

Then what ought we to do? If we are satisfied that the tribunals in Paris had not power to protect this fund if they thought right to do so, I should hesitate about discharging the order for the issue of this writ, and for service abroad. But Mr. Barboux's affidavit, on which reliance was placed by Mr. Rigby and Mr. Cozens-Hardy, in my opinion shows quite the contrary. He explains why a receiver would not be granted when the Société was not in liquidation, because it would interfere with the rights and powers and duties of the manager, who in this case was Mr. Dreyfus, the manager of the business which was carried on by the Société. But when the Société is in liquidation, which to my mind can have no other meaning than this, when it is only carrying on its business so far as necessary for the purpose of winding up its affairs, paying its debts, and distributing its proceeds, that does not apply. If that is so, if in fact they will, in consequence of that liquidation being so established or existing, be entitled in France to get a receiver, they can do it, but in my opinion, if it comes before us as a question of fact, I should say that the highest tribunal has decided what the French law is, and therefore gives us positive evidence that they are not entitled there, or consequently here, to get any receiver of this fund.

That being so, what ought we to do? In my opinion, although we determine this matter on evidence now brought before us which was not before the court below, showing conclusively what the French law, as a matter of fact, for us to decide is, we ought not to allow this action to go on. The defendants have not appeared, that is to say, they have only appeared conditionally in order to discharge the order which has been made by Pearson, J., for liberty to issue the writ and for service of notice abroad. I think, therefore, the proper thing to be done is to discharge the order in chambers and Pearson, J.'s order and to discharge the writ. That will put an end to this action.

It is said that we are wrong in considering these questions into which I have entered. That argument was principally based on a case before the other branch of the Court of Appeal, but there are enormous differences between that case and this. There there was an English contract, because it was a bill of exchange accepted in France but accepted payable in England, and there were grave questions as to what was the effect and validity of that judgment which had been given in France with reference to the matter. That is a very different matter from that which appears before us now, where we have this judgment of the highest tribunal in France, which really decides the matter.

As a rule, one ought not to enter into the questions which are to be decided at the trial of the action. But then rule 4 of this order requires that every application for leave to serve such writ shall be supported by an affidavit or other evidence stating that in the belief of the deponent the plaintiff had a good cause for action. Now that affidavit was made. The fact that such an affidavit is to be made shows that the court ought to consider whether there is a probable cause of action in respect of which the writ is sought to be issued and notice to be served abroad. Here that depended not on a question of English law but on a question of fact. Now that fact has been established by the best possible evidence, by the courts which can decide what is French law deciding what the fact is, and the fact is shown to be that there is no cause of action.

Therefore, in my opinion, having regard to that rule, not only are we justified, but we ought, in a case like this, to inquire into any matter which is brought before us by the parties served, showing that the supposition upon which the judge made the order for the issue of the writ was erroneous, and does not exist.

In my opinion, therefore, the appellants are entitled to the order for which they ask.

Then as to costs, that I doubted about, as we were hearing the matter here on evidence not before Pearson, J. But it is shown now that the affidavits which were before Pearson, J., on behalf of Dreyfus correctly stated the fact that was disputed by the other side. They ought never to have stated to the court that a fund existed which the tribunals in Paris, the Court of Appeal, and the Court de Cassation have shown to have never did exist. This also is to be considered, that the matter stood over after the appeal was presented, and before it came before us, in order that the plaintiffs, the Société, might bring the matter before the French tribunals to decide this matter between the parties in order to get their decision to show which was right and which was wrong in the allegations of fact which were raised before Pearson, J.

I think, therefore, we cannot do otherwise than, in discharging the order made by Pearson, J., to give the appellants, Messrs. Dreyfus, the costs both here and below.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I cannot help thinking if the facts now before us had been before Pearson, J., leave to serve this writ abroad would never have been granted.

The controversy is of this nature. The Société Générale de Paris and Messrs. Dreyfus and some other gentlemen entered into a French contract, all being French subjects, for the participation of profits in a certain adventure, and their rights upon that contract depend upon the French law, and French law only, there is no English law in the matter. It so happens that there is standing to the credit of a cause in the High Court a very considerable fund which has been ordered to be paid out to Messrs. Dreyfus, and the Société Générale, by their writ in this action, ask for a declaration that they are entitled to have that fund, and ask for a receiver, and an injunction to restrain Messrs. Dreyfus from receiving it. Under those circumstances they apply for leave to serve the writ in that action against Messrs. Dreyfus.

We have now the matter established clearly enough to enable us to see our way with perfect precision. It is established beyond all possibility of controversy that by French law, the Société Générale are not entitled to receive that money, that they are not entitled to prevent Messrs. Dreyfus from receiving the money, and that Messrs. Dreyfus are the proper people to get it. It is also not in controversy at all that when Messrs. Dreyfus have got it it must be brought into account and accounted for by them as part of the moneys which are subject to the contract to which I have referred. They are the people to get it. Even according to the affidavit which we have last had before us, and relied on by Mr. Rigby, it seems to me to be quite plain that the proper mode of proceeding, even in France, is that they let Messrs. Dreyfus get in that outstanding asset. Whether, when they have got it, matters are in such a liquidation to enable the Société Générale to have it deposited is a question for the French courts, not for us; but it is impossible for Messrs. Dreyfus even to comply with any order of that kind unless they get the fund from us. It is an outstanding asset which the French courts say Messrs. Dreyfus are to get in, and no one has a right to say they shall not get it in. That appears to be the simple answer to the case.

We are referred to order 11, and it is contended that, inasmuch as an injunction is asked, and as an affidavit has been made in the terms required by that order, we have no right to refuse leave to serve this writ, and it has been contended, upon the authority of Call v. Oppenheim, that if we do we shall be running counter to a decision of the other branch of this court. I differ entirely from every one of those allegations. In the first place order 11 enumerates certain circumstances under which, and under which alone, the court can give leave to serve writs out of the jurisdiction. It does not say that when those circumstances occur the court is bound to give leave. On the contrary, the language is that service out of the jurisdiction "may be allowed by the court or a judge" in certain specified events. This shows that the court has a discretion, and is bound to exercise its discretion. This becomes still plainer by turning to rule 2, which states certain matters which the court is bound to have regard to when it is asked for leave to serve a writ in Ireland or Scotland. It is not that you are entitled to have leave simply because you bring your case within one or the other of the eleven rules of order 11. You cannot get the leave unless you do, but it does not follow if you do you are to have the leave. The court has a discretion, and that discretion must, of course, be exercised judicially, and upon proper grounds.

Then it is said you cannot go into the merits. That is quite true. Of course you cannot properly, upon an application to serve a writ, try the action. The object in giving leave to serve the writ is to put the parties in a position to try the action by-and-bye, but at the same time a judge cannot perform the duty imposed upon him by this order unless he so far looks into the matter as to see whether the plaintiff has a probable cause of action or not. I do not think the court ought to look into the defence as distinguished from the plaintiff's case. The court must look at the plaintiff's case and see whether he has a probable cause of action. If he has no probable cause of action, and if the cause of action depends entirely on foreign law, and the proper foreign tribunal has decided against him, that he has no cause of action, there is no ground for exercising the discretion of the court, and the court ought to refuse the leave to serve the writ. That is not contrary to Call v. Oppenheim as I understand it, but quite the reverse. Call v. Oppenheim does not contain a word which goes to show that if the court sees the plaintiff has no case, and if it has already been decided by a competent court that he has no such right as he alleges, this court should go through the farce of giving leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction when there is nothing to be gained by it. Therefore it appears to me, now we have the materials before us in the shape in which we have, that this is a case in which leave to serve the writ abroad ought not to be given, and the appeal must be allowed.

Then, as regards the costs, no doubt there is a little difficulty in consequence of fresh facts having come forward, but the broad result is this, that Messrs. Dreyfus were right throughout. This was a very speculative action. When one foreigner sues another in the courts of this country on a foreign contract he is making a very hazardous experiment in asking for leave to serve the defendant, a foreigner, out of the jurisdiction. If he is wrong, if his opponent is right from the first, I cannot see on what principle the defendant ought not to be indemnified and should not have costs. It appears to me, therefore, the appeal ought to be allowed, with costs here and below.

Lopes, L.J.—Allowing or disallowing service out of the jurisdiction is a matter of discretion. If a primâ facie case is made on the affidavits that there is a cause of action within order 11, and the rules of that order, the court in its discretion permits the service. If, on the other hand, no such case is made out, or if it is shown by the party on whom service is sought to be effected that there is a clear and complete defence, the court in its discretion does not grant, but refuses, such service. Applying that to the present case it appears to me that if this action proceeded, and the judgments in the French courts were pleaded, they would furnish a complete answer to the case which the plaintiff now sets up on the ground of res judicata. Therefore to permit the service to continue would be vexatious and oppressive towards the defendants. I think, therefore, the service should not be allowed.

But it is said that this decision is not in accordance with the decision of Call v. Oppenheim in the other division of this court. In my opinion the decision is in no way inconsistent with that case. It is said that on an application like the present the court is not entitled to go into the merits of the case. That is perfectly true. The court does not go into the merits in the sense of deciding the case, but it is clear that the court must, to a certain extent, go into the facts in order to determine whether or not there is a cause of action, or whether or not there is a complete answer to that cause of action which can be furnished by the defendants. The appeal, in my opinion, therefore succeeds.

Appeal allowed.

Certain goods having been purchased in England, the purchaser sent a consignment note to the vendors "to consign the ten hogsheads hollow ware to The Darling Downs, to Melbourne, loading in the East India Docks here." The goods were accordingly delivered by the vendors to carriers for shipment on board The Darling Downs. The vendors, having heard of the insolvency of the purchasers, telegraphed to the carriers to stop the goods, but this telegram arrived too late to prevent the goods being shipped on board The Darling Downs, *which then sailed for Melbourne. Held, that the transit was not at an end until the arrival of the goods at Melbourne, and that the notice to stop was good.

Appeal by the trustee of the estate of Messrs. Tickle & Co., the purchasers of certain goods, from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Mathew and Cave, JJ.) in favour of the unpaid vendors, who claimed the goods under a notice to stop in transitu.

The facts are fully set out in the report of the case below (ante, p. 185, 19 Q. B. D. 553). It is only necessary to add that on August 8, 1885, Clark & Co., the unpaid vendors, wrote to Bethell & Co., the shipowners, claiming the ten hogsheads as their property, and upon September 21 paid Bethell & Co. the freight to Melbourne. On October 15 The Darling Downs arrived at Melbourne.

The arguments were the same as in the court below, Valpy v. Gibson, 4 C. B. 837, being referred to in addition to the authorities there cited.

R. T. Reid, Q.C., O. M. Plumptree, and C. Lacey Smith, for the vendors, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The purchasers being insolvent, the unpaid vendors had the right to stop the goods in transitu. The right to stop goods in transitu is derived from the custom of merchants, and has been adopted by the courts. It is, therefore, useless to argue the question upon principle; it is a right to stop goods in transitu, although in every respect the goods have become the property of the vendee. The right has always been construed liberally in favour of the unpaid vendor. The doctrine has been frequently stated. If goods which are purchased have not been delivered to the purchaser or to anyone for him otherwise than as a carrier, as long as the goods are in the hands of a carrier for the purpose of carriage, even though the carrier may be the agent of the purchaser to accept delivery of the goods so as to pass the property, the goods may be stopped in transitu by the unpaid vendor. Difficulties have arisen in some cases where the goods are in the hands of a carrier, but the original transit is at an end. Where the transit arises from the terms of the contract or from the directions given by the purchaser to the vendor, the doctrine applies. But where the goods are in the hands of the carrier, not by reason of the terms of the contract or of the directions of the purchaser to the vendor, but by reason of fresh directions given by the purchaser, the transit is at an end—that is to say, if the purchaser gives directions to the vendor to send the goods by carrier to a particular place, to be kept there till a new order is given as to their future transit, the transit is at an end when the goods arrive at that place. The question is, under which head this case comes. Whether the purchaser gave the vendor directions for the carriage to a particular place is a question of fact in each case. The question here is whether the purchasers gave directions to the vendors for the carriage to Melbourne; if so, as long as the goods were in the hands of any of the carriers in obedience to those directions, until arrival at Melbourne, the vendors were entitled to stop them in transitu. The goods were purchased at Wolverhampton. Nothing was said in the contract as to where they were to be sent. The purchasers only gave one set of directions contained in the consignment note received by the vendors on the 28th of June. Is the true meaning of that document that the goods were to be sent to The Darling Downs to be kept there as in a warehouse, subject to fresh orders from the purchasers as to their future transit, and that the transit was at an end when the goods were delivered on board the ship? The ship was in the docks loading for Melbourne. The mate would have no authority to receive the goods on board to be kept as in a warehouse. If the mate had such authority the ship might be kept in the docks for an indefinite time. The business meaning of the document is that the goods were to be delivered on board the ship to be carried to Melbourne. The mode of doing that would be to bring the goods alongside, to take the mate's receipt, and then to take a bill of lading. That was what was done. The mate's receipt meant that the goods were received on board for carriage to Melbourne. The bills of lading were made out in accordance therewith. The goods, therefore, were in the carrier's hands as carriers from the time they left Wolverhampton until they arrived at Melbourne. Fresh directions from the purchasers were not necessary, as the carriage would continue to Melbourne upon their original directions to the vendors.

The argument advanced on behalf of the purchasers is met by a passage from the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in Kendal v. Marshall, 31 W. R. 597, 11 Q. B. D. 356:—"But when goods are bought to be afterwards despatched as the vendee shall direct, and it is not part of the bargain that the goods shall be sent to any particular place, in that case the transit only ends when the goods reach the place ultimately named by the vendee as their destination." That is this very case. We acted upon that rule in Ex parte Miles, 15 Q. B. D. 33 W. R. Dig. 215, where I said:—"In Dixon v. Baldwin, 5 East, 175, Lord Ellenborough, C.J., said that 'the goods had so far gotten to the end of their journey that they waited for new orders from the purchaser to put them again in motion to communicate to them another substantial destination, and that without such orders they would continue stationary.' So here the goods, when they reached Southampton, had got to the end of a journey, but so that at that place they waited for new orders from the purchaser to put them again in motion." That is not the case here. The goods would continue in motion without any new orders until their arrival at Melbourne. Therefore the vendors had a right to stop them in transitu until their arrival there.

Was, then, the notice to stop sufficient? It was not a mere paper notice which could not be carried out. The shipowners were able to stop the goods by telegraph upon their arrival at Melbourne. The notice was a good one. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—It is clear that every delivery to an agent of the purchaser is not a determination of the transit. If the agent is an agent to hold the goods, the transit is at an end. But if delivery is to an agent whose duty it is simply to transmit the goods on, however many such agents there may be, the transit continues until final delivery at the place of destination. I desire to refer to one authority only—Berndtson v. Strang, 16 W. R. 1168, L. R. 4 Eq. 481, where Lord Hatherley (then Vice-Chancellor) said:—"In that ordinary case of chartering it appears to me that the captain or master is a person interposed between vendor and purchaser in such a way that the transitus is not at an end, and that the goods will not be parted with, and the consignee will not receive them into his possession, until the voyage has terminated and the freight paid according to the arrangement in the charter-party." In the present case I have come to the conclusion that the railway company, the Thames Lighterage Co., and the shipowners were agents of the purchasers to carry out the transit. The transit was not at an end until the arrival of the goods at Melbourne, and therefore the vendors had a right to stop the goods in transitu.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The rule upon the subject, in the words of Lord Ellenborough in Dixon v. Baldwin, is that if the goods have so far gone to the end of their journey that they have to wait for new orders from the purchaser to put them again in motion, to communicate to them another substantial destination, and if without such orders the goods would continue stationary, then the transit is at an end. Now when a place is named by the purchaser to the seller as the ultimate place of destination, the transit is not at an end until the goods have reached that destination, and à fortiori, that would be the case when the place of destination is named in the contract. The present case turns upon the true meaning of the consignment note. It seems to me to mean that the vendors were to send the goods to Melbourne. The carriage was to Melbourne. Until the goods arrived at Melbourne the transit would continue, and the right to stop in transitu would continue also.

WERLE & CO., Appellants.
COLQUHOUN, Respondent. (a.)

Income tax—Foreign firm—Trade exercised within the United Kingdom—Profits arising therefrom—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, ss. 41, 44—16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, schedule D.

The appellants, who were wine merchants domiciled and resident at Reims, in France, employed a London firm of wine merchants as their sole agents in the United Kingdom for the sale of their wine, the agents being paid a commission (upon which they paid income tax) on all wines sold by the appellants in the United Kingdom, and paying all expenses. The agents' office was taken in their own name and on their own sole account, and they carried on their own business there. The appellants' name was inserted in the list of wine merchants in the "London Directory." Price lists and circulars were from time to time issued by the agents to wine merchants, with the authority of the appellants, giving the price of the wine and the terms of sale. Orders for wine were transmitted by the agents to the appellants at Reims, and the appellants forwarded the wine direct to the customers, and the goods were invoiced in the appellants' name as vendors, the contracts for the wine being made by the agents in England. The terms of sale were that the wine was sold as it was stored in the cellars at Reims, the cost of packing and carriage being paid by the purchaser, and the wine being at his risk from the time it left the cellars. The appellants kept no wine in England, and had no banking account there. The purchasers either paid the agents, who remitted the amount to the appellants, or paid the appellants direct, and the appellants sent receipts to the purchasers for all payments.

Held, that a trade was exercised within the United Kingdom within the second clause of schedule D. to section 2 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, and that the appellants were assessable to the income tax upon the annual profits or gains arising therefrom.

Held, also, that section 41 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35 did not limit the language of schedule D., but was intended to aid the commissioners in recovering the tax.

Case stated under 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 59, by the Commissioners of Income Tax for the City of London upon an appeal by Werle & Co. against an assessment of £4,000, under schedule D. of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, made upon them in the name of their agents, Fenwick, Parrot, & Co.

The appellants' firm was composed of three persons, all of whom were French subjects, domiciled and residing in France. The business of the firm was that of vineyard proprietors, champagne makers, and champagne merchants at Reims, in France.

The appellants, in pursuance of their business, were in the habit of forwarding and sending champagne to England. The yearly quantity so forwarded and sent was very considerable, and the transactions extended over many years. In addition to the wine sent to England, the appellants carried on a very large business in various other parts of the world, and very large quantities of champagne were annually sold by them for delivery in other countries besides England. Such sales were made on the same terms as those relating to sales to English consumers hereinafter mentioned.

Advertisements in the Wine Trade Review and Gilley & Co.'s Wine and Spirit Circular, both publications circulating exclusively among the wine trade, were from time to time issued and published in England of the appellants' wine, and price lists and circulars were from time to time issued and distributed in England by Fenwick, Parrot, & Co., with the authority of the appellants, detailing the price and terms of sale of the appellants' wine. These circulars were sent to wine merchants and dealers, and not to private consumers. The price lists contained the prices of wines of other manufacturers as well as of the appellants, and at the foot was printed the signature, "Fenwick, Parrot, & Co., sole agents for the United Kingdom." The circulars were dated from Reims, and the signature of the appellants was lithographed on them. At the foot was printed, "With best compliments of Fenwick, Parrot, & Co., sole agents in the United Kingdom.

The appellants had an arrangement with Fenwick, Parrot, & Co., who carried on business as wine merchants, under which the latter acted as the sole representatives in England of the appellants for the sale of their champagne at such prices as were from time to time furnished by the appellants, who paid Fenwick, Parrot, & Co. a commission on all wines sold by the appellants in England, whether through the agency of Fenwick, Parrot, & Co., or otherwise. The appellants did not otherwise remunerate Fenwick, Parrot, & Co., who paid their own office and other expenses.

Fenwick, Parrot, & Co.'s place of business consisted of a set of offices at 124, Fenchurch-street, in the City of London, which premises were taken in their own name and on their own sole account, and where they carried on their own business as wine merchants. The name of Fenwick, Parrot, & Co. alone appeared on the outer door, but on an inside window, which could only be seen from the staircase leading to the office of Fenwick, Parrot, & Co., the following names appeared:—Werle & Co., successors Veuve Clicquot Ponsardin, Reims; Fenwick, Parrot, & Co., agents, late Robert Selby & Sons.

Fenwick, Parrot, & Co. caused the following entry to be inserted in the list of wine merchants in the "London Directory":—"Clicquot Ponsardin Veuve, 124, Fenchurch-street, E.C." Fenwick, Parrot, & Co. made a special payment on their own account to obtain the above insertion. Fenwick, Parrot, & Co. were duly taxed on all profits made by them, including their profits made as representatives of the appellants.

Fenwick, Parrot, & Co. sought for orders for the appellants' champagne in various parts of England. All orders for the appellants' wine were sought and taken for and on behalf of the appellants by Fenwick, Parrot, & Co. as their agents. The orders so obtained were transmitted by Fenwick, Parrot, & Co. direct to the appellants at Reims. In response to the order so received the appellants forwarded the wine direct to the customer, and the goods were invoiced to him in the appellants' name as vendors.

The purchasers paid the equivalent of the amount of the invoice in English money, or by bill on Paris in French money to Fenwick, Parrot, & Co., at 124, Fenchurch-street, and Fenwick, Parrot, & Co. at once remitted the amount to the appellants, or the amount was remitted by the purchaser direct to the appellants at Reims. If paid to Fenwick, Parrot, & Co. it was not carried to the credit of the appellants in any current account. Some amounts due in respect of the wine so sold were paid by bills of exchange drawn by the appellants on the purchasers, and forwarded by the appellants to Fenwick, Parrot, & Co., at 124, Fenchurch-street, in order that they might obtain the acceptance of the bills, which, when obtained, were then held on behalf of the appellants. The appellants sent from Reims formal receipts to the purchasers for all payments, whether made direct or through Fenwick, Parrot, & Co.

The appellants took all gains and suffered all losses occasioned on the sale of any wine in England, and Fenwick, Parrot, & Co. had no interest in any such sale other than their agents' commission on each transaction.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It had occasionally happened that purchasers had not paid for wine supplied by the appellants, and thereupon proceedings had been taken in the English courts in the name of the appellants, and proof in bankruptcy had been made in their own name against a bankrupt debtor.

The terms of sale were that all wine was sold as it was then stored in the appellants' cellars at Reims. The cost of packing and forwarding the wine was paid by the buyer, who also paid the carriage and freight, and the wine was at his risk from the time it left the appellants' cellars. The appellants kept a large stock of wine in Reims for sale in any part of the world, but they kept no wine in England.

The question for the court was whether, on the above facts, a trade, employment, or vocation was exercised within the United Kingdom which rendered the appellants liable to be assessed for duties on profits under schedule D. of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34.

The Queen's Bench Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Field, J.), held that the appellants were liable to be assessed upon the authority of Pommery v. Apthorpe, 35 W. R. 307.

By 16 & 17 Vict c. 34, s. 2, schedule D., duties are imposed "for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person whatever, whether a subject of her Majesty or not, although not resident within the United Kingdom, from any property whatever in the United Kingdom, or any profession, trade, employment, or vocation exercised within the United Kingdom. . . ." By section 5 the duties thereby granted are to be assessed under the regulations and provisions of 5 & 6 Vict c. 35.

Cohen, Q.C., and F. W. Hollams, for the appellants.—A foreigner resident abroad cannot be assessed to income tax unless he has an agent in this country in receipt of the gains or profits: 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, ss. 41, 44, 51—53. If the agent is in receipt of the profits he alone can be assessed, but he is assessed on behalf of the foreign principal. The Legislature cannot be taken as intending to tax foreigners not resident here; there is no machinery in the Act for doing so; it can only assess the agent here in receipt of the profits: Sulley v. The Attorney-General, 8 W. R. 472, 5 H. & N. 711. Secondly, the appellants do not exercise a trade in England. They carry on a trade with England, not in England. It must be admitted, as the case has not found the contrary, that the contracts with the purchasers are made here by the appellants' agents, but the appellants have no office here and no clerks, and no banking account. The property in the wine passed to the purchaser at Reims; delivery being given to him in the cellars there, from which time it was at his risk. The trade is exercised where the profits come home—that is, at Reims: Sulley v. The Attorney-General. The facts in Tischler v. Apthorpe, 33 W. R. 548, and Pommery v. Apthorpe were much stronger than in the present case.

They also referred to Erichsen v. Last, 30 W. R. 301, 8 Q. B. D.414.

Sir Edward Clarke, S.G. (Dicey with him), for the respondent.—It is sufficient if a trade is carried on here. If so, the profits are assessable. The appellants carry on a trade in England, and they are assessable through their agent here. Profitable contracts are made here: per Brett, L.J., in Erichsen v. Last. Pommery v. Apthorpe is not distinguishable. Whether a banking account or a stock of wine is kept in this country or not can make no difference, it is simply a question of convenience to the appellants.

Cohen, Q.C., replied.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The question is whether the appellants are assessable to the income tax, that is to say, whether they are assessable for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to them, although not resident within the United Kingdom, from any trade exercised within the United Kingdom. The only question asked of us is whether, upon the facts stated, a trade, employment, or vocation is exercised within the United Kingdom which renders the appellants liable to be assessed under schedule D. of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34. There is no question asked as to whether they have been assessed in proper form, or whether the right person has been assessed in form. Now if there is a trade carried on in England, it is not disputed that the appellants receive the profits of it. Therefore, the question is this, was there a trade in this wine carried on in England? I agree with Cockburn, C.J., in Sulley v. The Attorney-General, that in each case it is a question of fact where the trade is carried on. The question is divisible into two parts. Is there a trade carried on, and, if so, is the trade carried on in England? It being a question of fact in each case, it is impossible to give an exhaustive exposition of the facts which constitute carrying on a trade. The question must depend upon the facts proved in each particular case. The facts in each case may be different, and yet in each there may be a carrying on a trade. The sole question is whether the facts in this case lead to the conclusion that there was a trade carried on in England. The facts here seem to be these: the appellants, who are wine growers and merchants, keep a large quantity of wine at Reims. They desire to do business in England. Their trade is the selling of wine. They carry on the trade at Reims, but they desire to sell wine in England. They appoint an agent to act for them in England, and they authorize him to send out circulars containing orders, inviting business, and they authorize him to name a certain price for the wine in England, and thereby invite orders for the wine at that price. If [illegible] they authorize him to put their name in the "London directory," the meaning being that they want to do business in England. The agent, with their authority, sends out the circulars in order to obtain orders for the wine at the English price. It is suggested that he had no authority to receive those orders as contracts, but only to transmit them to Reims for acceptance. The inference seems to me to be irresistible as a matter of business that he had authority to receive the orders as contracts to be fulfilled by the appellants. The purchaser wants delivery of the wine in England. The appellants contract to select wine from their store, to pack it, and to dispatch it to the address given in England. They stipulate that they will do that, but they stipulate that they will not pay the cost of the packing and the carriage. But if that is so, it is obvious that the carriers abroad would look to the appellants for payment: the carriers and packers would not be content to look to people in England for payment; though as between the appellants and their customers, the customers are to pay the cost of the packing and the carriage.

Then as to the mode of payment. I have no doubt that if the payment was made to the London agents it would be a good payment. The customers sometimes paid the appellants direct; but the agents here were authorized to receive the money. But in my opinion it is not necessary to decide whether the money is paid in England, because that is not essential to the carrying on trade in England. The fundamental object of a [illegible] of wine is to obtain contracts for the purchase of wine, which he is to fulfil by forwarding the wine. Therefore the contract is the foundation of the trade. The giving the order and its acceptance form the contract by means of which the appellants make their profit. The sale was the substance of the whole matter, the trade being to sell wine. Now was that trade carried on in England within the meaning of the statute. I maintain that one way of testing it is the enunciation by me in Erichsen v. Last. If what I said there takes place the trade is carried on in England. I said that "where ever profitable contracts are habitually made in England by or for foreigners with persons in England, because they are in England, to do something for or supply something to those persons, such foreigners are exercising a profitable trade in England, even though everything to be done by them in order to fulfil the contracts is done abroad." It would be more accurate, instead of saying "such foreigners are exercising a profitable trade in England," to say "a profitable trade is then exercised in England." I think that both the learned judges in that case really said the same thing. Cotton, L.J., said: "When a person habitually does and contracts to do a thing capable of producing profit, and for the purpose of producing profit, he carries on a trade or business." He would naturally go on to say that where that is done in England there is a trade carried on in England, and in effect he does say so. In the present case the appellants contract to sell wine for the purpose of producing profit. If they do it habitually and the contracts are made in England, the trade is carried on in England. So, too, the late Master of the Rolls said the same thing. He said: "There are a multitude of things which together make up the carrying on of trade, but I know no one distinguishing incident, for it is a compound fact made up of a variety of things." Later on he says: "The company habitually receive money in this country from English subjects for messages sent from England to places abroad, and they transmit those messages from stations in this country to places abroad. This, I think, makes it a carrying on of trade in this country." There the trade was sending messages and receiving money for it, and he says that because the messages were sent from England there was a trade carried on in England. In none of those three expositions is any reliance placed on there being, as a necessary condition, an establishment in England. In none is reliance placed upon profits being received in England. The profits may be received abroad, yet none the less may they be profits received from a trade carried on in England. If the profits are received in England, that is a strong circumstance; if there is an establishment in England, that is a strong circumstance; but neither of them is essential. If the trade consists in making profitable contracts, and those contracts are made in England, then the trade is carried on in England. Therefore, upon the authority of that case I have no doubt that here there was a trade carried on in England, because the contracts were made in England, and the making of the contracts is the whole essence of the business. The appellants, therefore, carry on a trade in England.

Then as to the case of Pommery v. Apthorpe, I entirely agree with it. The facts were stronger there than in this case, but that does not show that the facts here are not sufficient. The only other argument raised was this, that if you cannot find anyone to be assessed in England under section 41, there is no trade carried on in England within the meaning of the statute. In other words, though a trade is carried on on behalf of a foreigner not resident here, if he has no such agent as is mentioned in section 41 the statute does not apply. As to this I agree with the judgment of Mathew, J., in Tischler v. Apthorpe, where he said:—"When one looks at the section (section 41) and then at section 44, it is clear that section 41 is intended to aid the commissioners in recovering the tax, and not to alter the incidence of taxation in any way." If the Crown can find such an agent as is mentioned in section 41, it can assess him; but if they cannot, that does not derogate from their right if there is a person assessable. The Crown must by some means or other get at that person. We cannot limit schedule D. by reason of section 41, that section being only machinery. I am therefore of opinion that there was a trade carried on in England.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is not whether a trade has been carried on by the appellants, but whether there is any trade exercised within the United Kingdom, from which it is admitted, if there be such a trade, the appellants receive the profits. I shall not attempt to define what is exercising a trade within the United Kingdom. I agree with the late Master of the Rolls in Erichsen v. Last that whatever else it may mean it includes carrying on a trade. I also agree with him that the question is not one of law, but is a compound fact made up of a variety of things. It is obvious that in many cases there would be no difficulty in determining whether a trade had been carried on at a particular place. A shopkeeper who sells his own wares in his shop and delivers them there plainly carries on business in that shop. But the question becomes more difficult when the trade is carried on, as in this case, in a more complicated manner; when it is carried on by the intervention of agents, and when the contract may be made in one place, the goods may be in another, delivery in another, and the principal in some other place. We have to take all the relevant facts, and the mode in which the business is carried on, and to consider whether that business be or be not carried on within the United Kingdom. It seems to me that the same business may in a sense be carried on in many places. The head office, the place where the goods are manufactured, the place where the contracts are made, may all be places where the business or parts of it is or are carried on.

Now in the present case the appellants, who reside in France, carry on there the business of vineyard proprietors, champagne makers, and champagne merchants. A portion of that business is that of champagne merchants. That means the selling of champagne, and that business they carry on in England through the intervention of agents. They are in the habit of making contracts through those agents. The agents are appointed for the purpose of making contracts for the sale of champagne in England. We have therefore the most essential part of the business of champagne merchants exercised through the intervention of their agents in the United Kingdom. But the matter does not stop there, as, without saying what circumstances are essential, I propose to consider all the circumstances which can in any way be material. The payment is usually made in England by the English purchasers to the appellants' agents. No doubt it is made for transmission to the appellants in France. Then through the intervention of the French carrying agents the goods are sent by the appellants to the purchasers in England, and the actual receipt of the goods by the purchasers is in England. In a certain sense there may be a delivery to those who may be the agents of the purchasers in France. We have no information whether the carrying agents in France are selected by the purchaser in England or by the vendor in France; and so I do not go into the question whether the delivery was in France or not. Then we find that the agents, with the authority of the appellants, issued advertisements and circulars in England for the purpose of securing contracts. The appellants' name is exhibited on the inside window of the agents' office in London, and their name is entered in the "London Directory," which must have been done with their authority. Putting all those facts together, and without determining which of them, if any, is essential, I have come to the conclusion that a trade of selling champagne is exercised in the United Kingdom, whether by the appellants or anyone else I do not care to inquire. From that trade so exercised the appellants derive profits, and therefore I think the answer to the question should be in favour of the Crown.

Then it was argued that we could not determine the question solely by the language of schedule D. It is said that the machinery afforded by section 41 shows that the person not resident in the United Kingdom who derives profits from a business exercised within the United Kingdom, is only to be chargeable in the event of his having a factor, agent, or receiver in the receipt of the profits or gains within the United Kingdom. It is said that the appellants have no such agent, and therefore are not chargeable. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that section 41 does not limit schedule D. I think it gives machinery to be applied where it can be applied. But, further, I think that the appellants have an agent within the United Kingdom in receipt of the profits and gains. The agent is not in receipt of the profits and gains after they have been ascertained by the deduction of the expenses, but he has the receipt of the profits and gains as a part of the gross sum which is paid to him by the purchaser. It is obvious that the profits and gains must be part of the sums received by the agent, and I think that the agent is not less in the receipt of profits and gains because he is in receipt of something else as well.

LOPES, L.J.—The question resolves itself into this, whether the appellants receive profits from a trade exercised in this country. Now this is a question of fact, and I ask where do these profits arise unless they arise from a trade exercised in this country? The contracts are made here, the wines are supplied here to English customers, and the agent is authorized to receive payment here. It seems to me that the profits are earned in England in respect of goods ordered in England, sent to England, and paid for in England by English customers. The profits, therefore, arise from a trade exercised in England, and are assessable. I quite agree with what was said by the Master of the Rolls that there may be profits arising from a trade exercised in England without there being any establishment here. With regard to sections 41 and 44 I need only say that I entirely agree with the interpretation put upon them by Mathew, J., in Tischler v. Apthorpe.

"THE GERTRUDE." (a.)

Damages—Interest—Admiralty practice—Action transferred to Admiralty Division—Jurisdiction by consent.

The practice of the Admiralty Division to allow interest upon the damages awarded is a long-established and sound practice, and cannot be overruled.

In an action to recover damages for injury to a ship, tried in the Queen's Bench Division, and transferred by consent to the Admiralty Division for the purpose of having the damages assessed, interest was allowed upon the amount of the damages awarded from the date of the loss until payment.

Held, that the defendant had, by his consent to the transfer, agreed that the admiralty practice should be applied.

In an action in the Admiralty Division, in respect of which, before the Judicature Acts, the Admiralty Court would have had no jurisdiction, interest was allowed upon the amount of the damages awarded from the date of the loss until payment.

Held, that the defendant, by not applying to have the action transferred to the Queen's Bench Division, had agreed to the damages being assessed according to the admiralty practice.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"THE BARON ABERDARE."

March 15, 17.—Appeal by the defendants from an order of the President confirming the registrar's report allowing interest upon the amount awarded as damages.

The action was brought in the Queen's Bench Division by the owners of The Baron Aberdare against the London and St. Katharine Docks Co., to recover damages for the negligent mooring of The Baron Aberdare, whereby she sustained such injuries that she sank. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs upon the question of liability, and, by consent, it was ordered that the action be transferred to the Admiralty Division, in order that the damages might be assessed by the registrar and merchants. The parties subsequently agreed that the damages should be £7,500, and the registrar awarded the plaintiffs this sum, with interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum till payment. The President confirmed the report: ante, p. 191, 12 P. D. 204.

Hurst (J. G. Barnes, Q.C., with him), for the defendants, contended that interest ought not to have been given.—This is a Queen's Bench case, sent to the Admiralty Division merely for the purpose of assessing damages which the court must assess according to the common law rule. Interest upon damages is not given in the Queen's Bench though it is in Admiralty: The Bellerumbria, 18 W. R. 188, L. R. 3 A. & E. 6; Smith v. Kirby, 24 W. R. 207, 1 Q. B. D. 131. Secondly, the admiralty practice as to allowing interest is wrong, and ought to be assimilated to the common law practice.

F. W. Hollams, for the plaintiffs.—The principle is that the plaintiff is to be put in the same position as he was in before the injury. The admiralty practice is in accordance with the chancery practice. This action was transferred to the Admiralty Division, and must be governed by the practice there.

"THE GERTRUDE."

March 17.—Appeal by the defendants from an order of the President confirming the registrar's report: ante, p. 191, 12 P. D. 204.

The action was brought in the Admiralty Division against the owners of The Gertrude to recover damages for the loss of a cargo. Before the Judicature Act, 1873, the action would not have been within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, as the case did not come within 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 6, the shipowners being domiciled in England. The registrar awarded the plaintiffs £9,[illegible] with interest at the rate of four per cent per annum from the date of the loss until payment.

J. G. Barnes, Q.C. (Hurst with him), for the defendants, contended that interest ought not to have been given.—The Admiralty Division tried this action as a division of the High Court of Justice: section 16 of the Judicature Act, 1873. The old Admiralty Court had jurisdiction to try this case, and so, by section 24, and section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873, the Admiralty Division must now give effect to the claim in the same manner as the old common law courts would have given effect to it if the Judicature Act had not been passed. The practice of the High Court ought to be followed by the practice of the Admiralty Division only applying to cases which were within the jurisdiction of the old Court of Admiralty. At first cases like the present used to be transferred to the Queen's Bench Division, but now the Admiralty Division refuse to transfer them: section 24 of the Judicature Act, 1875. Interest as well as damages can only be given in the cases specified in 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 29.

He referred to Lyell v. Kennedy, 30 W. R. 49[illegible], [illegible] Ch. D. 484; The St. Cloud, Br. & L. 4, 11 W. R. [illegible] Adm. Dig. 24; Kingston v. M'Intosh, 1 Camp. 51[illegible]

Higgins v. Sargent, 2 B. & C. 348; Pellas v. Neptune Marine Insurance Co., 28 W. R. 405, 5 C. P. D. 34.

Stubbs, for the plaintiffs.—This case having been tried in the Admiralty Division, the admiralty practice is applicable. Further, interest has been allowed at common law in cases of this sort: British Columbia Co. v. Nettleship, 16 W. R. 1046, L. R. 3 C. P. 499.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 26.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In the first case the action was brought in the Queen's Bench Division, and the question of liability was tried there, and then, by consent, an order was made to transfer the action to the Admiralty Division for the purpose of having the damages assessed. The damages were assessed according to the rules of the Admiralty Court. One of those rules is that, besides the direct damages, interest is always given from the time of the loss till payment. In the second case the action was brought originally in the Admiralty Division, and the damages were also assessed according to the admiralty rule. In the first case the action might have been brought in the Admiralty Court. The second case was not within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court before the Judicature Act, 1873. It was, therefore, a case which, before that Act, could only have been brought in a common law court.

It was first contended that interest ought not to be given. It was admitted that it is the practice of the Admiralty Court to give it, but it was urged that the Court of Appeal ought to overrule that practice. I decline to overrule such a long-established practice. There is nothing unjust in it; indeed, I am inclined to agree with the learned President that it is more just than the common law rule. Lord Selborne, C., in The Stoomvaart Maatschappy Nederland v. Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., 31 W. R. 249, 7 App. Cas. 795, did not disagree with such a mode of assessing damages. We cannot, therefore, now overrule it.

It was next contended that these were not Admiralty Court cases, but Queen's Bench cases, and that the Admiralty Court should have assessed the damages according to the common law rule, and that, as interest upon damages, at any rate eo nomine, are not given in the Queen's Bench Division, it ought not to have been given in these cases. Now in the case of The Baron Aberdare it must be taken that the parties consented—and this is the understanding of the President, whom I have consulted—to the registrar and merchants dealing with the damages according to the admiralty rule. The parties wished to take advantage of the technical knowledge of the registrar, and so the action was transferred. In the case of The Gertrude it was said that though it was a case which ought properly to have been brought in the Queen's Bench Division, the President had made a rule never to transfer such cases. I have inquired of the President as to that, and he has informed me that he never intended to, and never did, lay down any such rule. On the contrary, if anyone wished such a case to be transferred he would always consider the application. The plaintiff brings such a case in the Admiralty Division because he prefers having a nautical case tried by a judge of the Admiralty Division with nautical assessors. If the defendant objects, no doubt he can have the action transferred. But he also prefers the Admiralty Court, and he assents to the case being tried in that court and according to the admiralty rules. That was what the defendants did in this case. Therefore, in both cases the defendants, by their own acts, submitted to have the damages assessed according to the admiralty practice, thinking, no doubt, that they would be assessed more accurately by the registrar and merchants than by a jury. For these reasons both appeals must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that in both cases, but for the consent, the actions ought, under section 24, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873, to have been tried in the Admiralty Division with the same result as in the Queen's Bench Division. I think that, but for the consent of the parties, it would have been the duty of the Admiralty Court to assess the damages according to the Queen's Bench practice, and I have great doubts whether a direction to a jury in the Queen's Bench to give interest upon the damages would stand. However, by arrangement the parties assented to the cases being dealt with according to the admiralty practice. The President dealt with the cases upon that footing, and it is impossible that we can overrule his decision. The only point argued in the court below was upon the admiralty rules. The other point was not put forward, and for this very good reason, that the parties had agreed that the cases should be dealt with as admiralty cases.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree.

POLLOCK v. LANDS IMPROVEMENT CO. (a.)

Priorities — Charges — Statute—Construction—Implied repeal.

By an Act of Parliament passed in 1849 the General Land Drainage and Improvement Co. was incorporated for the purpose of executing works for the improvement of lands, and undertaking and assisting the execution of such improvements, and other purposes. By an Act of Parliament passed in 1853 the Lands Improvement Co. was incorporated, and, by subsequent Acts of 1855 and 1859, the Act of 1853 was amended; and by the Act of 1859 it was enacted that the three Acts should be read together as one Act, and cited together as the Lands Improvement Co.'s Acts. Both the Act of 1849 and the Lands Improvement Co.'s Acts contained a section which provided that, upon the final order or certificate of the Inclosure Commissioners and the execution of the improvements, the company should have a first charge upon the inheritance of the improved lands in priority over every other then existing or future charge. The General Land Drainage and Improvement Co. obtained a first charge of the nature above mentioned upon certain lands, and the Lands Improvement Co. subsequently obtained a charge over the same lands.

Held, that the sections in the respective enactments were not irreconcileable, and that the charge which was first in order of time had priority over the other charge.

This was an action by the trustees of the London Life Association, as assignees of a charge created by the

(a.) Reported by A. D. MACLAREN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Land Drainage Co., against the Lands Improvement Co., and the question arose whether the charge vested in the plaintiffs and created by the General Land Drainage and Improvement Co.'s Act, 1849, was entitled to priority over a charge of subsequent date upon the same property created under the Lands Improvement Co.'s Acts, 1853, 1855, and 1859, in favour of the defendants.

The property was insufficient for the payment of both charges.

By the Act of 1849 the General Land Drainage and Improvement Co. was incorporated for the purpose of executing works for the improvement of lands, and undertaking and assisting the execution of such improvements and other purposes.

The Act contained provisions enabling any person interested as therein mentioned in land and therein referred to as a landowner to enter into a provisional contract with the company for the improvement by the company of the land in which he was interested, and the execution by the company of works for such improvement, and providing for such provisional contract, after the sanction thereof by the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, becoming an absolute contract, and enabling the commissioners, by provisional order under their seal, to declare that it was right and proper, and for the benefit of the parties having any estate or interest in the lands to be improved, that the moneys paid and to be paid for the execution of the improvements, and for costs, charges, and expenses, or part of such moneys, should be charged upon the inheritance of such lands or a sufficient part thereof.

By the 62nd section of the same Act it was enacted:—"That, from and after the time when the inheritance of any land is, in pursuance of this Act, declared to be charged with any money, the company shall be entitled to, and shall have from the date of the absolute order, a lien and charge upon such lands for the money by the absolute order declared to be charged, with such interest as is contracted for, or, if there be not any contract as to the interest, with lawful interest thereon, and such lands shall thenceforth be and continue liable to the payment of such money and interest, and such lien and charge shall have priority over every other then existing and future charge and incumbrance whatsoever upon or affecting such lands, except quit rents or chief rents incident to tenure and tithe commutation rent-charges and any charges created or to be created under any Act authorizing advances of public money for drainage respectively, if any: Provided always that every such charge shall be redeemable on payment of all principal money, interest, and costs: Provided also that in any case in which a part only of the land charged is subject to a mortgage or other incumbrances, the lien and charge shall have such priority over the mortgage or other incumbrances only to the extent of a due proportion (to be by the circumstances ascertained and apportioned as by this Act provided) of such lien and charge."

The defendant company was incorporated by the Lands Improvement Co.'s Act, 1853, which Act was amended by an Act of 1855, and again by an Act of 1859. By the last-mentioned Act it was provided that the Acts of 1853, 1855, and 1859 should be read together as one Act, and might be cited together as the Lands Improvement Co.'s Acts.

The Lands Improvement Co.'s Acts contained (among others) provisions enabling any landowner (which expression was thereby defined to mean such person or persons in the actual possession or the receipt of the rents and profits of lands as therein mentioned) to enter into a provisional contract with the company for the execution by the company or by such landowner, by means of money to be advanced by the company, of improvements on any land in which he was interested, and, with the assent of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, for charging the money or contract sum for which the company should agree to execute such improvements or the money to be advanced by the company as an improvement loan on such lands, and providing for such provisional contract after the sanction thereof by the Inclosure Commissioners, becoming an absolute contract, and when the sanction of the commissioners should be given to any such improvements for the execution by them and delivery to the company of a provisional order.

By section 51 of the Act of 1853 it was provided that "When the inheritance or fee of any land is, in pursuance of this Act, charged with any money, the company shall be entitled to and shall have from the time from which such rent-charge shall commence and take effect a charge upon such lands for the money so contained and approved by the commissioners as aforesaid, with such interest as contracted for, not exceeding £5 per cent. per annum, or, if there be not any contract as to the interest thereon, at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum, and such lands shall thenceforth be and continue liable to the payment of such charge, and such charge shall have priority over every then existing and future charge and incumbrance whatsoever upon or affecting such lands, except quit rents, chief rents, feu duties, ground annuals, and charges incident to tenure, and tithe commutation rent-charges created or to be created under any Act authorizing advances of public money for drainage respectively, if any."

By an absolute order under the seal of the Inclosure Commissioners, dated the 29th of March, 1864, the commissioners, in pursuance of the General Land Drainage and Improvement Co.'s Act, 1849, declared and absolutely ordered that the inheritance of the lands mentioned in the schedule to the order, being the East Allington glebe lands, was absolutely charged with the sum of £1,362 2s. 8d. paid for certain improvements mentioned in the schedule, and that such charge was a rent-charge of £84 19s. 9d. to be paid by equal half-yearly payments as therein mentioned for the period of thirty-one years from the date of the order.

By an absolute order under the hands and seal of the said commissioners, dated the 15th of April, 1876, the commissioners, in pursuance of the Lands Improvement Co.'s Acts, charged the inheritance or fee of the glebe lands with the payment to the defendant company, their successors and assigns, of the yearly sum of £48 18s. 10d., payable half-yearly as therein mentioned for the term of twenty-five years from the 25th of March, 1875.

The statement of claim stated that the above-mentioned rent-charges were both in arrear, that the defendant Drake was the rector of East Allington, and entitled to the rents and profits of the glebe lands, subject to the said rent-charges; that in the year 1885 divers judgments were recovered against the defendant Drake, writs of sequestration issued to levy the amounts covered by such judgments, and that the defendant Swan, as sequestrator, was in receipt of the rents and profits of the glebe lands and had in his hands a considerable sum representing such rents and profits.

The plaintiffs claimed to have the respective priorities, rights, and interests of the plaintiffs and the defendant company in respect of the two rent-charges of £84 19s. 9d. and £48 18s. 10d. respectively determined, and a declaration that the rent-charge of £84 19s. 9d. had priority over the rent-charge of £48 18s. 10d.

Byrne, for other defendants

Romer, Q.C., replied.

Chitty, J.—The point which I have to decide is presented in such a form as to amount to what I may call a solemn legal conundrum. It is said that each company has a clause in its Act of Parliament enacting that any charge obtained under its own Act of Parliament shall have priority over every other charge, whether existing at the time or made afterwards. On looking at the two statutes that does appear to me to be the case.

The statute under which the plaintiffs claim is the first, and the object of that Act may be shortly stated as being to incorporate a company for the purpose of improving lands, making advances, entering into contracts, and the like, with a view, no doubt, to encourage the improvement of land. It was thought right to give a special privilege to the first company—that is, the privilege which is enacted in section 62—the charge is to have priority (following the language of the section) over every other then existing and future charge or incumbrance whatsoever with certain exceptions. With scarcely a verbal difference a similar section is contained in the defendants' Act of Parliament, which is also an Act of Parliament for the same purpose—that is to say, an Act of Parliament for incorporating another company to do the same thing for the same purpose as the first company was incorporated to do. The Legislature evidently thought that this was a matter in which they might well incorporate these two companies for the same purpose—there may be more, for aught I know—and probably thought that they should not give a monopoly to one company over the other.

It is said that the two enactments are irreconcileable, and that, therefore, the second must repeal the first. I propose to examine that proposition a little. Are the two enactments irreconcileable? I think not. It is not like the case of the Legislature enacting in one private Act that Blackacre (to take the old form of illustration) shall be subject to a charge in favour of A. in priority to every charge now existing on the land and to any future charge, and then enacting, without notice of the statute in favour of A., that B. shall, as regards Blackacre, have a charge in respect of a certain sum of money lent by him on the land in priority to every existing charge and every future charge. It is not that case because that is a case of such particularity that I do not think it would be possible by any reasonable ingenuity to say that the two clauses could stand. I say this is not that case, because, in the present case, the two statutes contain general powers enabling each company to make the advances or to execute the powers which, no doubt, the company will execute although they are not bound to execute, and powers, moreover, which do not relate to any specific land. They are general powers travelling over the whole range of the land which is included in the scope of the Act.

Then I agree that they are not two particular and special enactments; but that they are in the nature of two general enactments. All that the Legislature says is, that if you do that which you are not bound to do—if you execute these powers, you shall then have, as the result, a priority.

But then I come to try the question a little more narrowly on the facts to see whether it is not right and reasonable, on grounds of common sense, to allow these two enactments to stand side by side as not being inconsistent. The first company executed the first work, and when they had done that what was their position? They had, according to their statute, a charge which was prior to every existing charge and every future charge. I leave out the exceptions as only incumbering the case. Is there anything in the second statute sufficient to take away that which had been conferred by the effect of the first, not given, of course, until the first company had executed the power which was given to them? The second Act, no doubt, was in operation at that time, and that is really all that can be said against the statutable priority which is given to the first company. When the second company, who may leave these things alone, come to execute their power, why should I construe their Act of Parliament so as to disturb the priority which already exists under the first, and which has been gained by it? It is a matter of construction. I think the right way is to read them both standing side by side, so that each company may execute its own power and get the priority. But the one which has once got a priority where the two enactments are to be read together maintains that priority, and it is not to be disturbed by the other company under a similar power doing a similar thing. There is another point which is worth considering, and one which may occur as showing that the construction I have put upon the section is a reasonable one. One of these companies first executes certain improvements, and then certain other improvements, and obtains in succession two distinct orders from the Inclosure Commissioners. It is impossible that those two can rank each as prior to the other. One must have some priority. As long, of course, as they are in the hands of the company itself it is an immaterial matter. But these Acts of Parliament provide in special terms for the assignment of charges, and supposing that the company that had got two such orders and two such charges assigned one, and assigned it in such manner as that it could not be said that it had given to its assignee priority, what would be the result? According to one view there would be a deadlock, and each would have priority over the other. That is absurd. I think, in dealing with such a case as that, the right thing would be to say—whether the company had assigned the first or the second, there being nothing, as I say, in the assignment to show priority by contract on the part of the assigning company—that this is a case not within the Act. It is a case in which priority is given over other charges, but as between those two charges it is not given. The only right way is to treat the charges in the order of date as settling the order of priority. That is a similar case to the one with which I have to deal, and I think the proper effect may be given to both these enactments in the way I have indicated. It is not necessary to go through the cases cited, because the point is whether I can reconcile these two enactments. I have reconciled them to my satisfaction and have come to the conclusion which I think the justice of the case requires, and I have answered this supposed difficulty to the best of my ability.

The form of order which I make is this: First, a declaration, in accordance with my judgment, of the priority of the plaintiffs' rent-charge over the defendants' rent-charge; then there must be a reference to chambers for the appointment of a receiver and an order upon the defendant Swan to pay over the balance in his hands to the receiver; and then an account of what is due to the plaintiffs for arrears of their rent-charge.

With regard to the costs, this being a question of priority, the usual rule in a case of this sort, where it is a mere question of priority, is for each party to add his costs to his security.

The plaintiffs will therefore add their costs to their security. Then there will be liberty to apply as to raising the amount found due to the plaintiffs by sale or mortgage of the lands.

ASKEW v. ASKEW. (a.)

Will — Construction — Survivor — Cross-remainders — Estates tail.

A testatrix, who died in 1831, by her will, executed in 1827, devised her real estate after the death of her daughter, as to one-fourth part thereof to the use of Thomas (a son of the daughter), with remainder to the use of his children as tenants in common in tail; and if there should be a failure of issue of any such child or children, then, as to the share of such child or children whose issue should so fail, to the use of the remaining or other of the said children as tenants in common in tail; and, in case there should be a failure of all such children but one, or if there should be but one such child, to the use of such remaining or only child in tail; and, in default of such issue, to the use of the right heirs of the testatrix.

The testatrix devised the other three-fourths of her real estate upon similar limitations in favour of three other children of the daughter and their issue. By a codicil she directed that, in case any or either of her grandchildren named in her will should die without leaving any child or children, then the share or shares of them, him, or her so dying in the hereditaments devised by her will should go to and devolve on the "survivor or survivors" of her grandchildren and the heirs of his, her, or their respective bodies. Two of the grandchildren died leaving children. Another died without having married. Thomas was the survivor, and he died without having had a child.

Held, that Thomas's share, on his death without having had a child, devolved upon the two grandchildren who left children, equally between them, as tenants in common in tail.

Petition.

Ann Cornish, by her will, dated the 20th of March, 1827, devised all and singular her real estate unto and to the use of her daughter, Harriett Askew, for her life, and after her death as to one-fourth part thereof to the use of her grandson, John Adam Askew, the son of the said Harriett Askew, for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of his children, equally as tenants in common in tail general with cross-remainders between them in tail general, and if there should be a failure of issue of any such child or children, then, as to the share of such child or children whose issue should so fail, to the use of the remaining or other of the children equally as tenants in common in tail, and in case there should be a failure of issue of all such children but one, or if there should be but one such child, to the use of such remaining or only children in tail, and in default of such issue to the use of the testatrix's own right heirs for ever. And as to the other three-fourth parts to uses in favour of her three grandchildren, William Pochin Askew, Harriett Francis Askew, and Thomas Henry Pochin Askew, the other children of the said Harriett Askew, and their respective children corresponding to the uses thereinbefore declared of the one-fourth part in favour of the said John Adam Askew and his children, with an ultimate limitation in each case to the testatrix's own right heirs. By a codicil executed on the same day as that on which the will was executed, the testatrix directed that "in case any or either of my grandchildren named in my will shall die without leaving any child or children, then the share or shares of them, him, or her so dying of and in the hereditaments devised by my will shall go to and devolve on the survivor or survivors of my said granchildren, and the heirs of his, her, or their body or respective bodies, it being my will that the same hereditaments shall not devolve on my own right heirs but in the event of all my said grandchildren dying without leaving any child or children." The testatrix died on the 20th of March, 1831. Her daughter Harriett survived her, and died on the 8th November, 1832, leaving all the four grandchildren named in the will surviving. Harriett Francis Askew died spinster, on the 31st of January, 1838, without having disentailed her share in the testatrix's real estate. William Pochin Askew died on the 21st of April, 18[illegible] and John Adam Askew on the 9th of May, 1866. They both left children, and they both disentailed their respective shares in the testatrix's real estate. Thomas Henry Pochin Askew died on the 14th of June, 18[illegible] without ever having had any issue, and having, by will dated the 20th of December, 1886, left all his property to his wife, whom he appointed sole executrix.

This suit was instituted for the administration of the testatrix's estate. All the real estate had, after the death of Harriett Francis Askew, been sold by an order made in the suit, and the proceeds paid into court. The funds in court representing the shares of John Adam Askew and William Pochin Askew had been paid out to them respectively.

The funds in court representing the shares of Thomas Henry Pochin Askew at the date of his death consisted of £581 2s. 6d. India Three and a Half per Cent. Stock. He had, by a deed dated the 12th of July, 1878, disentailed his share.

A petition was now presented by the representatives of John Adam Askew and William Pochin Askew asking that the rights of all parties in the sum of £581 2s. 6d. India Three and a Half per Cent. Stock might be declared.

The respondents were the widow of T. H. P. Askew, and the devisee in trust of the will of John Adam Askew, who was the heir-at-law of the testatrix, Ann Cornish.

The chief question now argued was as to how the share of T. H. P. Askew devolved upon his death.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Tyssen Amherst, for the petitioners.—The word "survivor" must be read "other," and, therefore, the two brothers John Adam Askew and William Pochin Askew, who left issue, took the share of Thomas as tenants in common in tail.

Everitt, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for the widow Thomas Henry Pochin Askew.—The word "survivor" cannot be read "other." The only cases where this has been done are where the gift on the death of one of a class without issue has been either to the children of survivors, or, by reference to previous limitations, to survivors and their children, and the court, finding that the ultimate gift over was not intended to take effect unless there were no children of any members of the class, carried the property back to the children of the members who died first leaving children: Lucena, 26 W. R. 254, 7 Ch. D. 255.

Hammond Chambers, for the devisee of John Adam Askew.—The word "survivor" must be read in its natural sense, and as there was no survivor on the death of Thomas Henry Pochin Askew his share is undisposed of, and, therefore, goes to the heir-at-law of the testatrix: In re Mortimer, Griffiths v. Mortimer, 33 W. R. 441, 54 L. J. Ch. 414, where Kay, J., referred to and followed Nevill v. Boddam, 8 W. R. 490, 28 Beav. 554, and In re Corbett's Trusts, 8 W. R. 257, Johnson, 591.

North, J, (after stating the provisions of the will and codicil, continued:—).—The will having been executed before the Wills Act, the heir of the testatrix would take by descent in preference to the limitation to the right heirs in the will. The provision in the codicil—that, "in case any or either of the four grandchildren shall die without leaving any child or children," then his or her share or shares is to devolve on the survivor or survivors of the grandchildren — applies, in my opinion, to the death of any one of the four without leaving any child or children; it applies to the case of one, or two, or three of the grandchildren dying without leaving any child. But I think it does not apply to the case of all the four grandchildren dying without leaving a child, because it is providing for what is to happen if there should not be a failure of children of all the four. On the other hand, no distinction is made between the case of a grandchild dying in the lifetime of the others, or some of them, or after the death of all the others, and, therefore, I think the provision applies to the death of the last survivor of the three grandchildren who die without leaving a child. The words are, die "without leaving any child or children"; but, as the children take vested interests on their births, the words must, I think, be construed as meaning without having had any child or children," notwithstanding that that construction gives no effect to the word children. I have not referred to the cases which establish that rule of construction, as I have recently had occasion to do so in In re Ball, ante, p. 265, 36 Ch. D. 588. In case any of the grandchildren named in the will shall die without having had any child, the share of him or her so dying is to devolve (that must mean on the death of the grandchild) on the survivor or survivors of the grandchildren and the heirs of his, her, or their body or respective bodies. [His lordship stated the dates of the deaths of the grandchildren, and continued:—] Neither of the grandchildren William and John died "without having had a child." The grandson Thomas Henry Pochin died last of the four without ever having had any issue. The question is, What then became of the share of which he had been tenant for life? In my opinion, that share did not vest in him as the survivor or longest liver of the four grandchildren. Several cases were cited in support of the proposition that the share did vest in him. The case mainly relied upon was Maden v. Taylor. In that case a testator by his will specifically devised certain freehold and copyhold estates to trustees upon trust for the benefit of four nieces named in his will for their lives, to be divided between them as tenants in common, and after the death of any of them in trust, as to her share, for her child or children. And the testator directed that if any of the nieces should die without issue "the share or shares of her or them so dying shall go to the survivor or survivors of them and their heirs." By a codicil the testator specifically devised a freehold estate to a trustee in fee in trust for all the nieces during their lives, equally as tenants in common; and after the death of all or any of the nieces, then, as to the share of her or them so dying, in trust for the child or children of them respectively and the heirs of their bodies, and in case any of the nieces should die without leaving issue living at her or their decease, "then in trust for the survivor or survivors of them my said nieces and the heirs of her or their body or bodies; and in case all of them my said nieces except one shall die without leaving issue, then in trust for such only or surviving niece and the heirs of her body; and in case of a total failure of issue of them my said nieces, then in trust for my own right heirs." The devise contained in the codicil there is extremely like that which is contained in the codicil in the present case, with this notable exception—that there the limitation over to the survivor or survivors is in the event of a niece dying without leaving issue living at her death. Of the four nieces the two who died first and second both left issue. The third niece died a spinster, and the plaintiff in the suit, the fourth niece, was over sixty years old, and had never been married.

Sir G. Jessel, M.R., held, with regard to the property devised by the codicil, that the fourth niece, as the survivor, took the share of which the third niece had been tenant for life, and also that she would take her own share absolutely after her tenancy for life. And the Master of the Rolls came to the same conclusion with regard to the property given by the will. I should feel some difficulty in following that decision, for it attributes two different meanings to the word "survivor" in the same instrument. No doubt the decision has received a certain amount of confirmation from the decision of Fry, J., in Davidson v. Kimpton. But, in my opinion, those cases are at a variance with the decision of Lord Selborne in Cooper v. Macdonald and with that of Kay, J., in In re Mortimer, and the cases upon which he relied. I think that the decision in Maden v. Taylor and Davidson v. Kimpton are also inconsistent with what was said by Baggallay, L.J. (which was assented to by James, L.J.), in Wake v. Varah. Baggallay, L.J., said: "If the words, 'survivor or survivors,' receive their literal interpretation, the death, without issue, of the longest liver is clearly unprovided for, inasmuch as on the death of the longest liver there can be no survivor." In the present case, however, I am relieved from the difficulty of explaining Maden v. Taylor, because the Master of the Rolls decided that case upon the construction of the particular will, and there was then, in fact, a "survivor." But in the present case it appears to me that the language of the codicil is totally inconsistent with the notion that Thomas Henry Pochin Askew could take his own share as the survivor of the four grandchildren. It would be absurd that, in case he should die without having had a child, his share should go over to himself or the heirs of his body. It is clear that it could not go over to him in that way, except as tenant in tail; but, still, it appears to me that it would be absurd to give property to a man in tail in the event of his death without ever having had a child. Thomas Henry Pochin Askew cannot, therefore, in my opinion, take the share of which he was tenant for life absolutely as having survived the other three grandchildren.

The next question is, What meaning is to be attached to the words "survivor" or "survivors"? and for this purpose the words of the ultimate gift over are very important. The codicil is, in substance, an explanation or modification of the gift over to the right heirs of the testatrix contained in the will. It says that the gift over is not to take effect except in the event of all the four grandchildren being dead without ever having had any children. What is meant by the gift to the "survivor or survivors" of the grandchildren? If Thomas Henry Pochin Askew had died third in order of the grandchildren, I might have felt a difficulty in departing from the decision in Maden v. Taylor. I might have felt myself bound to follow that case. But in the present case the words are very strong that the property is not to go over to the right heirs of the testatrix until all the four grandchildren are dead without having had any children. It seems to me that crossremainders between the grandchildren ought to be implied, and I think that this follows from Maden v. Taylor itself. In that case Sir G. Jessel, M.R., during the course of the argument, said:—"The difficulty I feel in implying cross-remainders here is, that the gift over is on failure of issue at a particular period. In the ordinary case, where the gift over is on an indefinite failure of issue, the implication makes an exhaustive disposition; nothing can descend to the heir. But where the failure of issue is restricted to the death of the tenant for life, the heir may come in after all, notwithstanding the implication, for the tenant in tail may survive the tenant for life or the particular period, and then die without issue. Still, I am in favour of extending the rule, if it is an extension." And afterwards, in giving judgment, he said:—"For myself, I have no doubt that I ought to imply cross-remainders. I think the true rule laid down in the old case of Doe v. Webb, 1 Taunt. 234, that, in order to ascertain whether you should imply cross-remainders, you have to ascertain whether the testator intended that the whole estate should go over together. If you once get to that point, that he intends the whole estate to go over together, you are not to let a fraction of it descend to the heir-at-law in the meantime. You are to assume that what is to go over together, being the entire estate, is to remain subject to the prior limitations until the period when it is to go over arrives." These observations appear to me to apply exactly to the present case. And there is another consideration which appears to me equally strong. It is a well-known rule of construction that a devise of land to A. after the death of B. does not create an implied gift of the land to B. for his life unless A. be the heir-at-law of the testator. In that case a gift of the land to B. for his life is implied, because it cannot be supposed that the testator, when he expressly gives the land to his heir after the death of B., could have intended that the heir should also take the lands as undisposed of during the life of B. In the present case the ultimate gift over is to the right heirs of the testatrix, and the codicil makes it clear that she did not intend anything to go over to her heir-at-law until all the four grandchildren were dead without having had any children. The previous gift ought, therefore, to be construed in such a way as to fill up the blank until the gift over to the right heirs takes effect. It seems to me, therefore, that on both those grounds I am driven to say that cross-remainders between the grandchildren ought to be implied, thus providing for every event except that in which the estate is to go over to the heir of the testatrix—that is, upon the death of all the grandchildren without having had a child.

What, then, are the cross-remainders which ought to be implied? The words "survivor or survivors" may be read "other or others," and that was the construction put upon the word "survivors" by the House of Lords in Smith v. Osborne. In that case Thomas Carr, by his will, devised lands to the use of his daughters, Elizabeth and Francis, as tenants in common in tail, and if either daughter should die without issue, then to the use of the surviving daughter in tail, with remainder to the use of his right heirs. Lord Cranworth said:—"I think the word 'surviving' in the will of Thomas Carr must be construed 'other.' I entirely approve of the rule now generally acted on of giving to the word 'surviving' its ordinary and natural meaning, and not construing it to mean 'other.' Courts have no right to alter the language of a testator merely to effect what they conjecture him to have intended to say, when that is at variance with what he has in fact said. But the words of a will, after all, are but the means of expressing the testator's intention, and where the intention is plain from the words themselves, it is then the duty of the court to execute the intention, however inartificially expressed. And here the language shows that by the word 'surviving' the testator must have meant 'other.' Th[illegible] not a gift to a class, and on the death of one or more [illegible] survivor or survivors; but a gift to two desig[illegible] devisees—that is, the testator's two daughters [illegible] tenants in common in tail, and, if either should [illegible] without issue, then to the surviving daughter and [illegible] heirs of her body. Unless the word 'surviving' [illegible] be taken here to mean 'other,' the intention cannot [illegible] carried into effect, for he means his gift over to [illegible] into operation if either of his daughters dies wi[illegible] issue—that is, on the death of the daughter who [illegible] first or the daughter who dies last, and the latter [illegible] cannot be accomplished unless the word 'survi[illegible] shall be so read as to be rendered capable of [illegible] applied to the predeceasing daughter." And [illegible] Wensleydale expressed his opinion to the same [illegible] That case, as it seems to me, is an authority for [illegible] struing the words "survivor or survivors" in the p[illegible] case "other or others." Another construction [illegible] lead to the same result. Cross-remainders mig[illegible] implied without altering the natural meaning of [illegible] words "survivor" or "survivors," and if the surv[illegible] the four grandchildren should die without havin[illegible] a child his share would go over to the other or [illegible] of the grandchildren in tail. Another question [illegible] have been raised, but I do not intend to decide it, [illegible] is unnecessary to do so. I mean whether the sh[illegible] Harriett Askew devolved upon her death, without h[illegible] had a child, upon the other three grandchildren in [illegible] or upon John and William Askew, the two who [illegible] children. I prefer not to deal with that questio[illegible] in either view the result will be the same, for, if [illegible] third of this fourth devolved on Thomas Henry [illegible] Askew, it would, on his death, without having [illegible] child, devolve upon John and William in tail.

I, therefore, make a declaration that, if the ev[illegible] which have happened, the one-fourth share which [illegible] devised to Thomas Henry Pochin Ask[illegible] for his [illegible] vested, subject to his life estate, in John and Wi[illegible] Askew as tenants in common in tail.

Case stated under 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19.

(a.) Reported by Sir Sherston Baker, Barrister-at-[illegible]

This was an appeal from the decision of the Commissioners of Income Tax for the district of Leyland, in the county of Lancaster. The appellant claimed to be entitled to a deduction from income tax under section 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), on an average for twenty-one years of a sum of £16,541 expended by him in protecting his assessed lands from the overflowing of a tidal river (the Ribble). The commissioners refused to allow the deduction claimed.

The facts were as follows:—

Hesketh-with-Becconsall is a township situate on the south side of, and adjoining, the estuary of the tidal River Ribble.

In 1858 the appellant's father and predecessor in title bought from the Ribble Navigation Co., in whom the navigation of the River Ribble was vested under a special Act passed in 1853, about 2,000 acres of uninclosed land marked as "tidal water" in the Ordnance Survey map of 1848.

Prior to 1880 this land, by reason of the execution of the powers of the Ribble Navigation Co.'s Act, and by the consequent changes in the course of the channel of the River, and by consequent gradual accretion, as well before as after the purchase by the appellant's father, had been so far gained or reclaimed that, though still open to the River Ribble and liable to be more or less flooded at every tide, the greater portion (including 1,044 acres which were the subject of this appeal) had become covered with short herbage, and formed the salt marsh called Hesketh Marsh.

The land in that condition was worth, as pasturage, from 5s. to 10s. per acre per annum, and was assessed to the poor rate and income tax at from £300 to £350 per annum.

In 1880 the appellant began to execute works in order to exclude the tidal water from a portion, being the land in question, of the 2,000 acres. These works, consisting of an embankment over three miles in length and about twelve feet in height, with the necessary provision for drainage and access by roads, were successfully completed in 1885, and in that year about 526 acres had been brought under cultivation. The total cost incurred by the appellant in executing such works was £16,541.

The land with the tidal water excluded lets at a yearly rental of from £3 to £3 10s. per acre. By 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 60, No. 5: "Particular deductions and allowances in respect of the duties under schedule (A). 5. For the amount charged on lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages by a public rate or assessment in respect of draining, fencing, or embanking the same."

By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 37: "In charging the duty under schedule (A) of this Act in respect of lands, an allowance and deduction shall be made for the amount expended by the landlord or owner thereof on an average of the twenty-one preceding years in the making or repairing of sea walls or other embankments necessary for the preservation or protection of such lands against the encroachment or overflowing of the sea or any tidal river, although the sums expended may not have been rated on such lands by any public rate or assessment."

C. A. Cripps, for the appellant.—The appellant is entitled to the deduction he claims. Neither section 37 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, nor Schedule A. No. 5 of section 60 of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35 create any distinction between reclamation of land and protection of land. The general intention of the Legislature is to encourage works of drainage. The map kept by the authority of the Ribble Navigation Co.'s Act shows that the lands in question were marked in 1858 as "reclaimed." The embankment was made by the appellant in 1880, and the lands were assessed to income tax before that date. The embankment was therefore, within section 37 of the Act of 1853, necessary for the preservation or protection of lands against the overflowing of a tidal river.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G. (A. V. Dicey with him), for the respondent.—The intention of the Legislature was to enable a landowner who has not the benefit of a public rate for the preserving of his property to deduct from his income tax such expenses as he has necessarily incurred in protecting landed property assessed under the Income Tax Acts, and not to encourage him to expend money in improving the capital value of the land for his private profit.

C. A. Cripps replied.

Pollock, B.—In this case the appellant is the owner of a large tract of landed property, and it is admitted that he is properly assessed to the income tax in respect of the same. He claims a deduction from this assessment in respect of money which he has sunk in building an embankment for the purpose of reclaiming from the tidal river 1,044 acres, a portion of his property. He says that he is entitled to this deduction under section 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1853.

Now this Act is an Income Tax Act, and the assessment is assessed on income arising from land. It may be argued that it would be desirable that the Legislature should offer some bounty to a landlord to induce him to expend money in reclaiming or improving land, but I fail to find any such intention in the Income Tax Acts. The Act of 1842, by section 60, schedule A, r. 5, gave a deduction in respect of the amount charged on land by public rate or assessment in respect of draining, fencing, or embanking the same—that is to say, this Act allows a deduction from the gross annual value, but does not in any way allow a deduction in respect of the improvement of land or the enhancement of its permanent value by the expenditure of capital. That principle is maintained in section 37 of the Act of 1853. Had it been otherwise intended it would have been very easy to have used some such words as "reclamation" or "improvement," so as to show that a man should be rewarded for the improvement of his land, and that a deduction from the income tax should be made in respect of any capital so expended. In my opinion the object of this Act was only to allow a deduction which was essential, the words being "necessary for the preservation or protection"—that is, essential for the protection of the particular land in question looking at the status it then was in. The preservation or protection intended was the making of either an embankment or sea wall. In this country it is known as a matter of history that such embankments have from time to time been absolutely necessary to prevent the encroachment or overflowing of tidal rivers or of the sea, but the flowing of the tide daily or twice in a day is not an encroachment or an overflowing of a tidal river or of the sea; it is merely a natural event which may either improve or reduce the value of land. In the present case the owner has only endeavoured to enhance the capital value of his land, and therefore he must pay upon the income arising from it, whether small or large. When we look at the particular application of section 37 it is obvious that it could not apply to such a case as this. Or, take the case of a lord of a manor who held from the Crown the foreshore between high and low water mark, and who found it worth his while to convert land, covered at high tide with water, into land which should not be so covered. Such conversion might or might not improve his property, but it is clear to me that he could not be said to have done it for the preservation or protection of his property. He has done it, not for preservation, but to change the character of his land. It has been argued by the appellant that his land had before paid income tax, and that the building of the embankment was, therefore, the building of a wall for the preservation or protection of land already subject to assessment against the encroachment or overflowing of the tidal river. But I think that it is not to be treated as a grant of ancient land which has been protected before because income tax has been paid in respect of it. The tax was paid in respect of the net annual income arising from it, from whatever source such income might be derived—whether from mussel or oyster fisheries, from lobster pots, from seaweed, or from salt meads for cattle—and the land would not become land for the preservation or protection of which against the encroachment or overflowing of the sea this embankment was necessary. Therefore the deduction claimed cannot be allowed, and the appeal must be dismissed.

HAWKINS, J.—I concur in the remarks of my learned brother, but I wish to add that in the course of time a further expenditure may be incurred by the landlord for the purpose of preserving and protecting the land in its new condition. Should an exemption or deduction be claimed on that further expenditure it would in all probability be allowed.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

Ex parte THE OFFICIAL RECEIVER. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Composition deed for the benefit of creditors—Right of party to deed to prove in bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section (a); s. 43.

A composition deed executed by a debtor for the benefit of his creditors provided that, "in consideration of the premises," the creditors parties to the deed would "release the debtor from all claims and demands against him." The debtor was adjudicated bankrupt on the petition of a creditor who had not been a party to the deed.

Held, that a creditor who was a party to the deed was entitled to prove in the bankruptcy, as the deed was only a release conditional upon its remaining valid.

This was an appeal by the official receiver from an order of the county court judge at Nottingham ordering him to admit the proof of a creditor.

The creditor was trustee under a deed of assignment made by the debtor in 1887 for the benefit of his creditors generally. The majority of creditors assented to the deed, but one who refused to assent took proceedings in bankruptcy against the debtor and got him adjudicated upon the ground that this deed was an act of bankruptcy under section 4, sub-section (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The creditor's proof was refused by the official receiver on the ground that his debt was extinguished by the deed, he having released the debtor from all claims in consideration of the debtor's executing the deed, which had been done. The county court judge ordered the proof to be admitted.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G. (Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and Muir Mackenzie with him), for the appellant.—The proof was rightly rejected, because the deed was under seal and its terms were unconditional. The debt was wholly extinguished by it. No doubt the execution of the deed was an act of bankruptcy, and its effect has been to defeat the intended cessio bonorum and vest the property in the trustee in bankruptcy as from the date of the execution. That does not affect the validity of the release. In French v. French, 4 W. R. 139, 6 De G. M. G. 95, and Ex parte Bell, In re Webb, 1 G. & J. 9, settlements of property which were void as against creditors were held to be otherwise valid. [CAVE, J.—The execution was not an act of bankruptcy.] A creditor who is party to a deed of assignment containing a release is estopped from treating the debt as subsisting. Small v. Marwood, 9 B. & C. 300; Ex parte Stray, In re Stray, 15 W. R. 600, L. R. 2 Ch. 374. It would seem to follow that a party to such a deed cannot be a creditor in bankruptcy at all. A creditor of this kind has no rights under section 48, sub-section 1, which is limited to a creditor who has accounted for money which he has received in fraudulent preference to others.

Moulton, Q.C. (Stanger with him), for the respondent.—No authority can be found to support the appellant's contention, which affords a strong presumption in favour of the respondent. A party to a deed of composition may be estopped from petitioning before the deed has been declared void, but as soon as the deed has been made void his original rights revived. The release was clearly a conditional one, dependent on the validity of the deed.

He cited Doe d. Pitcher v. Anderson, 5 M. & S. 16, and Tappenden v. Burgess, 4 East, 230.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., in reply.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. The question depends upon the intention of the parties. The court has to discover their intention, and has to give effect to the deed in accordance with their intention.

The object of the deed is to convey the estate of the debtor to a trustee for realization and division rateably among the creditors of the debtor. One of the covenants is to this effect:—"In consideration of the premises the creditors parties hereto release the debtor from all claims and demands." The contention of the appellant is that, though the conveyance and every other covenant in the deed is void owing to the debtor having been adjudicated bankrupt, this one covenant is valid, the debt due to the creditor is released, and he cannot prove in the bankruptcy. But there is not a single provision in the deed which in any way relates to bankruptcy. The object of the deed is to distribute the estate without bankruptcy proceedings, and to do so in just proportion among all the creditors of the debtor. It is not the case of a minority of creditors who are endeavouring to divide the whole estate among themselves to the exclusion of the majority, on the chance of their being able to effect this before a petition has been filed. The minority might, perhaps, actually intend to give up their right of proof should the plan be discovered and the debtor be made a bankrupt. Here it is inconceivable that the appellant and the other creditors entertained such intention. The arrangement which they were endeavouring to carry through was an arrangement which in no way contemplated the bankruptcy of the debtor, and they must have known that if the result was that no one who executed the deed could prove if the arrangement miscarried and the debtor were made bankrupt, there would be a great temptation to dissentients to defer executing the deed till most of the other creditors had done so, and then to make the debtor a bankrupt and have the estate administered for their own private benefit. It is therefore clear that the release was not intended to be operative in case of bankruptcy.

In the case of fraudulent preference the creditor seldom intend that the acceptance of a payment by way of fraudulent preference shall be a valid re-to the debtor, such as, if the payment is set aside, to disentitle the creditor to prove in bankruptcy. This case is similar. The intention of the parties was that the release was to stand or fall with the rest of the deed, and the whole consideration for it having failed, the appellant is entitled to prove. The decision of the learned judge was therefore correct.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. No authority either for or against the contention of the appellant has been cited by counsel. The reason is, that though composition deeds in this form have been common for many years, and have always been liable to be set aside in case of bankruptcy, it has never till now been suggested that when bankruptcy has taken place, and the consideration for which the creditor gave his assent to the composition has, therefore, totally failed, the debt due is nevertheless extinguished. There could be no authority for so singular a proposition.

WILLIAMS v. COLONIAL BANK.

WILLIAMS v. LONDON CHARTERED BANK OF AUSTRALIA. (a.)

Shares—Pledge of certificates—Blank indorsement—Brokers—American law—Mercantile usage—Estoppel.

The executors of a holder of shares in an American railway company signed blank transfers indorsed on the share certificates, and handed them to their brokers, in order that the shares might be registered in the names of the executors. The brokers fraudulently deposited the certificates with their bankers as security for advances, and afterwards became bankrupt. According to American law the holder of certificates with transfers properly indorsed has a good legal title to the shares; and, according to mercantile usage in London, such certificates were treated as securities to bearer. In this case the indorsement was not attested in the manner required by the railway company for registration.

Held (reversing Kekewich, J.), that the plaintiffs were entitled to a declaration that the shares in question formed part of the testator's estate, and to delivery of the certificates by the bankers accordingly.

Appeal from Kekewich, J. (reported 36 Ch. D. 659).

The first action was brought by E. M. Williams, J. Cady, and J. C. Williams, the executors of the will of J. M. Williams, to recover 710 shares in the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Co., part of the testator's estate.

The testator at the time of his death was entitled to 1,210 shares in the above-mentioned company, represented by 121 certificates of ten shares each, and registered in the name of the testator in the books of the company. The certificates were in the following form:—

"E 4648 10
"Number. shares.

"The New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company.

"John Michael Williams, of Burncoose, Perran Worthal, Cornwall, England, is entitled to ten shares of one hundred dollars each of the capital stock of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, transferable in person or by attorney in the books of the company only on the surrender and cancellation of this certificate by an indorsement thereof hereon and in the form and manner which may at the time be required by the transfer regulations of the company. This certificate is, however, to be of no effect or validity until countersigned by the transfer agent, and also by the registrar of transfers of the said company in the city of New York."

The certificates were signed and duly countersigned as required.

The testator died in February, 1880, and his will was proved by two of the plaintiffs, Elizabeth Maria Williams and John Cady, on March 25, 1880. Power was reserved to two other executors to come in and prove, and J. C. Williams, the other plaintiff, did so on October 19, 1882.

In August, 1880, the two first-named plaintiffs wished to be registered as owners in respect of the shares, and their agent, Mr. Pryor, sent the certificates and the probate of the will to their stockbrokers, Messrs. P. W. Thomas & Co. The latter subsequently informed Mr. Pryor that the extract of the probate had been forwarded to New York with the share certificates, but that certain formalities would have to be gone through, after which the share certificates would have to be signed by the executors and new ones would then be issued. The further formalities consisted in signing a blank transfer indorsed on the back of the share certificates, which were then forwarded again to Messrs. Thomas on the 29th of January, 1881. The indorsement was in the following terms:—

"For value received do hereby sell, assign, and transfer to shares of the capital stock of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company of one hundred dollars each standing in name on the books of the company, and represented by the within certificate. "And do hereby irrevocably constitute and appoint attorney to execute a surrender and cancellation of the within certificate, and also to do all things requisite to transfer the said stock on the books of the said company in such form and manner as may be necessary or be required by the regulations of the said company in that behalf, with full power of substitution in the premises.

"Dated Jan. 24th, 1881. "E. M. WILLIAMS.
"J. CADY."

In December, 1882, the plaintiffs made inquiries of Messrs. Thomas & Co. as to the certificates, and they replied stating that the certificates were in New York pending instructions from the plaintiffs for a sale, and to avoid the risk of a double transmission of the certificates. The letter concluded "We need hardly say that there is no risk in leaving the certificates in New York, as they are not indorsed." The certificates in fact had never been sent to New York, but had been deposited in February and April, 1881, with the Colonial Bank, by Messrs. P. W. Thomas & Co. as security for advances. Five hundred of the shares were redeemed and the certificates representing them redeposited with the Chartered Bank of Australia.

Messrs. P. W. Thomas & Co. became bankrupt on the 5th of February, 1884.

This was an action claiming a declaration that the share certificates were deposited in fraud of the plaintiffs, that the bank had no legal title in them, for delivery of the certificates, and an injunction restraining the bank from applying for any alteration in the register of the railway company, and from dealing with the shares.

The Colonial Bank counter-claimed for a declaration that they were entitled to a valid charge on the shares for the amount of their advances on them, and that the executors should concur in all acts necessary for vesting the shares in the defendants or their nominees, and enable them to become the registered proprietors thereof.

Evidence was adduced, taken on commission in America, to the effect that the legal title to shares vested in the person who for the time being was entitled by indorsement or otherwise to have them registered in his name. Evidence was also given that certificates, indorsed as these were, were equivalent to securities to bearer and passed as such from hand to hand.

The action against the London Chartered Bank of Australia related to the certificates of 500 shares similarly endorsed, and deposited at a later date with that bank. They however did not counter-claim.

Kekewich, J., held that the banks were entitled to hold the certificates as a security for the debts due from Thomas & Co. He was of opinion that the certificates must be construed according to American law; that the banks were not put on inquiry in dealing with Thomas & Co.; that the executors must be taken to have known the nature of the securities, and to have given their brokers all the authority which by the law merchant went with them; and that, having given this power to Thomas & Co., they were estopped from denying their authority to deal with the shares as they thought proper.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Warmington, Q.C., and Sturges, for the appellants, argued that the legal estate in the shares was still in the executors, as they were not in themselves negotiable, and not made so by the indorsement, the case being governed by English and not by American law; that the plaintiffs were not estopped from denying that they authorized the dealing by Thomas & Co. with the shares; that the certificates were confided to Thomas & Co. for a specific purpose—namely, to have the registered name altered; and that the banks were put on inquiry and ought to have inquired of the executors before taking the certificates.

Rigby, Q.C., Reid, Q.C., and Christopher James, for the Colonial Bank, contended that the certificates indorsed were equivalent to securities to bearer, and that there was ample evidence that in the money market they were so treated; that by the law of New York these securities, which are American instruments and must be governed by American law, when indorsed, pass from hand to hand, and that the holder is entitled to have his name put on the register as owner of them, if he so desires; that the executors were estopped by their delay, amounting to negligence, in inquiring for the documents, from denying that, having authorized their brokers to sell or pledge the shares, they gave them authority to fill up the blanks; and that the absence of formalities required by the Stock Exchange did not put the banks on inquiry; and submitted that there was no equity against the banks, which, having the legal estate, were entitled, unless redeemed by the plaintiffs, to foreclose the shares.

Latham, Q.C., and T. H. Wright, for the London Chartered Bank of Australia, adopted the same argument.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 1.—COTTON, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. According to English law the title of the bank as transferees of the certificates would not be a legal title, but a mere inchoate title, which would enable them, as transferees from Thomas & Co., to hold the shares as against the plaintiffs. According to American law, however, they would have not only a legal, but also the equitable title. The case, however, must be decided by the law of England, and not by that of America, as the question whether Thomas & Co. had a good title to transfer these certificates to the bank is one which arose in this country, and therefore depends upon English law. It is well settled that no one can transfer any better title to an instrument which is not negotiable than that which he himself has. The transfer by Thomas & Co. to the bank was made in fraud of the plaintiffs. Thomas & Co. never received any authority from the plaintiffs to deal with the certificates.

Though the general law is as I have stated, it may be, however, that the real owner has estopped himself by conduct from asserting his title. The question, therefore, is whether there has been anything in the conduct of the plaintiffs to estop them from asserting their title to the shares as against the bank.

The certificates were not, on the face of them, certificates to bearer, but expressly represented that the shares in respect of which the certificates were issued could only be transferred with certain formalities in the books of the company. And when, on the face of the documents, there was something irregular in the alleged transfer to them, the defendants could not rely upon estoppel as against the plaintiffs. The absence of a certificate of transfer in compliance with the requirements stated on the face of the certificates was sufficient to have put the defendants upon inquiry when the certificates were handed to them by Thomas & Co., and, not having done so, they took at their own risk, and if the persons from whom they took had not a good title the defendants did not acquire any better title. I do not agree with the contention that the conduct of the plaintiffs was such as to give the bank a good title, or that there has been negligence on the part of the plaintiffs in leaving the certificates with the brokers. In my opinion the two sets of defendants stand on the same footing, and the plaintiffs are entitled to claim against them both a declaration that the shares in question form part of the testator's estate, and that the certificates should be delivered up. The judgment of Kekewich, J., must accordingly be reversed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The constitution of the company, and the proper mode of becoming a shareholder, and the consequences of having acquired a title to the certificates are questions which may depend on American law, but American law does not regulate or apply to dealings in this country with a document by way of gift, sale, or pledge. And although the documents in question may be negotiable instruments in America, that is not sufficient to render them negotiable in this country, so as to give a bona fide holder for value a good title against the true owners from whom they have been stolen. Apart from the question of estoppel, the bank did not acquire any title to the certificates. Thomas & Co. were not owners of the certificates, and were not, in fact, empowered to part with them so as to bring the case within the Factors Acts.

The general rule of law, therefore, applies—that brokers, who had no authority to part with the certificates, could not, by transferring them to the bank, give the bank a title to hold them as against the plaintiffs, who were the true owners.

Has any title been acquired by estoppel? What representation was made by the executors which they are precluded from denying, or what was done by them calculated to lead to the inference that Thomas & Co. had authority to pledge the certificates? On the face of the certificates the testator was stated to be owner of the shares. The indorsement represented quite truly that the person who was entitled to these certificates might fill up the blanks; but this was the utmost apparent authority given. The certificates with the transfers in blank when deposited by Thomas & Co. with the bank being imperfect, and not negotiable instruments, conferred no legal title; and the document not being in proper form, and there being enough on the face of them to put the bank on inquiry, the defence of estoppel is not available.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. The American law does not, as I think, apply to this case, the key to which is as to the right of the respondents to hold these pieces of paper—these certificates. How, then, have the plaintiffs lost their right to these pieces of paper? It is admitted that they are not negotiable according to English law. The only possible way in which they can have lost their title would be by the operation of the law of estoppel. There is no question of sale in market overt, which is an exception to the general rule. The executors never intended to part with their title, and the law of estoppel cannot apply—estoppel resting on an express or implied representation, or conduct amounting to representation, which is the same thing. The documents nowhere suggest that the bearer is entitled, and, not being in order, there was that on the face of them which should have put the banks on inquiry. There is, in my opinion, no ground for saying that there was any negligence on the part of the plaintiffs.

LUCAS v. MARTIN. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Agreement for purchase of bankrupt's estate—Scheme of arrangement—Approval of court—New term—Specific performance—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 23, sub-section 2.

The trustee in a bankruptcy entered into a written agreement with the defendants whereby it was agreed that the defendants should purchase from the trustee the estate of the bankrupt for such a sum as would pay the costs and expenses of the proceedings and the preferential debts, and a certain composition to the unsecured creditors, and that, upon the approval of the scheme by the court, the bankruptcy should be annulled.

At a first meeting of the creditors a resolution was passed, which was subsequently confirmed at the second meeting by the statutory majority, to accept the offer of the defendants to purchase the estate on the terms of the agreement, provided that the defendants gave a bond to the trustee to secure the payment of the purchase-money.

The court afterwards made an order approving of the purchase upon the terms contained in the agreement between the trustee and the defendants, and annulled the bankruptcy. In an action by the trustee for specific performance of the agreement,

Held, that the agreement could not be specifically enforced against the defendants, they never having consented to the provision relating to the bond, and the agreement which they had entered into with the trustee never having been accepted by the creditors.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of North, J.

F. Curtois was adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition on the 28th of March, 1885, and the plaintiff, C. Lucas, was appointed the trustee in his bankruptcy.

On the 2nd of April, 1885, an agreement in writing was signed by the plaintiff and the defendants, J. Martin and G. Martin, whereby it was agreed that the defendants should purchase the estate of the bankrupt, vested in the plaintiff as such trustee, for such a sum as would be sufficient to pay all the costs and expenses of the proceedings, to pay all the preferential debts in full, and to pay all the unsecured creditors a composition of 15s. in the pound at the times therein mentioned, and that upon the approval of the scheme by the court the bankruptcy should be annulled.

At a first meeting of the creditors of the bankrupt held on the 25th of April, 1885, it was resolved to accept the offer of the defendants to purchase the estate of the bankrupt on the terms of the agreement, provided that the defendants gave a bond to the plaintiff to secure the payment of the purchase-money.

At a second meeting of the creditors, held on the 14th of May, 1885, the resolution was confirmed by the requisite statutory majority.

On the 11th of June, 1885, the judge of the county court of Lincolnshire, on the report of the official receiver, made an order approving of the purchase upon the terms contained in the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants, and annulled the bankruptcy, but the order did not mention, or in any way refer to, the provision relating to the bond which was contained in the resolution of the creditors.

The defendants subsequently refused to carry out their agreement, and the plaintiff, by the direction of the Court of Bankruptcy, brought the present action against them for specific performance of the agreement of the 2nd of May.

On the 20th of July, 1887, North, J., dismissed the action.

The plaintiff appealed.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Rashleigh, for the appellant.—We submit we are entitled to the relief we ask. The defendants cannot go behind the order of the 11th of June, 1885. To allow such a proceeding would be productive of grave inconveniences. The provision as to the bond contained in the resolution of the creditors formed no part of the agreement with the defendants, nor do we now seek to enforce it. Assuming that it did form part of the scheme, the court had power to dispense with it: Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 23, sub-section 2.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—I think that the judgment of North, J., must be affirmed. The agreement which it is sought to enforce against those two gentlemen was an agreement which I think in every part of it was subject to the approval of the court. The approval of the court becomes essential for the making of the agreement talis qualis. It is idle to tell us that some parts of the agreement might have been made, or that a different agreement might have been made without the approval of the court. There are essential parts of it, running through the whole of the agreement, which require the confirmation of the court. The defendants make their proposition subject to the agreement of the court; and unless there is the approval of the court they have not made any offer which can be enforced; because, as I say, they have imported into their offer the approval of the court as an essential part of it.

Then did the court approve it? Apart from the question of estoppel by the judgment, with which I will deal presently, the fact appears now to be beyond dispute that what the creditors did in fact agree to was a bargain that, besides and in addition to that which these two gentlemen had agreed to do as the consideration which they were to give, they were also to enter into a bond. That was the composition, or agreement, or arrangement which the creditors agreed to, and they have never agreed to anything else. The court has approved, and could only approve, by virtue of the statute, that which the creditors had agreed to. The provision in sub-section 2 of section 23 appears to me to have reference to a totally different matter. That assumes a good agreement agreed to by the creditors, and the court is then invested with the jurisdiction to impose terms and conditions as to the circumstances under which and even the persons to whom, in pursuance of that agreement, the assets of the former bankrupt shall be conveyed. And it appears to me, under these circumstances, that if we have liberty to enter into the question of what the real facts are, there is no agreement by these gentlemen to do the thing which the creditors approved of, and which the court has approved of. Therefore, it is impossible to enforce specific performance of an agreement into which, according to my view, the defendants have never entered, because they have never entered into this particular bargain, except under circumstances which show that their obligation to perform that agreement does not arise. It is said that we cannot arrive at what the real facts are—that we must be estopped by the order of the court. It appears to me that that is a very strange contention. The order of the court purports to confirm that which the creditors in fact did. The recital in the order inaccurately states that that which the creditors agreed to was the agreement simpliciter, and not the agreement plus the additional term. I entirely dissent from the view that we are not entitled to see what the facts are, and I am not certain that I am altogether able to understand the principle upon which it is alleged that, as against a stranger not a party to the bankruptcy, this order of the court is conclusive and binding upon him, so that we cannot ascertain what the real facts are. Here this may be a judgment in rem. It may well be that that binds all the world as an adjudication, and that you cannot go behind the adjudication, but to suggest that a recital of a certain fact leading up to the adjudication is binding upon all the world, so that you cannot prove that the allegation of that recital is different from the truth, is, to my mind, a novelty, to which I, for one, will give no countenance. Under these circumstances, I think the judgment of the learned judge of the court below was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question which has been raised is this, that the agreement was not conditional on the approval of the court. The agreement is not a very good piece of conveyancing language, but I think it appears from it that although it is not in express terms stated that the agreement shall be conditional, when you look at it it must be so; because it was an agreement which could not be carried out without the approval of the court, the approval of the court being necessary in order to obtain that which was the object of the proposed purchasers—namely, the annulment of the bankruptcy. The time for payment of the money has reference to the approval of the court, and the whole agreement, though not said in terms to be conditional on the approval of the court, is in substance, when one reads the agreement and sees what the object was, necessarily subject to the approval of the court.

Then was the approval of the court given to this agreement—that is to say, to the terms contained in it? There, again, the order is not artificial in its terms, but it commences in this way:—"And the court, being satisfied that the creditors in the above matter have duly accepted and approved the composition or scheme of arrangement in the following terms," &c. Then it mentions some of the terms of that agreement and refers to the agreement as an exhibit. What was the meaning of that? In fact we know that the agreement in its terms as signed by the purchasers from the plaintiff, was not assented to by the creditors, because, although it is not expressed in the form of the resolution, it was in reality one term of the agreement assented to by the creditors that there should not be simply a payment of money to the defendants but that before the money was paid the proposed purchasers should give a bond for the performance of the obligation which they had undertaken by their agreement.

That was never assented to so as to become any part of an agreement entered into by the purchasers.

But it is said that although there is that reference to what had been approved of by the meeting of creditors, yet, having regard to the report of the official receiver, the court did not consider that there had been an introduction of that term as to the bond, because it is not mentioned in the report, but, as I understand, the report contains annexed to it the resolution of the creditors, from which it does appear that this term was introduced by the creditors in their approval, and although, as I say, it is not very clear and artificial, yet we must look and see what was in fact approved by the creditors in order that we may know what was approved by the court. The power of the court is limited to approving of that which is agreed to by two meetings of the creditors, and therefore, in my opinion, the proper construction has been put upon this order by the learned judge in the court below, that, although it contains this reference to what was signed by the parties, it really only approves of that which had in fact become binding by the assent and approval of the creditors in general meeting.

It was said, however, that we ought not to read the order in that way for this reason, that there is a power given to the court to annul the bankruptcy and to vest the property in the purchasers on such terms as it thinks fit, and here the bankruptcy was annulled without reference to this term. It is said that, therefore, we ought to consider that the court, when it approved of the arrangement or scheme or composition in these terms, intended to dispense with that clause which had been introduced by the creditors. Now, in my opinion, the court has no such power, because although it might give directions where a scheme does not make any provision for the terms upon which the property is to be vested in the purchasers, yet where there is an express agreement by the creditors by their resolution that a certain term shall be imposed, in my opinion the court has no jurisdiction to depart from that, and to say, although we approve that which has been done by the creditors, we strike out that which we must consider as important, as, in fact, it was imposed by their resolution. As a mere matter of construction, in my opinion it would be wrong so to construe this order unless there were an express provision in it that that portion of the agreement should be dispensed with. I think the court had no power to make any such order, but the fact that it does not in terms purport so to do in my opinion is strong against such a construction. In my opinion the appeal fails.

Reg. v. Licensing Justices for Crewkerne. (a.)

Licensing—Alehouse—Six-days' licence—Renewal—35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 49.

Although the condition under 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 49, requiring licensed premises to be closed during the whole of Sunday can only be inserted in a licence if the applicant himself applies for its insertion, yet, when it is once inserted, the licence becomes a six-days' licence, and can only be renewed as such.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Mathew and A. L. Smith, JJ.).

At the annual licensing meeting held at Crewkerne in 1881 an alehouse licence was granted to G. Rugg in respect of an alehouse known as "The Queen," at Misterton. Rugg then requested that the condition limiting the licence to a six-days' licence under 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 49, should be inserted, which was accordingly done.

The licence was annually renewed as a six-days' licence, and in 1883 the house passed into the possession of Walter Miller, the present appellant, who continued to renew the licence as a six-days' licence down to the 20th of August, 1887, when, at the annual licensing sessions, he applied through his solicitor for a renewal of the licence as a seven-days' licence—that is to say, without the insertion of the condition. There was no opposition to the renewal.

The justices refused to grant the application, and renewed the licence as a six-days' licence.

The appellant then applied to the Divisional Court for a mandamus to compel the justices to grant the application, contending that they had no power to insert the condition against the will of the applicant.

The Divisional Court refused the application, and the appellant appealed.

Paterson, for the appellant.—There is really no such thing as a six-days' licence. The Act only speaks of a six-days' licence for convenience of terminology. The condition limiting an ordinary licence to six days can only be inserted at the request of the applicant, and the magistrates cannot refuse to insert it when it is asked for (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 49): Reg. v. Justices of Kirkdale, 18 Q. B. D. 248, 35 W. R. Dig. 118. A renewal is really a new grant, and therefore the condition cannot be inserted on a renewal against the will of the applicant. No objection can be taken to the renewal unless written notice of opposition has been served on the applicant in accordance with section 42 of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94: Reg. v. Justices of Merthyr Tydvil, 14 Q. B. D. 584, 33 W. R. Dig. 122. The justices were therefore bound to grant this application for renewal.

William Wills (W. Blake Odgers with him), for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

Lindley, L.J.—In my opinion the view taken by the court below was the correct one. This house was given a six-days' licence in the first instance. I think that Mr. Paterson was perfectly right in saying that the condition which makes a licence a six-days' licence can be only inserted at the will of the applicant, and that it is entirely for him whether he will have the condition in or not. But the justices have an absolute discretion to grant or refuse a licence, and this discretion is extended to a renewal just as much as to the granting of a new licence.

The licence in question was a six-days' licence, and was renewed annually as a six-days' licence down to the year 1887. The licensee then applies again for the renewal of the licence. That means that he applies for the renewal of the six-days' licence. What is renewed is that which is in existence and is about to expire—that is, the six days' licence. The licensee had never had a seven-days' licence, and could not therefore apply for the renewal of such a licence. Most probably when the justices orginally granted the licence they never contemplated granting a seven-days' licence. They were willing to grant and to renew a six-days' licence, but the application for a seven-days' licence was substantially an application for a new licence, which they would probably refuse altogether, as they had an undoubted right to do.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is, no doubt, for the applicant in the first instance to ask for the insertion of the condition in his licence, limiting it to six days. It cannot be inserted against his will. But, as soon as he has elected to have it inserted, and has called upon the magistrates to insert it, the licence becomes, in my opinion, a six-days' licence, an entirely different thing from a seven-days' licence. It is spoken of by the section as a six-days' licence, and the holder of such a licence has certain privileges and exemptions given him by the Act which do not apply to the holders of seven-days' licences. I think that when a licence is renewed that must be renewed which has already been held, and it is not a renewal to introduce something which the applicant has not held before. A six-days' licence, therefore, can only be renewed as a six-days licence, and an application for a seven-days' licence is a fresh application.

I am confirmed in this view by the fact that a renewal may be made by indorsing the old licence or by issuing a copy of it. This shows that the intention was that that which had been in existence—namely, in this case a six-days' licence—should be renewed, and not that it should become a different licence, a seven-days' licence, at the option of the applicant.

I agree, therefore, in thinking that we cannot grant this application, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Bankruptcy — Post-nuptial settlement — Purchaser for valuable consideration — Trader — Bankruptcy Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), ss. 91, 94, sub-section 3.

By a post-nuptial settlement the settlor, in consideration of the assignment by his father of certain leasehold property to the trustees thereof, and in consideration of a release of a debt due from him to his father, assigned to the trustees two policies of insurance upon his life, upon trust out of the income arising fom the leasehold property to pay the premiums on the policies and the residue to the settlor for life, and after his death upon trust, as to all the property, for the settlor's children. Within two years after the date of the settlement the settlor was adjudicated bankrupt under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. Upon the death of the settlor his trustee in bankruptcy claimed the proceeds of the policies, upon the ground that the settlement was void under section 91 of that Act.

Held, that the settlor's father was a "purchaser in good faith and for valuable consideration" within the exception in section 91, and that the settlement was valid.

Held, also, that the settlement was protected by section 94, sub-section 3, as a "dealing with the bankrupt in good faith and for valuable consideration."

By schedule 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, the word "trader" includes an apothecary.

Held, that a general medical practitioner who supplies the medicines which he prescribes for his patients, but who makes no charge for medicines, charging only for attendance, is not a "trader" within the meaning of the Act.

Appeal from the judgment of Huddleston, B., in favour of the plaintiffs at the trial without a jury of an interpleader issue.

In 1880 Dr. Peskett, who practised as a general practitioner, and who was a married man with children, formed an illicit connection with a married woman, and fell into intemperate habits, and was made co-respondent in certain proceedings taken in the Divorce Court. Thereupon Dr. Peskett's father, for the sake of his son's children, proposed that Dr. Peskett should settle two policies of insurance upon his life, each for £1,500, for the benefit of his children, and upon condition of Dr. Peskett doing so the father agreed to bring into the settlement a leasehold property, producing at that time £70 a year, and which subsequently realized £700, and to release his son from a debt of £107 due to him. A settlement was accordingly executed upon the 25th of November, 1882, under which Dr. Peskett was released from the debt due to his father, and the two policies upon Dr. Peskett's life and the leasehold property were assigned to the plaintiffs as trustees upon trust out of the income arising from the leasehold property to pay the premiums upon the policies, and to pay the balance to Dr. Peskett for his life, and after his death upon trust as to all the property for his children. At the date of the settlement Dr. Peskett was solvent, though being pressed by certain creditors.

Upon the 6th of July, 1883, Dr. Peskett was adjudicated bankrupt, and the defendant was appointed trustee. Upon the 26th of September, 1886, Dr. Peskett died, and the proceeds of the policies were claimed by the plaintiffs as trustees of the settlement and also by the defendant as trustee in bankruptcy of Dr. Peskett. The insurance company interpleaded, and this issue was directed to be tried. It was contended on behalf of the defendant that the settlement was void under section 91 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which provides that "any settlement of property made by a trader, not being a settlement made before and in consideration of marriage or made in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration, or a settlement made on or for the wife or children of the settlor of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife, shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of such settlement, be void as against the trustee of the bankrupt appointed under this Act," &c.

Upon the question whether Dr. Peskett was a "trader" within that section (trader by schedule 1 including an apothecary), it appeared from the evidence that Dr. Peskett described himself in the bankruptcy proceedings as a "surgeon and apothecary," that he was a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, England, and a licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries, and that he supplied the medicines which he prescribed for his patients, but that he made no charge for the medicines, charging only for medical attendance, except upon three occasions in 1873, 1874, and 1877, when he charged in his account a lump sum for "attendance and medicine." Huddleston, B., held that Dr. Peskett was not a "trader"; that the father was "a purchaser in good faith and for valuable consideration" within the exception in section 91; and that the settlement was also protected by section 94, sub-section 3, as a dealing with the bankrupt made in good faith and for valuable consideration. He accordingly upheld the settlement and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendant appealed.

Lockwood, Q.C., and C. K. Francis, for the defendant.—Dr. Peskett was a "trader" within section 91 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. By the schedule to the Act apothecaries are traders. In the bankruptcy proceedings Dr. Peskett described himself as a "surgeon and apothecary." He had a dispensary. The case of In re Palmer, 4 W. R. 501, 8 De G. M. & G. 277, is directly in point. Next, the father was not a "purchaser" within section 91. The word "purchaser" in that section is used in its ordinary commercial sense: Ex parte Hillman, 27 W. R. 567, 10 Ch. D. 622.

R. T. Reid, Q.C., and H. Reed, for the plaintiffs. Ex parte Daubeny, 2 Deac. 72, shows that a doctor practising as Dr. Peskett did is not a "trader." Secondly, the father was a "purchaser." A purchaser does not necessarily mean a purchaser for one's self. The father would, in ordinary language, be called a purchaser of his son's life policies, having given valuable consideration for them, and having purchased them for the benefit of his son's family. Further, the transaction is protected by section 94, sub-section 3.

Lockwood, Q.C., replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R. (having stated that the motives of both Dr. Peskett and his father were bonâ fide, and were not affected by the probability or otherwise of Dr. Peskett becoming bankrupt, and that the settlement was not void under 13 Eliz. c. 5, continued:—).—The first question we have to determine is whether this case comes within the exemption in section 91. I am inclined to think that section 91 deals more particularly with the mind and acts of the bankrupt. We must, in the first place, see whether the father is a purchaser from the son for valuable consideration and in good faith. I have already stated that both the father and son acted in good faith, and it only remains to inquire whether the father is a purchaser for valuable consideration. The father gave up certain leasehold property in order to induce his son to give up certain other property. He gave it up on condition of his son giving up something also. In my opinion that constitutes the father a "purchaser." It is urged that the decision in Ex parte Hillman has narrowed the meaning of the word "purchaser" in that section to a purchaser in a mercantile sense. But when one looks at the facts of that case, the persons who were alleged to be "purchasers" gave no consideration at all. They were, therefore, not purchasers. That case only goes to this, that the trustees in that case were not purchasers within the meaning of the section. They might be called purchasers in a conveyancing sense, but not within the meaning of the section. The next question relates to section 94, sub-section 3. That section seems to me to regard the mind of the person dealing with the bankrupt. The motive of the father was to assure some provision to the son's family, and for that reason he entered into this dealing with the bankrupt and gave valuable consideration for that which he induced his son to do, he himself acting in a perfectly bonâ fide manner. This dealing of the father with the son is therefore, in my opinion, within the protection of section 94, sub-section 3. Accordingly the case comes within the exception in section 91, even supposing the son to have been a trader, and in any event, whether the son was a trader or not, the case comes within section 94, sub-section 3.

Upon the further question, whether the son was a trader within section 91, it appears from the evidence that the son was in practice as a general practitioner—that is to say, he practised as a physician and surgeon and dispensed his own medicine. He did not charge for the medicine, he prescribed for and supplied to his patients, but he charged for the visits he paid them. He did not sell medicines like a chemist. He did not trade in medicines at all, and therefore, in my opinion, he was not a trader. For these reasons I agree with the learned judge in every particular.

Sir James Hannen.—I am of the same opinion. I agree entirely with the judgment of the learned judge. The transaction having been entered into in good faith and without reference to the son's creditors, cannot be set aside unless it is brought within the language of section 91. In Ex parte Hillman the late Master of the Rolls was dealing with a case in which the transfer was purely voluntary without any consideration moving to or from either of the parties; and his language must be read with reference to that fact. In effect he says that the word "purchaser" must not be understood as meaning a purchaser in a conveyancing sense. To constitute a person a purchaser within the section there must be a quid pro quo. In the present case there was a quid pro quo by reason of the father giving up certain property upon condition of the son doing the same. The exception in section 91 therefore applies. As to whether the son was a "trader," the question must be whether he acted as an apothecary. Did he buy and sell drugs for profit? I do not think it can be said that he did. He charged his patients a certain sum for each visit, and those charges included the medicines which he prescribed. The case of Ex parte Daubeny shows that a dealing in drugs in that manner does not constitute a man a "trader." The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Lord Esher, M.R.—I also agree that Ex parte Daubeny is an authority to show that this man was not a trader.

Appeal dismissed.

Smith v. Buchan. (a.)

Practice—Specific performance—Default of pleading by defendant—Motion for judgment—Proof of plaintiff's case—Insufficient description—Evidence—"Craves leave to refer"—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 27, r. 11.

In the statement of claim in an action for specific performance the plaintiff craved leave to refer to the agreement, and spoke of the property agreed to be sold as "described in the schedule to the said agreement." The defendant delivered no statement of defence.

On motion for judgment in default of pleadings,

Held, that the description of the property was insufficient; that the court could not look at any evidence beyond the pleadings; and that the statement of claim must be amended and served again.

Short cause.

This was an action for specific performance, and the statement of claim alleged that, "by an agreement in writing dated the 10th of August, 1887, and made between the plaintiff of the one part and the defendant of the other part (to which agreement the plaintiff craves leave to refer) the defendant agreed to purchase from the plaintiff certain hereditaments situate in the parish of St. Peter the Great, otherwise Subdeanry in the city of Chichester, and described in the schedule to the said agreement."

The defendant entered an appearance, but delivered no statement of defence, and the plaintiff now moved in default of pleadings for judgment for specific performance within a limited time, or, in default, for rescission of the contract.

Hewitt, for the plaintiff.

Kay, J.—The plaintiff has not stated the contract or described the property clearly enough in his statement of claim to enable me to make such an order in default of defence. The judges have considered the subject and agreed that no evidence beyond the pleadings themselves can be accepted in cases of this kind. Therefore I cannot look at the contract or any evidence to prove the contents of the contract or the identity of the property. The plaintiff must begin de novo, or at least amend his statement of claim by setting out the contract and describing the property fully, and must serve the amended statement of claim on the defendant.

Fryman v. Fryman. (a.)

Administration—Insolvent estate—Landlord's right to distrain—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 42, 125.

Part of a testator's estate consisted of leaseholds, and after his death his estate was found to be insolvent, and an action was commenced in the Chancery Division for the administration of the testator's estate by his lessor, who claimed as landlord to distrain upon the demised premises for six years' arrears of rent.

Held, that the landlord was entitled to distrain for six years' arrears of rent, and that section 42 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, did not apply so as to limit the landlord's right to one year's rent only.

This action was commenced by S. G. Fryman for the administration of his son, Egbert Fryman's estate. The plaintiff, who had been his son's landlord, claimed against his son's estate six years' arrears of rent, and as the estate was insolvent, and being administered by the court, a question arose whether the 42nd section* of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), applied so as to prevent the plaintiff from claiming more than one year's arrears of rent.

The facts were shortly these: By an indenture dated the 1st of January, 1875, certain hereditaments at Rye were demised by the plaintiff to Egbert Fryman, his executors, administrators, and assigns for the term of fourteen years from the 25th of December, 1874, at the yearly rent of £100 during the first ten years, and at the yearly rent of £50 during the last four years of the term.

Egbert Fryman paid no rent to the plaintiff, and on the death of Egbert Fryman in March, 1886, the sum of £1,043 2s. 6d. was then due in respect of such rent to the plaintiff.

Egbert Fryman made a will, and thereby appointed his wife and a Mr. Paine executrix and executor thereof. Mr. Paine renounced probate, and shortly after the proof of the testator's will by his widow, the plaintiff, on the 12th of July, 1886, commenced this action, and on the 16th of November, 1886, the usual administration order at the suit of a creditor was made.

The plaintiff took out a summons in the action to distrain for six years' arrears of rent, and on the 13th of December, 1886, the judge gave leave to distrain without prejudice to any question, including the question whether leave ought to have been given, and, in lieu of a distress, part of a fund in court to the credit of the action was directed to be carried over to an account entitled, "Proceeds of Plaintiff's Distress," the plaintiff submitting to be bound by any order the court might make in respect of it.

The question as to the plaintiff's right to distrain was adjourned into court, and the summons was directed to be served on such creditors of the testator as were opposed to the plaintiff's claim.

Romer, Q.C., and Alexander, for the summons, referred to sections 42 and 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Whitehorne, Q.C., Edward Bray, and Haldenstein, for opposing creditors, referred to In re York, Atkinson v. Powell, 35 W. R. 609, 36 Ch. D. 233; In re Coal Consumers' Association, 25 W. R. 300, 4 Ch. D. 625; Thomas v. Patent Lionite Co., 29 W. R. 596, 17 Ch. D. 251.

CHITTY, J. (after disposing of a matter not referred to in this report, continued:—).—Then there is a point which Mr. Whitehorne has raised on the Bankruptcy Act of 1883. Mr. Whitehorne says that now it is pretty clear that the estate of the deceased son is insufficient for payment of his debts in full; in other words, therefore, that it is an insolvent estate, and that, therefore, the 42nd section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 applies to this case and limits the right of the father to distrain to one year. His difficulty at first is to say one year prior to what time. The language of the section is that the right to distress is to be available for one year's rent accrued prior to the date of the order of adjudication. Of course there has in this case been no order of adjudication. Then the 2nd sub-section of this section runs thus:—"For the purposes of this section the term 'order of adjudication' shall be deemed to include an order for the administration of the estate of a debtor whose debts do not exceed fifty pounds, or of a deceased person who dies insolvent." Mr. Whitehorne's argument is that "order for the administration of the estate of a deceased person who dies insolvent" includes orders not simply made by the Court of Bankruptcy under the jurisdiction conferred by this Act, but orders made by the High Court.

Now it appears to me that this argument cannot be maintained. First, this sub-section is merely explaining the meaning of the term "order for adjudication." Order for adjudication means obviously, and there is no question about this, an order made by, what I may term for shortness, the Bankruptcy Court, that is the court which, according to the 168th section, is defined to be the court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy under this Act. When the Legislature, in that 2nd sub-section, in explaining the term "order for adjudication," it would be a remarkable, but still a possible, thing that they should have used the term "order for administration" to denote the order of a court of a different jurisdiction. Primâ facie the order for administration must mean the order for administration in the same court. But that is made plainer when the rest of the section is considered, and the answer to Mr. Whitehorne's argument does not depend on this observation only. The first thing that the order for adjudication is to include is an order for the administration of the estate of a debtor whose debts do not exceed £50, that is an order for the administration of the estate of a living debtor, and what is referred to there is plainly an order under the 125th section of this Act. Then the words, order for the administration of the estate of a deceased person who dies insolvent, by parity of reasoning, would also, I think, include an order, and only extend to an order made under this Act. But I find the term, order for the administration of the estate of a deceased person who dies insolvent, or order for administration of such an estate, used in several places in the 125th section in such a way that it leaves no doubt as to the meaning of the Legislature on this point.

Now the 125th section is this, in so far as I need state it:—"Any creditor of a deceased debtor whose debt would have been sufficient to support a bankruptcy petition against such debtor had he been alive may present to the court a petition in the prescribed form praying for an order for the administration of the estate," and here there occur the words "according to the law of bankruptcy." Upon the prescribed notice having been given the court may, on proof of the petitioner's debt, unless the court is satisfied there is a reasonable probability that the estate will be sufficient for the payment of the debts owing by the deceased, make an order for the administration in bankruptcy of the deceased debtor's estate or dismiss the petition. But under the third sub-section such an order cannot be made "until the expiration of two months from the date of the grant of probate or letters of administration unless with the concurrence of the legal personal representative of the deceased debtor, or unless the petitioner proves to the satisfaction of the court that the debtor committed an act of bankruptcy within three months prior to his decease." The 4th sub-section also enacts that the petition for administration shall not be presented to the court, which means the court having the jurisdiction in bankruptcy, after proceedings have been commenced in any court of justice for the administration of the deceased debtor's estate, and then makes a provision for transfer.

Now I come to what appears to me to be a very important sub-section bearing on this matter. The 5th sub-section is this:—"Upon an order being made for the administration of a deceased debtor's estate the property of the debtor shall vest in the official receiver of the court as trustee," and the term "order for administration" occurs again in the 6th sub-section, and the 9th sub-section runs thus:—"Notice to the legal personal representative of a deceased debtor of the presentation by a creditor of a petition under this section shall, in the event of an order for administration being made thereon, be deemed to be equivalent to notice of an act of bankruptcy." Then at the end of that section the term "order for administration" again is found.

of adjudication' shall be deemed to include an order for the administration of the estate of a debtor whose debts do not exceed fifty pounds, or of a deceased person who dies insolvent."

It appears to me therefore, putting these various enactments together, to be reasonably clear that the Legislature intended that the term "order for administration" in the 42nd section, should not extend to an order made by the Chancery Division of the High Court. The limit of time for the distress is the date of the order for adjudication, and there is nothing equivalent in the order made for the administration of a dead man's estate in this division which enables the court at once to see that the estate has been adjudged to be insolvent and insufficient for payment of debts. If Mr. Whitehorne's argument prevailed the result would be to introduce a great revolution in the matter, because what time, according to this argument, is the court to adopt as equivalent to the order for adjudication. It may be that administration has been going on for several years in this court, and suddenly there appears a creditor with a large bond debt, a bond altogether unknown and that would turn the scale (such cases have happened), and the estate would be shown to be insolvent. There is no adjudication when that debt is brought in which will show the estate to be insolvent, there is nothing that enables the court to fix a point of time which will be equivalent to the adjudication of bankruptcy. The result would be that the 42nd section plainly would not be applied during the earlier years of the administration or the earlier time of the administration, and would be brought into operation without there being anything in the shape of a fixed order adjudicating in form or in substance on the question whether the estate is solvent or insolvent. Where the order is made under the 125th section by the court in bankruptcy, to use the short term, there the parties called before the court, and before the order is made, can be heard on the question of solvency or insolvency, and the order, as is obvious from what I have already read from the 2nd sub-section of the 125th section, cannot be made unless the court is satisfied there is a reasonable probability that the estate will be insufficient. I think the result is that at the present time there is nothing equivalent to an order for adjudication, and there is nothing to which the term "order for administration" in the 42nd section applies; and it would be a strange anomaly if the Legislature had introduced this one bankruptcy rule by the 42nd section into administration in the Chancery Division and not introduced various other rules which other people may think are better than the rules applied in this division—for instance, the priority of payment accorded in respect of wages and other matters of that kind. I ask—and I think there is only one obvious answer to the question—what is the effect, if Mr. Whitehorne should be right, of that 5th sub-section, which divests the property out of the legal personal representative and vests it in the official trustee? Of course, upon that part of the case there can be no question but that means an order for administration in bankruptcy. The result is, I think, that the respondents fail upon that point also.

Statute of Limitations—Mortgage of reversionary interest—Foreclosure action—Time from which statute runs—37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, ss. 1, 2.

A mortgagee of a reversionary interest in land may bring an action for foreclosure at any time within twelve years from the date at which the reversion falls into possession.

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Adjourned summons.

Joseph Hugill, of Whitby, in the county of York, by his will, dated the 24th of August, 1838, devised certain dwelling-houses and real estate, situate at Whitby, to his wife for life, and after her decease upon trust to pay and divide equally the rents (after deducting expenses) unto his children and certain grandchildren therein named, and after the decease of the survivor of his children then upon trust as to the same hereditaments for all his grandchildren who should then be living, in equal shares as tenants in common.

The testator died on the 21st of February, 1845, his wife died on the 8th of August, 1848, and the survivor of his children died on the 10th of August, 1886, leaving several grandchildren, among whom was Joseph Wilkinson and John Wilkinson.

In 1870 Joseph Wilkinson borrowed of his brother the sum of £150, for which he signed the following receipt:—

"September 22nd, 1870.

"Received the sum of one hundred and fifty pounds from my brother John Wilkinson on the twenty-second day of September, one thousand eight hundred and seventy, and I hereby give him as security the whole of my interest I am entitled to out of the property left by my grandfather, Joseph Hugill."

The document was signed by Joseph Wilkinson, and stamped with a penny stamp.

Joseph Wilkinson became a bankrupt in 1871. He was never discharged, but his trustee in bankruptcy was afterwards released, and his estate became vested in the official receiver.

On the 10th of March, 1887, an action was brought by some of the grandchildren of the testator for partition or sale of his estate, and on the 23rd of April, 1887, an order was made directing accounts and inquiries as to the persons entitled, the nature of their interests, and the incumbrances affecting their shares, and a sale of the property instead of a partition.

John Wilkinson thereupon claimed to be an equitable mortgagee of the share of Joseph Wilkinson in the property for the sum of £150; no payment of interest or acknowledgment of the debt having been made since the date of the receipt. In an affidavit in support of his claim he stated that at the date of the loan it was agreed that it should bear interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, but his claim for interest was abandoned. The official receiver, in whom the estate of Joseph Wilkinson was vested, opposed the claim on the ground that it was barred by the Statute of Limitations. The present summons was thereupon taken out by John Wilkinson for the determination of the question.

Birrell, for John Wilkinson.—A mortgagee of a reversionary interest can bring an action for foreclosure at any time within twelve years from the date at which the reversion falls into possession. Therefore the right of John Wilkinson is not barred, and his claim must be allowed: James v. James, 21 W. R. 522, L. R. 16 Eq. 153; Harlock v. Ashberry, 30 W. R. 327, 19 Ch. D. 539; Beynon v. Cook, 23 W. R. 531, L. R. 10 Ch. 389. The case of Humble v. Humble, 24 Beav. 535, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 44, differs from the present, as there the interest was not really reversionary. Here it is contingent as well as reversionary.

Ingle Joyce, for the official receiver.—The transaction merely amounts to an agreement for a mortgage, and comes within section 8 of statute 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57. Fearnside v. Flint, 31 W. R. 318, 22 Ch. D. 579, shows that an action on a collateral bond is barred in twelve years. The mortgagee might have taken proceedings while the interest was in reversion, and need not have waited until it fell into possession. He ought to have done so within twelve years, and his claim is now barred: Sinclair v. Jackson, 1 W. R. 400, 17 Beav. 410; Heath v. Pugh, 29 W. R. 904, 6 Q. B. D. 345. The case of Harlock v. Ashberry does not refer to reversionary interest. Humble v. Humble is in my favour.

North, J.—Joseph Wilkinson, by a security dated the 22nd of September, 1870, charged all his interest in property left by his grandfather, which included certain real estate devised by his grandfather to his wife for life, and after her death to trustees until the death of the longest liver of certain persons, which took place on the 10th of August, 1886, and then for other persons, of whom Joseph Wilkinson was one. The charge given by Joseph Wilkinson was a charge upon reversionary real estate to which he could not come into possession until the death of a certain person, which took place on the 10th of August, 1886. The mortgagee might have taken steps to have enforced the charge at once instead of waiting until the estate fell into possession. It does not appear that any acknowledgment of the debt was made since the date of the security. It is said that the claim of John Wilkinson is therefore barred by the Statute of Limitations. I do not think so. Now, to put it in a simple way, suppose the charge to John Wilkinson had included all the land, he would have been entitled to proceed against Joseph Wilkinson and joined the trustees of the will as defendants to the action. The right of Joseph Wilkinson to bring an action against the trustees is clear. I see no reason why the mortgagee's right should not be equal to the mortgagor's. Joseph Wilkinson, however, became bankrupt, and his rights passed to the trustee in bankruptcy. It is clear that Joseph Wilkinson or the trustee has a right to bring an action to have a share of the proceeds of sale of the property paid over to him. No defence to such an action is suggested except the statute, which does not bar Joseph's remedy. Now the right of John Wilkinson is a right to enforce a charge which may be enforced by a foreclosure action. That has been held to come within section 2 of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, and it follows that it is equally within section 1 of the statute 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57. That section enacts:—[his lordship read the section, and continued:—] Now it is clear that the right to bring an action within that Act is to be deemed to have first accrued at the period defined by the 2nd section—that is, as to an estate in reversion, at the time at which the same shall have become an estate in possession by the determination of any estate in respect of which the land shall have been held. That section does not touch the case of a mortgagee of a reversionary interest bringing an action against the mortgagor while the interest is reversionary. But with respect to the right of a mortgagee to bring an action for foreclosure when the mortgaged estate is in possession, the Act does provide that the action is barred in twelve years from the time at which the estate becomes an estate in possession. The right extends to twelve years from the time at which the estate becomes an estate in possession. I think that the right of John Wilkinson to bring an action for foreclosure is saved by the second section of the statute 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57. That being so the chief clerk's decision is right. The costs of the mortgagee may be added to his security.

Sharp v. Wakefield and Others. (a.)

Licensing—Application for renewal—Discretion of justices to refuse—9 Geo. 4, c. 61—35 & 36 Vict. c. 94—37 & 38 Vict. c. 49.

The justices at the annual general licensing sessions have the same absolute judicial discretion to grant or refuse applications for the renewal of licences as they have in respect of granting or refusing applications for new licences for the purposes specified in the Licensing Acts of 1828, of 1872, and of 1874. The provisions of section 42 of the Act of 1872, and in section 26 of the Act of 1874, only modify the procedure in cases of applications for renewal, and do not limit in any way the judicial discretion intrusted to the justices by section 1 of the Act of 1828.

Appeal from justices of Westmoreland, sitting at quarter sessions, by case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, as follows:—

On the 10th of September, 1887, William Bland duly applied to the licensing justices for the Kendal division of Westmoreland for a grant by way of renewal for the sale by him of all intoxicating liquors at the Low Bridge Inn at Kentmere, in the county of Westmoreland, and was refused such renewal.

Susannah Sharp, the owner of the said inn, and a person aggrieved by such refusal, appealed in due form of law to quarter sessions of the peace for the county of Westmoreland, holden at Kendal, and such appeal was heard by the Court of Quarter Sessions on the 21st of October, 1887.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that on the hearing of an application for the renewal of a licence under the Intoxicating Liquor Licensing Acts, 1828, 1872, and 1874, the court was not by law entitled to inquire into the character and wants of the neighbourhood or to refuse a grant by way of renewal upon such grounds.

The Court of Quarter Sessions overruled the said contention, and, after hearing evidence, refused to renew the said licence, on the ground of the remoteness from police supervision and the character and necessities of the locality and neighbourhood in which the said inn is situate.

The question of law for this honourable court is whether the Court of Quarter Sessions was entitled to refuse the said renewal upon the grounds stated.

If it were not so entitled the order of sessions is to be quashed, but if the court should be of the contrary opinion the said order is to be affirmed.

Candy, Q.C., and L. Sanderson, for the appellant. The justices are not entitled to refuse to renew a licence without any complaint being made as to the fitness of the holder of the licence or the character of the licensed premises. Their discretion is limited in applications for renewal to personal objections. That discretion is founded on the Licensing Acts of 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), of 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 42, and of 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 26; Reg. v. Lancashire Justices, 1 W. R. 204, L. R. 6 Q. B. 97; Reg. v. Liverpool Justices, 32 W. R. 20, 11 Q. B. D. 638; Reg. v. Farquhar, L. R. 8 Q. B. 258, 22 W. R. Dig. 38; Ex parte Martin, 42 J. P. 133; Ex parte Bendall, 42 J. P. 88; Reg. v. Bradford and Over Darwen Justices, 31 W. R. 273, 10 Q. B. D. 213; Simpkin v. Birmingham Justices, 20 W. R. 1, L. R. 7 Q. B. 482; Reg. v. Market Bosworth Justices, 35 W. R. 734, 56 L. J. M. C. 96, 57 L. T. 56. In this last case Lord Coleridge, C.J., based his judgment on that in Reg. v. Liverpool Justices. [The J.—The case as reported in the Law Journal is unintelligible. In the Law Times it is stated that there was no previous notice of opposition. That would make the judgment clear.] Objections to renewals are the object of special enactment, showing that they must be personal objections, and that otherwise, and if without notice, the applicant is entitled to the renewal: Reg. v. Silvester, 31 L. J. M. C. 93, 10 W. R. C. L. Dig. 2; Reg. v. Schneider, 11 Q. B. D. 66, 31 W. R. Dig. 109. The licence is not granted to individuals, but to premises, and becomes a right of property in those premises; hence special enactments protecting the owners of such premises and for their transfer: 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, and Amendment Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 44).

Addison, Q.C., and Poland, for the respondents, the justices.—There is no limitation laid down by the Licensing Act of 1828 as to the discretion of justices to refuse the renewal of licences. A "licence granted by way of renewal" is defined under the general head of "Licences" by section 74 of the Licensing Act of 1872, and stands on a par with new licences as defined in section 32 of the Licensing Act of 1874: Marwick v. Codlin, L. R. 9 Q. B. 509. The word "renewal" occurs first in the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, s. 7). The analogy of beerhouse licences is misleading—these were excise licences under 1 Will. 4, c. 64, s. 2. Subsequently personal conditions were required from the holders of such licences under 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 2, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, ss. 1 and 2. Up to 1869 such beerhouse licensees had a right to renewal, subject only to personal conditions. By the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, the same discretion is given to the justices as they possessed over the other licences, except that existing holders of beerhouse licences retained their right to renewal subject only to four qualifications. The limit of one year for licences is not for purposes of excise, but for restraint of drunkenness: Reg. v. Sykes, 24 W. R. 141, 1 Q. B. D. 52, and it applies to all "keeping or about to keep houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors": section 1 of the Licensing Act of 1828. This control has been subject to the discretion of justices since the days of Edward VI. Further control is given by 26 Geo. 2, c. 31, and the sale of liquor is subsequently limited to the classes specified in the Act of 1828—viz., innkeepers, &c. Reg. v. Hann and Price, 3 Burr. 1716, sums up the old law. No case can be cited showing any limit to the discretion of justices in granting or refusing to renew. Section 42 of the Act of 1872, excusing attendance in the case of applicants for renewals, merely modifies section 12 of the Act of 1828, enforcing such attendance; and section 26 of the Act of 1874 is to the same effect. Section 14 of the Act of 1828 merely protects the rights of owners of licensed premises in the case of death or change of occupancy.

Candy, Q.C., in reply.—The words "licensed premises" are specifically mentioned in sections 44, 45, and 46 of the Act of 1872 to show that the licence is attached to the premises, and not to the individual. The beerhouse legislation only deals with a particular class of persons, and no inference can be drawn from it to the law as to intoxicating liquor licences in general. The words "to such persons as the justices deem fit and proper," in section 1 of the Act of 1828, clearly intend to limit their discretion to the fitness of the person.

April 30.—Field, J.—This case was one reserved for us by the justices from the Quarter Sessions of Westmoreland, on an appeal from the petty justices by the applicant for the renewal of a licence for Low Bridge Inn. The justices have withheld the renewal of this licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors on the ground that the locality was too remote from police supervision, and that the needs of the neighbourhood did not require such premises to be so licensed. The justices at quarter sessions came to the same conclusion on the appeal, but reserved the question for us, at the instance of the applicant, as to whether they have a discretion, on such grounds, to refuse to renew a licence. The question turns entirely, as I think, upon the true construction of the Licensing Act of 1828, and not, as was alleged, upon any subsequent legislation. That is my opinion, after having gone through carefully all the legislation and the cases brought to our notice. I cannot find any real authority for the contention of Mr. Candy, that there has been any legislation subsequent to 1828, either by statute or judicial construction, which affects the discretion of justices as laid down by the Act of 1828. Mr. Candy contended that the justices were not competent to entertain an objection founded upon the wants of the neighbourhood at all, even in the case of applicants for new licenses, much less in the case of applications for the renewal of licences. As to new licences, such a contention was startling. Ever since I have considered this question I thought it was clearly understood that in that case, at any rate, the discretion of the justices was what is termed "absolute"—that is to say, that they had a very wide and unfettered discretion in the exercise of this jurisdiction. I contended so in Simpkin v. Birmingham Justices, and my contention was upheld on appeal; but Mr. Candy says that even if I was in the right, then subsequent legislation has altered the correctness of that contention; and Mr. Candy boldly maintains that, provided the justices are satisfied of the respectability of the applicant and the fitness of the premises, their discretion is limited to granting licences to such fit and proper persons and premises. I do not think that his contention can by any means be borne out.

The general law as to their discretion was declared explicitly and clearly in 1758, and there has been no alteration up till now legislatively or judicially in the principle as there laid down on what grounds the court shall alone interfere with that discretion. That discretion must be interpreted, it is true, by the construction of the Licensing Act of 1828, but Mr. Addison has pointed out how the earlier legislation renders that Act intelligible. Restraint has been exercised upon the sale of intoxicating liquors since the time of Edward VI., and even, to some extent, since the time of Henry VI., by requiring licences held by the retailers to be granted by justices individually, sitting in their private houses. An important modification of this restraint was instituted last century by 26 Geo. 2, c. 31, by which licences were only to be granted by the justices at a general meeting of the quarter sessions. That control was left to the joint discretion of the justices at those sessions, and since the decision in Rex v. Young and Pitt, 1 Burr. 556, decided by Lord Mansfield in 1758, I have never heard of that discretion being questioned on other grounds than are there laid down. That was a case of an application for the renewal of a licence, and Lord Mansfield there says: "That notwithstanding this was a matter left in a great measure to the discretion of the justices, yet if it appeared to the court that their conduct was influenced by partial, oppressive, corrupt, or arbitrary views, instead of exercising a fair and candid discretion, the court might call upon them to show the reasons whereby they guided their discretion." And again, on the later argument, "that the justices must not be permitted to exercise an arbitary and uncontrolled power," but that the court "had no power to review the reasons of the justices unless it clearly appears they have been partially, maliciously, or corruptly influenced." It was therefore held that the justices had properly exercised their discretion, unless it was impeached on those particular grounds, and the court refused to interfere. Up to a late period there has been no legislative distinction between new licences and renewed licences, but in the Licensing Acts of 1872 and 1874, and in the Beerhouse Act of 1869, the Legislature did practically distinguish the two classes. A "new licence" is defined by section 74 of the Act of 1872 as amended by section 32 of the Act of 1874 to mean "a licence for the sale of any intoxicating liquor granted at a general annual licensing meeting in respect of premises in respect of which a similar licence has not theretofore been granted," and "the renewal of a licence means a licence granted at a general annual licensing meeting by way of renewal." Previously, I believe, no such definitions had been expressed. Each application for a renewal is for a new licence, the preceding licence having expired. There is a new grant for a new period altogether, although the licence may affect the same premises. What was, then, the effect of the Act of 1828? Referring to the useful book of Mr. Paterson's on the "Intoxicating Liquor Licensing Acts" (5th ed.) I find that section 1 of that Act enacts that a special session of the justices shall be held "for the purpose of granting licences to persons keeping, or about to keep, inns, alehouses, and victualling houses, to sell exciseable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed on the premises specified." Mr. Candy says that the distinction between new and renewed licences is intended in the words "keeping or about to keep." Well of course there is some distinction between "keeping" and "being about to keep" certain premises, but there seems no ground for basing any legislative distinction on those words. The section further enacts by the last sentence that it shall be lawful for the justices specified "to grant licences for the purposes aforesaid to such persons as they shall, in the execution of the powers therein contained, and in the exercise of their discretion, deem fit and proper." It is alleged that they are limited by those words to deal only with objections to the personal fitness of the applicants and the convenience of the premises. But section 9 of the Act clearly puts another construction on those words of section 1, even if such a construction as is alleged was the true one, which I do not believe. Section 9 says that "any question touching the granting, withholding, or transferring any licence, or the fitness of the person applying for such licence, or of the house, &c.," shall be determined by the said justices. "The fitness of the person" is only one of the questions to be dealt with. Moreover, if the power of granting is enacted it is clear that the power of withholding is implied, as is specifically mentioned in section 9. This principle has, moreover, been clearly decided by the case of Reg. v. Lancashire Justices, where Lush, J., relies largely on those two sections, 1 and 9.

It is remarkable, too, that the very ground of objection on which the justices refused the renewal of a licence was similar to the one taken here—namely, that "the accommodation of the neighbourhood did not require it." The result of the decisions and enactments, then, so far, is that applications for new licences and for renewal of licences are precisely on the same footing, and that in both cases, so long as the justices, in the exercise of their jurisdiction, do not act "corruptly, arbitrarily, or unfairly," their discretionary power to grant or withhold licences is absolute, and these courts have no power to interfere. There are two or three cases which, it was alleged, qualified this power, Reg. v. Sylvester and Reg. v. Schneider, but in these cases the court, so far from denying this discretion, affirmed it most strongly. They laid down that the justices, having to exercise this discretion, must not act upon any general rules so laid down as to limit this discretion, but must exercise their discretion in every individual case. The courts interfered, not because the justices had exercised discretion, but to enforce the law that they should judicially exercise a discretionary jurisdiction and not limit themselves by conditions not within the statutes. Up to 1830 there is no change in the law as I hold it. Has there been any change since whereby licensees holding such licences have been held to have a right, provided they are proper persons with fitting premises, to a renewal of their licence? There have been a series of statutes enlarging the persons and places by whom and on which licences could be held for the sale by retail of intoxicating liquors. The Beer Act 1830 (1 Will. 4, c. 64), gives greater facilities for the obtaining of beer licences, and, these being granted by the Excise for the purpose of obtaining revenue, it was thought advantageous to encourage a greater freedom in the sale of beer on the premises and to grant licences to any applicants for such sale, subject afterwards to certain conditions as to the character of the person and premises. No distinction was made by the Excise between the grant of new licences or their renewal. This lasted till 1869, when, by the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (certain places having been licensed to sell wine by legislation subsequent to 1830), the same control was enacted to be exercised over beershops and wineshops as had been imposed on inns and alehouses since the days of George II. Fitness of character and suitability of the premises was required to be proved, and such licences were to be granted except upon production of the certificate required by the Act, and section 3 of the Act incorporates the same discretion, with one distinction, as we shall see in a moment, of the justices as was declared in the Licensing Act of 1828 in regard to inns and alehouses. On this legislation Mr. Candy founded an argument that the discretion of the justices was limited because a distinction is made between the notices required in case of applications for new licences, while these are dispensed with in cases of applications for renewals under section 7, and, again, by section 4, applications for "off" licences to sell beer are only to be refused on four specified grounds. But, except for the particular grounds specified, section 3 maintains in the broadest possible way that "all the provisions of the Act of 1828 as to the manner in which grants of licences are to be made are to apply." These qualifications are specifically mentioned as to be applicable only to applications for the sale of beer not to be consumed on the premises, clearly implying that were it not for such qualifications the discretion of the justices would be as absolute as under the Act of 1828, whose provisions are declared to be incorporated. Then section 19 of the Beerhouse Act of 1869, in order to protect the vested interests which had grown up in beerhouses owing to the legislation previous to 1869, enacts that applications for renewal in these houses shall not be refused except on particular grounds. So far from qualifying the discretion allowed under the Act of 1828 it practically affirms it. With the exception of a particular class, that discretion is implied to exist. Thus far legislation had not, I hold, affected licence holders under the Act of 1828. But in 1872 the licensing of the sale of intoxicating liquors is incorporated under the one Licensing Act of that year. Licences are defined under section 3. Mr. Candy relied on sections 36 and 40 as showing a distinction between the treatment of new licences and renewed licences. It was intended by the Legislature to protect the owner of licensed premises as well as the holder of the licence, who undoubtedly has considerable material interests in the continuance of the licence. Provisions are made for the transfer of licences under section 40. Certain notices are to be given to the owner before objections be heard on the renewal of the licence. But there is no suggestion to be founded on these sections as to any limitation of the discretion of the justices. Section 42 is also relied on. It is there enacted that in cases of applications for renewal "the applicant need not attend in person."

Under the old laws, both before and since 1828 up to 1872, the justices had been in the habit of requiring publicans to attend, whether as applicants for new or renewal of licences. That was found to be a great inconvenience to all parties. As to applications for new licences no alteration was made. As to applicants for renewal of licences, their attendance in person was, under the Act of 1872, not to be invariably required. There was, also, to be this important distinction that persons were not to be entitled to maintain certain objections to the renewal of licences without notice being served on the holder that such objections were to be raised (section 42): "The justices shall not entertain any objection to the renewal of such licence, or take evidence with respect to its renewal, unless written notice of an intention to oppose the renewal be served," and, further, the attendance of the applicant may be required on an adjournment if no such notice has been given. Then comes a most important proviso. "Subject as aforesaid, licences shall be renewed, and the powers and discretion of justices relative to such renewal shall be exercised as heretofore." That in no way limits the magisterial discretion. It merely gives a statutory safeguard to a man who already holds a licence, and very justly, because a man who has already produced the requisite certificate of character and passed the ordeal of examination is primâ facie entitled to continue to hold such licence in default of any objection to his continuing so to do; and it would be unjust to bring him before the justices under such circumstances. But all the powers of the justices in their discretionary jurisdiction are reserved, and remain unaffected by these provisions. If it be argued that that discretion is to be limited to entertaining personal objections, it seems to me, even if that argument was a valid one, which I deny, that it is difficult to say what are the limits of personal objections. Permitting gambling is clearly a personal objection, but whether the wants of the neighbourhood may not be in some sense a personal objection to an applicant it is difficult to say. At any rate, however, the inference that the discretion of the justices is limited to such objections cannot legitimately be drawn from these provisions. Merely to show the tendency of legislation, I may refer to the Act of 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 34), commonly called Mr. Ritchie's Act, which gives "a free and unqualified discretion" to the justices in respect of refusing licences for the sale of beer off the premises, notwithstanding section 8 of the Act of 1869; as was held by myself and Stephen, J., in Reg. v. Kay, both in respect of applications for renewals of such licences as well as for such new licences.

I have now been through all the legislation on the subject. I will only make some observations on some specific points raised. (1) It was said that the requirement of the attendance of the applicant for a renewal only in case of personal objection showed that the discretion of the justices was limited to entertaining only such objections. I can find no rule for such a construction. Under the Act of 1828 an applicant might be excused from attendance through illness, and section 26 of the Act of 1874 merely extends such relief from attendance, except in cases where personal objections to the applicant are brought forward, when, for his own safeguard, the justices are to require his attendance. (2) It was further urged that the clauses of the Act of 1872 dealing with the case of convictions of the licence-holder (sections 30 and 31) imply an intention to protect the owner against any disability from obtaining a renewal, provided a suitable tenant can be found, and the premises are not to be disqualified without notice to the owner.

It is certainly provided that after one, two, or more convictions a disability is imposed on the house as well as on the man. Under such circumstances the owner is to be given the opportunity of knowing of the existence of such disabilities, and of re-entering so as to let in another tenant who can apply for the renewal as being within the qualifications required by the Act. There is no indication that I can see in such provisions of any intention by the Legislature to limit in any way whatever the general discretion of the justices in granting or withholding licences. The general result, therefore, is that it was intended by the Legislature in 1828, and subsequently, to create a new class of persons and of premises by whom and on which intoxicating liquors were to be sold by retail; that as to one class—i.e., beershops—the discretion of the justices in refusing an off-licence was for a time limited to four grounds, but as to all other classes the original unfettered jurisdiction of the justices is retained under which they may exercise their absolute discretion in all applications for licences. Mr. Candy urged that some authorities were contrary to this view. I am unable to see that they are really anything of the kind. In the one case which he chiefly relied on, Reg. v. Market Bosworth Justices, the report in the Law Journal is not very intelligible, but the report in the Law Times makes it clear that Lord Coleridge, C.J., and A. L. Smith, J., had no idea of altering the discretion of the justices by their decision, since the case of Reg. v. Liverpool Justices, on which they rely, had nothing to do with the question of discretion. It merely overruled some decisions of the divisional courts to the effect that in order to procure the advantages derived under section 14 of the Act of 1828 applications for renewal must be made, pending the currency of the existing licence, and that if the existing licence was allowed to drop a renewal could not be obtained by any of the various classes of persons whose rights were to be safeguarded by section 14. Reg. v. Liverpool Justices merely decided that persons properly coming within that section need not necessarily apply for the renewal before the expiration of the existing licence, and Lord Coleridge in the later case clearly only decided that in that particular case the application was really one for a licence by way of renewal, and, therefore, on the ground of the absence of proper notice of objection as required in the case of renewals, the justices were not entitled, except at their discretion, to refuse to entertain the application. Upon all the grounds mentioned I see no reason, either upon the old statutes or the new statutes, either upon the old cases or the new cases, to throw the smallest doubt upon the proposition that in granting a licence, whether a new one or by way of renewal, the justices have absolute discretion so long as their power is not exercised "corruptly, arbitrarily, or unfairly." So long as they act in the exercise of their jurisdiction their discretionary power of granting or refusing either application is what is termed "absolute"—that is to say, it is an unfettered judicial discretion with which no court can interfere. The justices in this case were, therefore, competent to refuse the application for a renewal of the licence on the grounds which they have stated, and this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Wills, J.—I desire to express my entire concurrence in the result of my brother Field's judgment, and after the very elaborate review which he has given of the statutes and the cases I feel that it would be a waste of time for me to go minutely over the same ground, but I wish shortly to state in my own way the ground of my opinion.

I think it cannot be doubted that before the Act of 1872 every application for what is now called the renewal of a licence was exactly the same thing in all its legal incidents as that which is now called a new licence. There was but one enactment under which such an application could be dealt with—viz., 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 1. The licence, if granted, lasted for a year, and no longer

(section 13), when the year expired it was gone—and if the applicant did not get a fresh licence there was an end of his right to sell exciseable liquors to be consumed on the premises. The word "renewal" does not occur in the Act. The expression "to renew a licence" appears in the marginal note to section 27 and nowhere else, and the use of the phrase there comes to no more than if it were used in a text-book. The phrase "new licence" is equally absent from the Act of George IV. The phrase "renew," as applied to a licence, first appears, so far as I know, in 23 Vict. c. 27, s. 11, the Act of 1860 relating to wine licences, which, so far as I am aware, is incorporated expressly or impliedly by the subsequent Acts, and which I only notice for the purpose of tracing the use of the phrase in legislation of a kindred nature. In the Act of 1872 both phrases are defined. The definition of a "new licence" is modified by the Act of 1874, s. 32, but only to correct a mistake which arose from using in the definition the term "licensed premises" which, inasmuch as "premises" had to be interpreted by another part of the interpretation clause defining "licensed premises," contained words likely to create confusion if applied to some of the circumstances under which the statutory interpretation of "licensed premises" as it stood in the Act of 1872 might have to be resorted to. I may therefore take the definition given by the Act of 1874, which is "a licence granted at a general licensing meeting in respect of premises in respect of which a similar licence has not theretofore been granted before." A "renewal of a licence" is defined as a "licence granted at a general annual licensing meeting by way of renewal."

As the licence, though only to be exercised in respect of specified premises, is in all cases a personal one, and the phrase "licensed premises" is only introduced in company with a definition clause, which shows that it is, taken by itself, an inaccurate and misleading phrase (and one which I cannot help thinking is answerable for a good deal of misapprehension), I think it follows that a licence granted by way of renewal is a phrase applicable only to the case in which both the person applying and the premises are the same as those appearing in the previous licence. A document can hardly be said to be by way of renewal of another when so important a factor as the person who alone can apply is changed. The phraseology of section 42 of the Act of 1872 seems to me completely to bear out this view. It treats the applicant for renewal as necessarily the person already licensed. So far it is, I think, impossible to contend that there was, by the Act of 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), any limitation upon the absolute discretion of the justices, when applied to for a new licence, to grant or refuse it upon any grounds which seemed to them fit to be acted upon, provided that there is a real judgment exercised in respect of the individual case; to exclude, for instance, a case in which the ground of refusal had absolutely nothing to do with the question in hand, such as a refusal because applicant had not taken out a spirit licence (Reg. v. Sylvester), or where they had laid down a general rule that they would grant no more licences in the locality (Reg. v. Justices of Wakefield). In such cases there is really no exercise of judicial discretion at all, and it is very much as if they had refused because the applicant wore a blue coat or a white hat. But where it cannot be shown that no real discretion has been exercised the applicant has, in case of refusal, no other resort than to submit to his fate. I do not pause to cite cases. It is abundantly clear upon the words of the Act, and there is equally abundant authority, and as by that Act there was absolutely no distinction between applications for licences made at the annual general licensing sessions by a person who did not and those by a person who did already hold a licence, it follows that there was no limit to the discretion of the justices in the case of renewal any more than in the case of a grant for the first time. I proceed to inquire what the Acts of 1872 and 1874 have done for a person already holding a licence. By section 42 of the Act of 1872 the applicant for the renewal of a licence is undoubtedly put in a better position than he would have been had he held a licence. He is thereby relieved from attending personally to obtain the licence, whereas it is clear from section 12 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, that the applicant for a new licence must do so unless prevented by certain specified causes. If objection be taken to the renewal of his licence he is entitled to notice and to a hearing, but the omission by an objector to give notice at the proper time was not necessarily fatal to the objection, the magistrates might, in their discretion, adjourn the case and require the applicant to attend upon a further day to have the case heard, and the evidence at the hearing must be taken upon oath. Subject to these conditions, however, licences were to be renewed at the discretion of the justices as exercised heretofore. The alteration was simply one of procedure, made imperative upon the justice in order to give an applicant the opportunity of being heard. There is nothing in it to limit their discretion as to the class of objection which they may entertain and act upon. Then comes the Act of 1874, containing further provisions in favour of the applicant for the renewal of a licence. Such applicants are relieved from personal attendance, if they do not wish to give it, unless the nature of the objection is some special cause personal to such licensed person. They are entitled to have the notice of the grounds of such objections to their applications for renewal. It is further provided that it shall not be necessary to serve copies of notices of any adjournment of a general annual licensing session on holders of licences or applicants for licences who are not required to attend at such adjournment annual general licensing meeting.

I find it very difficult to say what this provision means, and I doubt very much if its meaning was understood with reference to the then existing legislation by anyone when it was passed, but it is one in case, not of the persons applying for licences, but of others; I cannot say of whom, for I do not see who was likely to serve notice of adjournment in the case of such applicants for new licences as were not required to attend personally. I am quite sure, however, that an obscure general provision of this kind, relating solely to procedure, was not meant to interfere with the discretion of the justices. The argument is that, because where objection is taken to an application for renewal for the first time at a licensing session there must be an adjournment, and because only in case of a personal objection personal attendance is required, and because in case of adjournment it shall not be necessary to serve notice of adjournment on the holder of the licence (or the holder of a licence not required to attend at such adjourned meeting, for the section may be read both ways), therefore the application of a holder cannot be objected on any ground but one personal to himself. I am not sure what the paragraph does mean, except that it does not mean this, as I am very sure that the repeal of most important discretion absolutely necessary for good government and administration has not been effected in this roundabout and bungling fashion. There are abundant cases in which it is just as necessary to refuse to renew a licence as to grant a new one where the personal character of the applicant may have nothing to do with the objection; for instance, where a street respectable becomes full of brothels or thieves' lodging houses. The action of the magistrates may be quite necessary to prevent the renewal of a licence for a public-house in such a locality as to refuse it in the first instance, and cases of a like kind must often occur.

I have considered the Acts apart from authority, but it seems to me that there is direct authority in favour of my view as to the effect of legislation.

Reg. v. Smith, 48 L. J. M. C. 38, Cockburn, C.J., and Mellor, J., held that under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, and the Licensing Act of 1872 the discretion of justices in cases of applications for renewal was as unqualified as in applications for new licences. That was decided after the Act of 1874. I find no case since throwing any doubt upon this view. It was argued that Reg. v. Market Bosworth Justices was to the contrary effect. I do not think so. The justices there had decided against the applicant on the ground that there were public-houses enough in the neighbourhood, and had treated the application as one for a new licence without an adjournment and without giving the applicant an opportunity of being heard. This they could not do if it was entitled to be considered as applying for a renewal under section 42. The court, thereupon, held that under the circumstances the case was within the decision of the Appeal Court in Reg. v. Liverpool Justices, and was a case of a renewal. They, therefore, granted a mandamus to the justices to hear and determine the application as one for a renewal.

This is certainly no authority contrary to the present decision. The only shred of authority I can find for the contention that under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 1, there can be any limit to the justices' discretion is an expression of Lord Romilly in Day v. Luhke, 16 W. R. 717, L. R. 5 Eq. 336, in reference to a case of transfer. He says:—"The transfer of the licence under section 11 of the Act of George IV. is a matter of course, and no discretion is exercised by the justices unless they have information that the transferee is an objectionable person" (p. 344). He cannot mean, however, that the justices have no discretion, only that in practice they do not exercise it under such circumstances. The very exception he specifies shows that he thought they had a discretion. The words conferring jurisdiction are the same in section 11 as in section 1, and nothing is said as to whether the transferee is an objectionable person or not. That they had discretion in such a case is held in Reg. v. Rowell, L. R. 7 Q. B. 490, 20 W. R. Dig. 3. Day v. Luhke has been followed in Claydon v. Green, 18 W. R. 1126, L. R. 3 C. P. 511, and in Cowles v. Cook, 20 W. R. 70, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 12, and it seems to be perfectly right; but in neither of these cases is anything said to give countenance to the notion that under section 11 the justices have not the discretion in question. It was merely held that the procedure under section 11 was in those cases necessary to enable a contract for the sale of a going concern in a public-house to be carried out, and that the vendor was not in a position to apply under that section. I only noticed these cases because they are quoted by Fitzgerald, J., in Reg. v. Recorder of Dublin, 11 Ir. R. C. L. 412 and 413, as authorities for the proposition that licences have been recognized by the English courts as matters of property annexed to a house; but they do not seem to afford really any support to that proposition. The Irish case itself was concerned with a transfer under Irish Acts, and is no authority in reference to the present case, or, indeed, to English licensing Acts, and, as the learned judge there says, "Afford no real guide in the case of those questions arising in the other island."

I do not think it necessary to discuss the enactments affecting licences for the sale of beer and the other licences to which the Wine and Beerhouse Act of 1869 applies, as its provisions are so very different from those regulating this case that they and the decisions upon them have no direct bearing upon the present question. They do, however, suggest that where the Legislature meant to limit the discretion of the justices in dealing with applications for licences it has done so in very clear and unmistakeable terms, the entire absence of which in the present instance forms a striking contrast with the provisions in this respect of the Act of 1869.

In my opinion, therefore, the Court of Quarter Sessions had jurisdiction to decide the appeal to them upon the grounds upon which they acted, and this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave, J.) April 26; May 9.

Ex parte Kennedy.
In re Willis. (a.)

Mortgage deed—Attornment clause—Bankruptcy petition—Distress—Adjudication—Right to proceeds—Validity—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 6.

An indenture of mortgage contained a clause whereby the mortgagor attorned and became tenant from quarter to quarter to the mortgagee in respect of the premises at a yearly rent by equal quarterly payments, the first payment to be made on the first day of the month next after any interest thereby secured should have become in arrear, but all money received by the mortgagee for rent due under the attornment to be accepted in the first place in or towards satisfaction of the interest then in arrear. A bankruptcy petition was subsequently presented against the mortgagor, upon which he was adjudicated bankrupt, but between the presentation of such petition and the adjudication the mortgagee distrained under the tenancy created by the attornment, and realised the sum of £1,715.

Held, that the clause in question fell within section 6 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and, the distress being unlawful, the trustee in the bankruptcy was entitled to the money realized.

Application by the trustee in the bankruptcy for an order on Lady Willoughby d'Eresby for the repayment of the value of certain goods sold under a distress made by her on the property of the bankrupt.

On January 28th, 1884, the bankrupt, who was then the lessee of Willis's Rooms for a term of years, in consideration of the loan of £20,000, mortgaged those premises to Lady Willoughby d'Eresby, by way of sub-demise, to secure the repayment of the said loan. By the indenture of mortgage it was agreed that Lady Willoughby d'Eresby, or the persons claiming title under her, might at any time, without any further consent on the part of Willis, or any other person, demise or enter into any agreement to demise the said premises, or any part thereof, on any terms she or they might think fit, provided that such power should not be exercised until such time as she or they were by law empowered to sell. The indenture further witnessed that for the same consideration Willis thereby attorned and became tenant from quarter to quarter to Lady Willoughby d'Eresby, in respect of the premises, at a yearly rent of £2,000, by equal quarterly payments, the first payment to be made on the first day of the month next after any interest thereby secured should have become in arrear, but all money received by Lady Willoughby d'Eresby for rent due under the attornment should be accepted in the first place in or towards satisfaction of the interest then in arrear: provided that the attornment should not make it compulsory on Lady Willoughby d'Eresby to collect the rent payable thereunder, and that she should not be accountable to a second mortgagee, or any subsequent incumbrancer, for any rent that might have been recovered under such attornment, and provided that Lady Willoughby d'Eresby might, at any time after she was by law empowered to sell, without any notice, enter upon and take possession of the premises and determine the last-mentioned tenancy.

On September 24th, 1885, a bankruptcy petition was presented against Willis, the act of bankruptcy alleged being a failure to comply with the requirements of a bankruptcy notice served on the debtor on September 4th, and on January 26th, 1886, he was adjudicated bankrupt.

In the meantime—viz., on November 7th, 1885—Lady Willoughby d'Eresby had distrained under the tenancy created by the attornment, and had realized the sum of £1,715.

The trustee in the bankruptcy now applied for the repayment of this sum to him, on the ground that the distress was unlawful by reason of section 6 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. It was admitted that if the case fell within the said section, and not within the proviso thereto, the distress became, by virtue of the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882, unlawful, and the trustee was entitled to the money realized.

E. Cooper Willis, Q.C., and Houghton, for the trustee.—This is a bill of sale within section 6. There is no special reservation of the right of distress in the attornment clause. This case is distinguishable from Hall v. Comfort, 35 W. R. 48, 18 Q. B. D. 11.

French, Q.C., and Lane, for Lady Willoughby d'Eresby.—This case does not come within section 6 at all: Hall v. Comfort; even if the case does come within section 6, it also comes within the proviso at the end of that section: In re Stockton Iron Co., 27 W. R. 433, 10 Ch. D. 335; Ex parte Punnett, In re Kitchin, 29 W. R. 129, 16 Ch. D. 226.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 9.—CAVE, J.—In this case the first contention on behalf of the respondent was that the case did not come within the section at all, and in support of that proposition the case of Hall v. Comfort was strongly pressed upon me. In that case a mortgage deed contained a clause by which, for the purpose of securing the punctual payment of the interest, the mortgagor attorned tenant to the mortgagee, and the mortgagee had a power of re-entry for default in payment. Default was made, and the mortgagee commenced an action for the recovery of the premises, and applied for judgment under order 14. Upon the hearing of the summons the defendant objected that the attornment clause was void under the Bills of Sale Acts, so that no tenancy had, in fact, been created. The court, however, held that the clause was not rendered void by those Acts. The actual decision has no bearing on this case; but it was contended that the reasoning by which it was arrived at is conclusive in favour of the respondent. In order to test that it is necessary to see what points were actually argued and decided in that case. For the defendant it was contended that, as the attornment clause purported to create a tenancy to which a power of distress is incident, and so gave power to seize personal chattels, it was, in fact, a bill of sale, and so came within section 3 of the Act of 1878. It was also contended that it amounted to a licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt, and so came within section 4. According to the report, it was also contended that it came within section 6, but I cannot understand how that could be, for no personal chattels had been seized or taken under the distress, and there is nothing in that section to make the attorn[illegible] itself void. Lord Coleridge, C.J., held that the att[illegible]ment clause was not within the Act, that it was [illegible] bill of sale within section 3, nor a licence to take [illegible]session of personal chattels as security for a debt w[illegible] section 4, because it had not the character or incid[illegible] of a bill of sale properly so called, and because, [illegible] were within those sections, every lease would be w[illegible] the Acts. That reasoning, if I may respectfully s[illegible] is perfectly good, but it applies obviously to sectio[illegible] and 4 only, for, in the first place, it is expressly [illegible]vided that an attornment, &c., shall be deemed to [illegible] bill of sale which implies that, but for the sectio[illegible] would not have been one at all, and makes it one fo[illegible] purposes of that section only; and, in the second p[illegible] there is nothing in section 6 to bring an ordinary [illegible] within the section, and, indeed, there is an ex[illegible] exception of a mining lease, which, as an anom[illegible] document amounting, not to a demise, but to a s[illegible] the minerals, might otherwise have been thought to [illegible] been within the Act. It is more difficult to explai[illegible] language of Manisty, J., as he seems to have th[illegible] that if an attornment in a mortgage deed were w[illegible] section 6 an ordinary lease would also be wit[illegible] which is clearly not the case, so that it seems pro[illegible] he was referring to sections 3 and 4, to which [illegible] observation as to leases would apply rather tha[illegible] section 6, to which it would not apply. The word[illegible] the section, omitting what is immaterial for the pr[illegible] purpose, are:—"Every attornment whereby a power [illegible] distress is given by way of security for any pr[illegible] advance, and whereby any rent is reserved as a mod[illegible] providing for the payment of interest on such adva[illegible] shall be deemed," &c. Why do not these words [illegible] describe such an attornment clause as that in the pr[illegible] deed? It is said by Manisty, J., in the case cited th[illegible] to be within section 6 the power to distrain must b[illegible] expressly given, and must be a special power, not th[illegible] usual power of distress incident to a demise, and that [illegible] must be a power given over some particular goods. B[illegible] such a power would, as it seems to me, be an auth[illegible] or licence to take possession of personal chattels [illegible] security for a debt within section 4 of the Act. C[illegible]sider the consequences which would follow from h[illegible] that such an attornment clause was not within se[illegible] A money lender's security is often taken upon go[illegible] premises occupied by the borrower. In such a ca[illegible] money lender need only resort to the device of a [illegible] demise and an attornment clause, and his power to [illegible] so far as the rent reserved goes, provided it is a [illegible] rent, will be free from all the restrictions of the Bi[illegible] Sale Acts. It is also said that if this construc[illegible] adopted, an attornment clause, so far as it con[illegible] power of distress, will no longer be of any valu[illegible] think that is so, but I also think that that is ex[illegible] what the Legislature intended when section 6 [illegible] enacted, as enabling the mortgagor to retain the [illegible]ward semblance of wealth whilst secretly giving [illegible] mortgagee power to take possession of the mortga[illegible] goods and chattels to the exclusion of the [illegible] creditors. Moreover, it does not appear that in Ha[illegible] Comfort the attention of the court was drawn to [illegible] parte Jackson, In re Bowes, 29 W. R. 253, 14 Ch. [illegible] 725, 733, in which Baggallay, L.J., expressed a [illegible] opinion that such an attornment clause as was use[illegible] the present case would come within section 6 of the [illegible] of 1878. For these reasons I have come to the [illegible]clusion that the clause in question does fall within [illegible] section.

The next contention was that if the case came [illegible] section 6 it also came within the proviso at the [illegible] "that nothing in that section shall extend to any m[illegible]gage of any estate or interest in any land, tenement [illegible] hereditament which the mortgagee being in posse[illegible] shall have demised to the mortgagor as his tenant [illegible] fair and reasonable rent." In support of this contention the cases of In re Stockton Iron Co. and Ex parte Pennett, In re Kitchin, were cited. In the first of these cases James, L.J., held that when, by the mortgage deed, an actual lease is created with a reservation of rent, the mortgagees are as much mortgagees in possession for all purposes of taking the account of what is due on the mortgage as if they had granted the lease to some new lessee, and had given notice to that lessee to pay the rent to them. In the second case a mortgagor had created two mortgages, and had attorned tenant to the first mortgagee in the first mortgage deed, and also to the second mortgagee in the second mortgagee deed. The court held that the right of the second mortgagee to distrain under his attornment clause was not affected by the prior attornment to the prior mortgagee. Mr. French sought to make use of these cases in this way. He contended that the first established that a mortgagee with an attornment clause was a mortgagee in possession within the meaning of the proviso, and that the second mortgagee would be within the section and outside the proviso, thus seeking to meet a difficulty which had been pressed upon him, that his construction of the proviso would leave nothing for the body of the section to operate upon. But, as it seems to me, a second mortgagee with an attornment clause must occupy, as regards a third incumbrancer, the position which the first occupies with regard to the second, and that if the first must, for all the purposes of taking the account of what is due on his mortgage, be treated, as between himself and the second mortgagee, as being a mortgagee in possession, so must the second mortgagee be treated as regards a third, and so also must the third if he has an attornment clause as against the fourth, if there is one. In that case every mortgagee with an attornment clause would come within the proviso, and nothing would be left for the section to operate on. The words in the proviso are "which the mortgagee being in possession shall have demised," and I think these words can only apply to a case where the mortgagee has taken actual possession under his mortgage deed, and has subsequently demised to the mortgagor, and not to a case where there has been no actual taking of possession, and the demise has been created by the mortgage deed itself. This contention seems to me not only more consonant with the language of the proviso, but also more calculated to secure the objects of the section. If Mr. French's construction is correct the creditors might see all the chattels on the mortgagor's premises swept away by the mortgagee, although nothing had taken place which could lead them to suspect that he had given anyone the power of seizing them to the exclusion of the other creditors, while in the other case the chattels could only be swept away where the mortgagee had actually taken possession, a fact which it is difficult, if not impossible, to keep secret.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the trustee is entitled to the order he asks for, with costs.

Cavendish-Bentinck v. Fenn. (a.)

Company—Director—Misfeasance—Agent for purchase—Sale of agent's own property to company—Non-disclosure—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 165.

The directors of a company were empowered to purchase, and did purchase, certain properties. One of the directors had, previously to his becoming a director, acquired an interest in these properties. The company went into liquidation, and a shareholder, whose shares were fully paid up, took out a summons under section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862, as a contributory, asking for a declaration that the director had been guilty of misfeasance or breach of trust in not disclosing his interest, and that the properties had been purchased at a price above their proper value, and asking also that he might be ordered to refund the loss which had accrued.

Held, that the evidence was not sufficient to prove either that the director had not disclosed his interest or that the price was excessive.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 33 W. R. 788, 29 Ch. D. 795) affirmed on the ground of insufficient evidence only.

Semble, that a person who is merely a contributory in respect of shares fully paid up has no locus standi to apply under section 165 unless he can show that he might derive some benefit thereby.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Cotton and Fry, L.JJ., Bowen, L.J., dissenting), affirming a decision of Pearson, J., reported 32 W. R. 853, 26 Ch. D. 221.

The appellant, who was a holder of fully paid-up shares in the Cape Breton Co., took out a summons under section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862, in the winding up of the company. The summons asked for a declaration that the respondent had been guilty of a misfeasance or breach of trust in relation to the company, and that he might be ordered to pay to the liquidator the amount of the loss occasioned to the company by the misfeasance or breach of trust.

The facts fully appear in the judgments delivered by Lords Herschell and Macnaghten.

May 17, June 28, July 5.—Montague Cookson, Q.C. (J. G. Butcher with him), for the appellant.—The respondent was bound to disclose his interest, and the onus of proof is on him to show that he did so. Again, the evidence shows that the price paid was excessive—or, at least, is sufficient to require an answer. Restitution is no doubt impossible, but section 165 provides for the payment of compensation.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and Farwell, for the respondent.—There is no evidence that the respondent did not disclose his interest, or that the price was excessive. Secondly, the respondent was not in a fiduciary position when he purchased the properties, and therefore equity will give no relief except rescission, which has now become impossible. Thirdly, the appellant has no right to take out a summons under section 165, as his shares are fully paid up, and he can get no pecuniary advantage from succeeding under it.

July 5.—Lord HERSCHELL.—This case arises upon an application made in the winding up of the Cape Breton Coal Co. under the 165th section of the Companies Act, 1862, the appellant claiming, under that section, that the respondent, who was a director of that company, should be held liable for misfeasance or breach of trust, he having been an agent of the company.

The evidence before your lordships is very meagre; and in the arguments of the learned counsel which have been addressed to your lordships a great many suggestions have been made which receive but little support from the evidence which has been adduced.

It appears that in the year 1871 certain persons associated themselves together under the name of "The Coal Area Association," and acquired three areas of coal known as the Haven, Lake, and Balmoral areas. There has been some controversy as to the price at which they acquired those areas in the year 1871, but I think we may take it that the price was £5,500. Amongst the persons thus associated under that title was the present respondent, Mr. Fenn. There were also his partner, Mr. Crosthwaite, an engineer named Baker, and a Mr. Gisborne.

At the commencement of the year 1872 the persons who were thus associated as the Coal Area Association formed a limited company bearing the same name, with the addition of the word "Limited"; and Mr. Gisborne, who resided in Nova Scotia, and by whom apparently these areas had been originally owned, or, at all events, in whose name they stood, assigned his interest in the coal areas to the Coal Area Association (Limited), giving them the right to use his name for all purposes for which that was necessary in order to give them the full benefit of that assignment.

In the following year—1873—negotiations were entered into for the amalgamation of certain other coal companies, three in number—the Lorway Coal Co., the Glasgow and Cape Breton Coal Co., and the Schooner Pond Coal Co.—and an agreement was entered into for the purpose of the amalgamation of those three companies and the transfer of their properties to a new company which was afterwards to be incorporated. The new company was to undertake all the liabilities, debenture and otherwise, of those three companies, and was to acquire all their property. This amalgamation arrangement was made the subject of an agreement of the 24th of October, 1873. The agreement was made between the three companies that I have named and a Mr. Blunt on behalf of the intended new company, and by that agreement, not only were these properties of the three existing companies to be acquired by the new company, but it was made a condition of the entire arrangement that the new company should also acquire by agreement of sale and purchase the three coal areas, the Haven, the Lake, and the Balmoral, which were the property of the Coal Area Association (Limited), to which I have already called attention, at a price not exceeding £42,000, and on the terms that the vendors should take not less than two-thirds of the money in paid-up shares of the new company. The arrangement contemplated by that agreement was afterwards carried into effect; the new company was formed and incorporated in November of the same year—namely, The Cape Breton Coal Co. (Limited), and of that new company Mr. Fenn, the present respondent, and Mr. Baker became directors.

In the following month—the month of December—the purchase of these three coal areas which was contemplated by the agreement of October, 1873, was carried into effect. The price given was the maximum price permitted by the agreement—namely, £42,000—but instead of a third of it being in cash and the remainder in shares, £12,000 only was paid in cash, and the difference, the remaining £30,000, was paid by shares of the new company.

At the time when that agreement was come to by the directors of the new company and the owners of those three areas Mr. Fenn and Mr. Baker were present; they were parties to the agreement and parties to putting the seal of the company to the agreement. It is in respect of that transaction that the present claim is advanced under the 165th section of the Companies Act of 1862. The question which your lordships have to consider is whether there was a misfeasance in relation to that transaction within the meaning of the 165th section of the Companies Act.

Now there can be no doubt that inasmuch as Mr. Fenn was interested with his partner, Mr. Crosthwaite, to the extent of three-tenths of the value of these three coal areas, holding three-tenths of the shares in the Coal Area Association (Limited), he was bound to disclose that interest to the other directors of the new company who were entering into a contract for the purchase of them, and his failure to make that disclosure would entitle the company, upon discovering his interest, to rescind the sale. I think about that there can be no manner of doubt. But at the present time rescission has become impossible. Of course, that is not the remedy sought under the 165th section, but it is said on the part of the appellant, "Although rescission has become impossible, and that remedy is no longer available, I am nevertheless entitled to claim against the respondent that he shall make good to the company the loss they have sustained owing to his misfeasance in failing to make that disclosure."

The case has been put on behalf of the appellant in various ways. First, it is said to be a case of a secret profit made by an agent, which profit he is therefore bound to hand over to his principal. Of course it cannot be doubted that Mr. Fenn, as a director of the company, was in the position of an agent, and, undoubtedly, if he filled any fiduciary position towards them at the time when he purchased this property he would be bound to pay to the company the difference between the price at which he purchased it and the price at which it was sold to the company. But here it is beyond question that at the time when the purchase was made Mr. Fenn and his co-adventurers were none of them in any sort of fiduciary relation to the company, the existence of which was, at that time, not even contemplated. Again, there probably is little doubt that if an agent of a company is employed by that company to make a purchase for them in the market of goods of any description, and if, instead of making that purchase in the market at the market price, he sells to his company goods of the required description which he happens to own, at a price in excess of the market price, he can be made to pay to the company that excess, so as to leave their purchase, as it ought to have been, at the market price, according to the obligations which he is under to them. But in the present case the purchase that was made was a purchase of a specific property; it was that specific property alone which the agent, the director, was authorized to purchase; it was not left to him to purchase, at the best price at which they could be obtained, goods or land of a particular description, but his agency, so far as it existed at all, was an agency to purchase this specific property in which it is proved he had an interest.

Now I am by no means prepared to say that the argument of the appellant is well founded, that such a case as this is a parallel case to the class of cases to which I have alluded, where an agent employed to go into the market and buy at the market price sells his own goods to the company at something above the market price. But I do not think it necessary to come to any absolute determination upon that point, because it is of the very essence of such a case as this to show that the price at which the property was sold to the company was in excess of what has been called the real price or the true value. Now what evidence is there here, upon which your lordships would be entitled to act, that the property in question when purchased by the company was sold to them at a price in excess of the real value, or the market value, or the true value, in whichever way you put it? I admit that there may be considerable ground for suspicion that the price was in excess of it. But obviously for such a case as the appellant seeks to make out here much more than that is necessary. It is of the very essence of the case, which rests upon his proving what he claims, namely, a secret profit improperly made, that he should prove that there has been that excess which he alleges.

Now what are the only facts before us? The appellant relies upon the fact that this property, purchased in 1871 at £5,500, was sold in the autumn of 1873 at the price of £12,000 in cash, with an addition of £30,000 in shares in this new company. No doubt that is a fact of importance pointing in this particular direction at any rate. But that is not the only fact, and it is impossible for us to shut our eyes to information which is matter of common knowledge that in 1871 and subsequently to 1871 coal properties did rise very considerably in value—whether to this extent or not to this extent it matters not—that fact at all events prevents our coming to the conclusion that the price given in the early part of 1871 is any real guide to the value of the same property in 1873.

But that is not all, because in October of 1873 an agreement was entered into between the representatives of three companies as well as a person acting on behalf of the intended new company. The representatives of three companies, the Glasgow, the Schooner Pond, and the Lorway, considered it worth their while to give up to £42,000, £14,000 of that sum to be in cash, for the purchase of this very property. These three companies were entirely independent, as far as appears, of the persons who owned the coal areas in question. All that is said with regard to it is that these three companies had originally been promoted by the same persons. But it is impossible to shut one's eyes to the fact that such an agreement was come to as affording evidence that this was considered in October, 1873, as the value of the property.

It is not necessary to inquire what the real value of the property exactly was, or for your lordships to come to any determination upon it. As I have said, you may have reason to suspect that the price given was excessive, but how is it possible, in the face of the evidence to which I have called attention, for your lordships to come to the conclusion that any such case is established as is alleged on behalf of the appellant—namely, that a sum in excess of the real value was, in December, 1873, agreed to be given by the directors of the Cape Breton Coal Co. for these three coal areas? I think it is impossible to arrive at any such conclusion and, therefore, to say that there has been misfeasance on the part of Mr. Fenn, the present respondent, which would warrant your lordships coming to the conclusion that he could be compelled to return a part of the money received in respect of this purchase on the ground that he was making improperly a considerable profit.

But I own that I entertain very great doubt in the present case whether there is any evidence establishing that which it is essential to establish for the purpose of making out the appellant's case. I mean that there was a misfeasance on the part of the respondent in concealing his interest in the property. No doubt, where rescission is claimed, if it is shown that a person taking part in the transaction of purchase was himself one of the vendors, the onus would be on him of showing that he made full disclosure. But when an applicant seeks under the 165th section, to establish a case of misfeasance, I think it is necessary for him to give evidence of all the elements that go to make up that misfeasance. There is no misfeasance in a person who has an interest in the property, by being a shareholder in the company which is selling it, nevertheless acting as a director in the purchase of that property for another company. The misfeasance, if it exists at all, must be in this, that he enters into such a transaction without communicating to his co-directors the fact that he has such an interest. It seems to me that it must rest with those who allege the misfeasance to prove that element, which is an essential element to make out misfeasance at all.

Now what is the evidence here? I cannot see the slightest evidence, upon the affidavit of Mr. Harper or otherwise, to show that disclosure was not made in the present case or that the other directors were not perfectly well aware of Mr. Fenn's position. One may speculate about it, one may imagine that they were not; but, as I have said, those who undertake to make out a case of misfeasance must establish that case before they can claim the relief to which it is suggested they are entitled.

Then it is said that the case may be put in another way, that there was here at all events a breach of duty, and that in respect of that breach of duty a claim may be made under the 165th section, the breach of duty being the omission to make full disclosure. There again I have only to repeat that I fail to see the evidence that there was any such breach of duty committed. And I think that in order to establish a claim to relief it would be necessary, not only to show a breach of duty, but to show a breach of duty which resulted in pecuniary loss to the company. It may be perfectly true that where there is a duty, whether arising out of a contract or otherwise, by one person to another an action will lie in respect of a breach of that duty although no substantial damage has been suffered. In an action nominal damages may be recovered wherever a breach of duty is shown. But I certainly do not think that any such doctrine can be applied to the 165th section. The right which the 165th section gives is not given really to the company or the representative of the company with whom there is a contract, or as towards whom there is a duty or against whom there is a breach of duty; but the right under the 165th section is given to "any liquidator, or any creditor, or contributory of the company." Now a creditor or contributory has no duty owing to him; there is no duty or breach of duty in respect of which he can maintain an action, but he has a right to this extent, that if, owing to a misfeasance or breach of duty, the funds of the company in which he is interested have been diminished, those funds shall again be made good, and the assets of the company shall be recouped the loss which they have sustained. And, therefore, I think that, assuming that a breach of duty such as is suggested would be a misfeasance giving rise to an application under the 165th section, such an application could only succeed where it could be shown that the breach of duty had resulted in loss to the funds and assets of the company.

The only other way in which the case has been put is that there has been deceit or fraud which would give rise to this application.

With reference to the last two claims to which I have alluded—namely, the claim for breach of duty and the claim in respect of deceit or fraud—I think that it would be a very grave question whether it would be proper to give the relief applied for upon a summons such as we find in the present case. I think that where it is intended to allege such a breach of duty, and where it is intended to allege fraud or deceit, those allegations should be clearly, satisfactorily, unequivocally made in the summons, so that those against whom they are made should have their attention directed to them, and should have an opportunity of meeting them. In the present case I entertain certainly a strong impression that it never was intended at the time when the summons was issued to make any such allegations. In my opinion there was an idea that the defendant, Mr. Fenn, could be made responsible for the difference between what he gave for the property and the price at which he sold it, and the claim was in respect of his putting the seal to these two agreements, and it was supposed that that resulted in an obligation to pay that difference; because I do not find anywhere an allegation either that there was misfeasance in respect of a breach of duty to disclose, or that there was misfeasance in respect of fraud or deceit in making a false representation to the company or to his co-directors.

I own that I see no ground whatsoever for alleging fraud. The allegation is based solely upon this—it is said that the respondent represented to the directors that the property belonged to Mr. Gisborne, and did not belong to him, and that allegation rests entirely upon the statement in the affidavit of Mr. Harper that "Frederick Newton Gisborne was in each case put forward as the sole vendor of the property." Now Mr. Harper only purports to found his affidavit upon the information which he has obtained from a perusal of the documents in the case, and the sense in which he says that "Frederick Newton Gisborne was put forward as the sole vendor" must be gathered from the documents upon which he founds that statement. Those documents no doubt show that contracts were entered into in the name of Gisborne. Gisborne at that time was the legal owner of the property, and in those contracts Gisborne, who was the legal owner of the property, comes under an obligation to obtain a lease and certain rights in the name of the new company. That perhaps accounts for the fact that the agreements were entered into in the form in which they were with Gisborne; but whether that is so or not, to say that the mere fact that the agreements were entered into in that form with the trustee, who was the legal owner, without any mention of the beneficiaries, is sufficient to prove a fraudulent misrepresentation that he, and he alone, was the owner, seems to me, I own, a somewhat extravagant proposition. At all events, I feel quite sure that your lordships would not be justified in holding so serious a charge as that of fraud to be established upon evidence of such a very flimsy description as that.

I think I have now dealt with the whole of the case put forward on behalf of the appellant, and I have come to the conclusion that he has not established, on any of the grounds suggested, that there has been misfeasance on the part of the respondent resulting in loss to the company in respect of which compensation can be claimed.

There are only two other points to which I need call attention. One of them is the question how far it would be open to the present appellant to bring forward the case upon which he now insists, having regard to the scheme of arrangement which was before the creditors and shareholders of the new company and the action which was taken by the liquidator in selling the property of the company. I am not myself disposed to attribute, in the present case, perhaps so much force as was attributed by the learned judges in the court below to the transaction in question as excluding the appellant from the right upon which he now insists. If the appellant could have established that, although rescission was not open to him, he had a substituted cause of action in respect of deceit or fraud or breach of duty for which an action could have been maintained consistently with the property remaining in the company, I should not myself be prepared to say that that right would be got rid of, or could not be insisted upon, in the winding up under section 165, by reason of the transaction to which I have alluded in respect of the property; but, of course, in the view which I take it is not necessary to pronounce any further opinion upon that point.

One other point remains — namely, the question whether the present appellant has a right, though having no interest, to invoke the assistance of the court under section 165. Of course, in the view which I take, it is not necessary to pronounce an opinion upon that point, but, the point having been raised and argued before your lordships, it may be expedient that it should not be passed over without some expression of opinion upon it. I confess myself that I cannot help entertaining the gravest doubt whether the appellant has really any locus standi. I think it clear that he is not a creditor. His only claim, therefore, to the assistance of the court must be on the ground that he is a contributory. He is a contributory whose shares are fully paid up. He would be interested, therefore, as a contributory if any funds could be brought into the coffers of the company out of which it would be possible that any return could be made to him. But I cannot think that it was the intention of this section, or that it was contemplated by the Legislature, that a contributory who could have no possible interest in the result of the application, and could obtain no benefit whatsoever as a contributory, even if to the fullest extent to which the claim was advanced, it proved good, should have a right to apply under this section. True, "contributory" is mentioned without any sort of limitation, but so it is in section 82 of the Act, which allows a contributory to petition for winding up, where it has been held that a shareholder with fully paid-up shares of the company, although a contributory within the words of the section, is nevertheless, or may be nevertheless, not entitled to invoke the assistance of the court if he be a person having no real interest in the company.

For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and the judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed, and I so move your lordships.

Lord Watson.—I am of the same opinion. I do not desire to rest my judgment in this case upon the reasons which were assigned for the decision of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal. It is not, to my mind, at all clear that because rescission has become impossible through the impossibility of giving restitutio in integrum to the seller, a claim under either of the two heads embraced in section 165 of the Companies Act of 1862 is thereby excluded. I think it is very material, in considering this case, to attend to the specific nature of the claims which are sanctioned by that section. They are of a twofold character; they sanction the recovery, at the instance of a liquidator, a creditor, or a contributory of the company in liquidation, first, of moneys for which the defendant has become accountable to the company, the company's moneys; and the second head of claim is for pecuniary loss sustained by the company and its funds through the misfeasance or breach of duty of the defendant. It does not refer to, it does not include, any claim against a seller to the company such as would be comprised in the remedy of offering back the property and seeking restitution of the price.

In the present case I think the appellant, if he had a title under the section (a matter to which I shall shortly allude hereafter), was entitled to have an action against the respondent Mr. Fenn under the 165th section upon two grounds. In the first place he might show, as he has endeavoured to show, that Mr. Fenn, by the transaction in question, and his concealment of his true position in reference to it, has made a secret profit when acting as agent for the company. The second ground is that, having originally concealed his true position, he has, by deliberate acts of his own, prevented the knowledge of that position reaching the company. The latter, I need hardly say, is a case of deliberate and intentional deceit, in other words it is fraud. But the very basis upon which each of these claims rests is, that the company have, through his conduct, whether in making a profit or in fraudulently acting, suffered pecuniary loss.

In a case where rescission is asked, and it is not denied that at the time when the sale was made the seller failed, through breach of duty, to disclose his interest, the onus rests upon him to show, if he desires to maintain the transaction, that that interest became known to the purchaser, the person with whom he dealt at a subsequent period, and that the purchaser by his acts, either expressly or by plain implication, elected to uphold the transaction. But the case is very different when you come to charge a defendant with making undue profits in the dark at the expense of the purchaser, or to charge him with fraudulent concealment of facts which has led to loss on the part of the purchaser.

The onus probandi there is upon the plaintiff—the usual rule of law must apply. I know of no case where, by implication of law, the duty of clearing himself from a fraud imputed rests wholly on the defendant without any obligation on the plaintiff to instruct fraud.

I do not intend to enter into the facts of this case, which have been fully and, to my mind, satisfactorily criticised by Lord Herschell. I can only say that the proof in this case seems to me to fail at the very outset. There is really no trustworthy evidence, upon which a court can act, of pecuniary loss to the company, whatever may have been the conduct or the character of the acting of this respondent, Mr. Fenn. But I am bound to go further and to say this, that for the imputation of fraud, which is not necessarily expressly made upon the first of these suggested grounds of action, but which certainly is involved in the second, I can see, in these proceedings, no foundation whatever.

I have only to add that, whilst concurring in all that Lord Herschell has said, I do very strongly concur in his concluding observations. It appears to me that it was not the intention of the Legislature to give a right of suit under the 165th section of the Companies Act to any person who had not a pecuniary interest in the result. I think the inference of law is that the Legislature always expects that there shall be an interest, and intends to confine the leave and licence which it gives to those who are possessed of it. In this case, although it rather appears to be otherwise upon the face of these papers, it has been explained at the bar that the appellant is not a creditor of this company, but a creditor of another company, which has a claim of indemnity against the Cape Breton Co. He is a contributory, not in the sense of being liable if called upon to pay money into the coffers of the company at the instance of the liquidator, but he simply stands in the position of a possible recipient of a share in the balance of the assets after payment of the debts. There is no suggestion that any such fund will ever exist or that it would be called into existence by his success in that action.

It is not necessary to rest the judgment upon that ground, because, on the merits of the case, I am of opinion that he has entirely failed. But even if he had made out a case which would involve a right, I should have thought it my duty, as a member of this House, to support a judgment to the effect that he could not recover, not having an interest which would entitle him to sue.

Lord Fitzgerald.—Concurring as I do in the judgment proposed by Lord Herschell, and in the reasons of Lord Watson, it will be sufficient for me to say that it appears clearly to me that the appellant here has not a particle of interest in the litigation which he has instituted, and could never possibly derive any benefit from it. That being his position in that respect, I entirely concur with Lord Watson. The Court of Appeal, as well as Pearson, J., in the court below, dismissed the claim of the appellant upon the ground that the company had put itself in a position in which this contract could not be rescinded. There is no doubt that Mr. Fenn, who had become a director of the Cape Breton Co., was guilty of a breach of duty if he did not disclose the fact that he himself had a large pecuniary interest in the purchase by the Cape Breton Co., at the stipulated price, of these three coal areas to those with whom he was dealing. But I am not by any means satisfied that that serious proposition has been made out. Moreover, there is not to my mind a shred of proof as to what, at the time when the purchase was made, was the real value of these three coal areas. It is true that they had been purchased some years before at a much less sum; but have we any element of proof before us upon which we can come to the conclusion at the present moment that the true value, if means had been taken to ascertain the true value, of the coal areas was not equal to the price that was then put upon them? There is no such evidence, and the inference is the other way, for you have three independent companies converted into one by the amalgamation, and agreeing by the amalgamation agreement to purchase these three coal areas at a sum not exceeding £12,000 in cash, and £30,000 in shares; and you have that same company afterwards, when formed into a new company, ratifying and adopting that agreement. The inference to my mind would be that the price was not an unreasonable one; but without drawing such an inference it is only necessary to say that we have no proof that the sum stipulated for exceeded a fair and reasonable price for the coal areas at that time.

For these reasons I concur in the judgment which has been announced.

Lord Macnaghten.—I agree. When the case was first opened I was under the impression that the appellant had an interest in the result of the application apart from any question of costs, and I was also inclined to think that, although the evidence was meagre in the extreme and the case was presented in a very fragmentary and unsatisfactory manner, yet there was something which the respondent ought to be called upon to answer. But I am bound to say that after the discussion which the case has received, and after the very able argument of Sir Horace Davey, I am convinced that there is no ground for disturbing the order of the court below.

The application which has given rise to this appeal is made under the 165th section of the Act of 1862. Mr. Cavendish-Bentinck, describing himself as a creditor and contributory of the company, charges Mr. Fenn with a misfeasance or breach of trust. The act complained of is the affixing the seal of the company, or causing the seal of the company to be affixed, to two agreements, by which certain coal areas in which Mr. Fenn was interested were conveyed to the company, they paying a stipulated price for those coal areas. The remedy which was asked for by the summons was payment to the official liquidator of the whole of the purchase-money, or at any rate of that portion of the purchase-money which went into Mr. Fenn's pocket. At your lordship's bar and, as I understand it, in the court below the remedy was put on somewhat different grounds, and it was suggested that at any rate Mr. Fenn was liable for the difference, whatever it might be, between the sum of money which was given for the property and that which the appellant called the real value of the property.

The 165th section of the Companies Act of 1862 has often come under discussion, and it has been settled, and I think rightly settled, that that section creates no new offence, that it gives no new rights, that it only provides a summary and efficient remedy for rights which, apart from that section, might have been vindicated either at law or in equity.

It has also been settled that the misfeasance spoken of in that section is not a misfeasance in the abstract, but a misfeasance in the nature of a breach of trust resulting in a loss to the company. Apparently it has not been hitherto judicially determined that the applicant is bound to show that he is interested in the result of the application, but I certainly think that it must be so. I cannot think that Parliament intended that a person coming under the description of a creditor or a contributory should take upon himself the novel position and the important functions of a public prosecutor in a matter in which he had really no concern. It was, therefore, in my opinion, necessary for the appellant to show first that Mr. Fenn had committed a breach of trust, or a misfeasance in the nature of a breach of trust, as a director of the Cape Breton Co.; secondly, it was necessary for him to show that by reason of that misfeasance the company had sustained loss; and it was also necessary for him to show that he had an interest in the result of the application.

I am of opinion that the appellant has failed to establish any one of these propositions. The facts of the case lie in the narrowest possible compass. It appears that there were three English companies established for the purpose of carrying on business in Nova Scotia. Each of these companies was formed for the purpose of acquiring and working coal property in Nova Scotia. One of those companies added to that business the business of making and working a railway.

So far as appears these three companies were independent bodies, and they had a position of respectability, which may be inferred from the possession of a large paid-up capital, or a capital assumed to be paid up, and the existence of a large debenture debt. It appears that in the year 1873 these companies determined to amalgamate, and they considered that it was for their mutual benefit that the three coal areas mentioned in the summons, which belonged to a syndicate or association in which Mr. Fenn was the managing director, should be purchased, provided they could be acquired at a price not exceeding £42,000, of which one-third might be paid in cash—that would leave the cash payment at £14,000.

It seems to me that there is nothing inconsistent with what appears upon the face of this amalgamation agreement in assuming that the managers of these three companies knew perfectly what interest Mr. Fenn had in the property and that the subject of price had been negotiated. Shortly afterwards the Cape Breton Co. was formed to carry out this amalgamation scheme. There were to be five directors, of whom Mr. Fenn and Mr. Baker, who were interested in the three coal areas, were to be two. There were to be three other directors, who apparently had no interest in these three coal areas. It would appear that the price had been the subject of some negotiation in the interval between the date of the amalgamation agreement and the formation of the company, because the price, or rather the mode of payment of the price, was somewhat altered; instead of £14,000 being paid in cash £12,000 was to be paid in cash, and the articles provide that the directors shall issue £30,000 in shares.

On the 5th of December an agreement was made to purchase these three coal areas at what was the maximum price in the articles of amalgamation, and on the 17th of December the seal of the company was affixed to that agreement. Mr. Fenn and Mr. Baker were both present on the latter occasion, but we are not told whether they took any part in making this agreement, nor are we told whether there was any negotiation whatever with regard to the price. For all that appears Mr. Fenn may have disclosed his interest to his co-directors, he may have stood aside and allowed them to complete the agreement.

I think it was the duty of the appellant to establish his case, and I point out to your lordships that certainly there was sufficient time spent before this case was brought into court. Apparently all the documents in the possession of the company were produced and carefully criticized and examined, and the applicant had the opportunity at any rate of examining both Mr. Fenn and the other three directors, who, it is suggested, were kept in ignorance of the real truth of the transaction.

If I were asked to speculate or to guess whether Mr. Fenn disclosed his interest or not, I should certainly be inclined to say that he did so disclose it; I cannot see what was to be gained at that date by concealment. We start with the amalgamation agreement, and at the date when the purchase agreement between the new company and Mr. Gisborne was made the owners of the property were the masters of the situation. The Cape Breton Co. had declared the price which they were prepared to accept, and if the owners of the coal areas did not sell the property to them, the whole amalgamation scheme would have fallen through and everything that had been done up to that time would have come to the ground. It appears to me, therefore, that there was no reason whatever for concealing from the other three directors the fact that Mr. Fenn was interested in the property. Nor was the price, in my opinion, so very excessive. I think it must be taken that £5,500 was paid for the property. The price which the new company gave for it was £12,000 in cash. I think we may leave out of consideration the portion of the purchase-money which was to be paid in shares, which represented the profit that was to be gained, either from working the coal field or from the credulity of the public. However that may be, it clearly appears to me that the appellant has not proved that there was any misfeasance, nor has he proved that there was any loss.

With regard to this part of the case I merely desire to make one observation. I think it was the duty of Mr. Fenn to disclose his interest to his co-directors, and I think that if he omitted that duty the omission was no light matter. I think that if a person in the position of Mr. Fenn abstained from disclosing his interest, and if it could be proved that the other directors purchased the property without knowing what interest he had in it and gave a larger sum than the property was really worth, it would be very difficult for a person in that position to escape from the charge of fraud. I think it would have been a fraud to have concealed his interest and to have represented in fact that he was not interested in the property and that it belonged to other persons who were not connected with the scheme.

I think I have now gone through the case, and I will only add that it appears to me that the applicant has really no interest in the subject-matter of the application. I do not think that he is a creditor, and as a contributory it appears to me that it is utterly impossible, upon the facts as stated by himself, that he could ever derive any benefit from this litigation. I therefore entirely concur in the motion which has been proposed.

Order appealed from affirmed; and appeal dismissed, with costs.

NORTH-WEST TRANSPORTATION CO. (LIMITED) AND J. H. BEATTY v. H. BEATTY (for Himself and Others.) (a.)

Company—Director—Sale by director to company—Right of director to vote as shareholder.

Where a director, holding a majority of shares in a company, enters into a voidable contract with the company, himself being vendor,

Held, that the fact of his being a director does not incapacitate him from voting as a shareholder in a general meeting to ratify the contract.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Supreme Court of Canada, dated the 9th of April, 1886, reversing a decree of the Ontario Court of Appeal (17th of April, 1885), and affirming a decree of the Chancery Division of that province (6th of May, 1884), reported in 6 Ont. R. 300, which set aside a sale by the appellant James Hugh Beatty to the company.

The appellant Beatty held a preponderance of shares in the company and was a director, and voted as a shareholder for the ratification of a contract in which he was the vendor. The question was whether, being thus personally interested, he was entitled so to vote. The facts of the case appear in detail in their lordships' judgment.

The effect of the judgment of the Chancery Division was as follows:—"All suspicions of unfair dealings may be discarded, and the question resolves itself into one of purely equitable law, that is whether, the purchase from the director having been submitted to the body of the shareholders and adopted by a majority of votes, it is open for the dissentient plaintiff to undo the sale by the intervention of the court. One important element to be considered is that the majority was secured by reason of the votes held by the vendor, without which the result would have been adverse to the purchase. . . . My judgment proceeds on the ground that the vendor's fiduciary position incapacitates him from coercing the minority by means of a majority secured by his own vote in his own favour, without regard to the fairness or unfairness of the transaction. There has been no valid ratification by the company."

The Court of Appeal (Hagarty, C.J., and Burton and Osler, JJ.) unanimously reversed this decree, holding that there was no principle of equity to prevent the defendant J. H. Beatty exercising his rights as a shareholder, and voting as a shareholder in favour of the purchase, although he had a personal interest therein.

The Supreme Court of Canada (Ritchie, C.J., and Fournier, Henry, Taschereau, and Gwynne, JJ.) unanimously reversed the decree of the Court of Appeal. The present appeal was then brought.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Jeune, for the appellants, arguing for the reversal of the judgment of the Court of Appeal, contended that the fiduciary position of J. H. Beatty, as director, was not the question.—His rights as a shareholder, in the absence of fraud, entitled him to vote in general meeting for the ratification of a contract which at the most was voidable. It was no question of agency, for shareholders are principals.

They cited Pender v. Lushington, 6 Ch. D. 73, 25 W. R. Ch. Dig. 64; McDougall v. Gardiner, 24 W. R. 118, 1 Ch. D. 13; East Panet Du United Lead Mining Co. v. Merryweather, 13 W. R. 216, 2 H. & M. 254; Mason v. Harris, 27 W. R. 699, 11 Ch. D. 97.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and Bremner, contended that the Supreme Court was right, and that the minority of shareholders had been placed in an unfair position owing to a technical breach of trust.—Beatty made the sale as director and ratified it as shareholder, and the transaction could not be upheld in equity.

Cur adv. vult.

July 21.—The judgment of their lordships (Lord HOBHOUSE, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, Sir RICHARD BAGGALLAY, and Sir RICHARD COUCH) was delivered by Sir RICHARD BAGGALLAY.—The action in which this appeal has been brought was commenced on May 31, 1883, in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice of Ontario. The plaintiff Henry Beatty is a shareholder in the North-West Transportation Co. (Limited), and he sues on behalf of himself and all other shareholders in the company, except those who are defendants. The defendants are the company and five shareholders, who, at the commencement of the action, were the directors of the company. The claim in the action is to set aside a sale made to the company by James Hughes Beatty, one of the directors, of a steamer called The United Empire, of which, previously to such sale, he was sole owner.

The general principles applicable to cases of this kind are well established. Unless some provision to the contrary is to be found in the charter or other instrument by which the company is incorporated, the resolution of a majority of the shareholders, duly convened, upon any question with which the company is legally competent to deal, is binding upon the minority, and consequently upon the company, and every shareholder has a perfect right to vote upon any such question, although he may have a personal interest in the subject-matter opposed to or different from the general or particular interests of the company.

On the other hand, a director of a company is precluded from dealing, on behalf of the company, with himself, and from entering into engagements in which he has a personal interest conflicting, or which possibly may conflict, with the interests of those whom he is bound by fiduciary duty to protect; and this rule is as applicable to the case of one of several directors as to a managing or sole director. Any such dealing or engagement may, however, be affirmed or adopted by the company, provided such affirmance or adoption is not brought about by unfair or improper means, and is not illegal or fraudulent or oppressive towards those shareholders who oppose it.

The material facts of the case are not now in dispute.

The company was incorporated under the provisions of the Canada Joint Stock Companies Letters Patent Act of 1869. By its charter, dated the 5th of March, 1877, it was authorized to carry on business in the province of Ontario, and to construct, acquire, and maintain steam, sailing, and other vessels for the conveyance of passengers and goods over the navigable waters within or bordering upon the Dominion of Canada, to and from any foreign ports, with power, amongst other things, to sell, charter, or dispose of any such vessels, and to make contracts with any person or corporation whatever.

By sections 16, 18, and 22 of the Act of 1869 it was provided that the affairs of every company incorporated under its provisions should be managed by a board of directors, the major part of whom should at all times be resident in Canada, and subjects of her Majesty, and that the directors should have power to make for the company any description of contract into which the company might by law enter, and from time to time to make byelaws not contrary to law, but every byelaw so made, unless in the meantime confirmed at a general meeting duly called for that purpose, should only have force until the next annual meeting of the company, and, in default of confirmation thereat, should, at and from that time only, cease to have force; and the powers conferred upon the directors by section 22 were made subject to a proviso that one-fourth part in value of the shareholders of the company should at all times have the right to call a special meeting for the transaction of any business specified in such written requisition and notice as they might issue to that effect.

By byelaws made in March, 1877, and duly confirmed, it was provided that the affairs of the company should be managed by a board of five directors; that the qualification for a director should be the holding of five shares in the company; that every shareholder should have as many votes as he had shares in the company; that the annual meetings should be held on the first Wednesday in February in each year; and that at such meetings the directors should be annually elected, retiring directors being eligible for re-election.

The company commenced business shortly after its incorporation, and acquired for its purposes a fleet of several steamers. In the autumn of 1882 one of its steamers, The Asia, was lost, and another, The Sovereign, was deemed unsuitable for the company's business. At this time the steamer United Empire was in process of building for the defendant James Hughes Beatty, and was approaching completion; the contract for her construction had been entered into in December, 1880, and she was in fact completed on the 20th of May, 1883, a few days before the commencement of the action. The acquisition of The United Empire by the company had been suggested to the directors, and had been the subject of consideration by them and others interested in the company as early as the close of the year 1881; the loss of The Asia led to the matter being further considered, and the sale to the company was brought about in the following manner.

The annual meeting for the year 1883 was held on the 7th of February, and at such meeting the defendants were elected directors for the ensuing year; at the same meeting a discussion took place as to the suggested purchase of The United Empire, and it was resolved that a special meeting of the shareholders should be held on the 16th for the purpose of having submitted to them a bye-law for the purchase of the steamer United Empire, and also to consider the advisability of selling the steamer Sovereign.

At a meeting of the directors held on the 10th of February, 1883, and at which all the directors except the defendant William Beatty were present, it was resolved that a bye-law, which was read to the meeting, for the purchase of The United Empire should pass. It is unnecessary to refer in detail to the terms in which this bye-law was expressed; it is sufficient to state that, after reciting an agreement between the company and the defendant James Hughes Beatty, that the company should buy and the defendant should sell the steamer United Empire for the sum of 125,000 dols., to be in part paid in cash and in part secured, as therein mentioned, it was enacted that the company should purchase the steamer from the defendant upon those terms, with various directions for giving effect to the terms of the contract.

The agreement, recited in the bye-law, was executed at the same meeting.

At a meeting of shareholders, held, as arranged, on the 16th of February, 1883, the bye-law, which had been enacted by the directors, was read by the secretary, and, after being modified in its terms with respect to the price, was adopted by a majority of votes.

The United Empire, on her completion, was delivered to the company, and has ever since been employed in the ordinary business of the company.

It is proved by uncontradicted evidence, and is, indeed, now substantially admitted, that at the date of the purchase the acquisition of another steamer to supply the place of The Asia was essential to the efficient conduct of the company's business; that The United Empire was well adapted for that purpose; that it was not within the power of the company to acquire any other steamer equally well adapted for its business; and that the price agreed to be paid for the steamer was not excessive or unreasonable.

Had there been no material facts in the case other than those above stated, there would have been, in the opinion of their lordships, no reason for setting aside the sale of the steamer; it would have been immaterial to consider whether the contract for the purchase of The United Empire should be regarded as one entered into by the directors and confirmed by the shareholders, or as one entirely emanating from the shareholders; in either view of the case, the transaction was one which, if carried out in a regular way, was within the powers of the company. In the former view, any defect arising from the fiduciary relationship of the defendant James Hughes Beatty to the company would be remedied by the resolution of the shareholders on the 16th of February, and, in the latter, the fact of the defendant being a director would not deprive him of his right to vote, as a shareholder, in support of any resolution which he might deem favourable to his own interests.

There is, however, a further element for consideration, arising out of the following facts, which have been relied upon, in the arguments on behalf of the plaintiff, as evidencing that the resolution of the 16th of February was brought about by unfair and improper means.

It appears that, at the commencement of the year 1883, 595 of the 600 shares into which the capital of the company was divided were held by seven living shareholders, and five belonged to the estate of a deceased shareholder; that of the seven living shareholders—

The defendant J. H. Beatty	held 200	shares.
The plaintiff	120	,,

F. S. Hankey	71	,,
The defendant J. D. Beatty .	59	,,
J. C. Graham	39	,,
The defendant W. Beatty .	5	,,

It further appears that the defendant J. H. Beatty purchased the 101 shares of S. Neelon, and that they were transferred to him on the last day of January, 1883, the number of shares held by the defendant being thus raised to 301, an actual majority of all the shares in the company; that on the morning of the 7th of February, before the annual meeting of that day, the defendant J. H. Beatty transferred five of his shares to the defendant Rose and the like number to the defendant Laird, whereby they respectively became qualified to be elected directors; and that on the same day they were elected directors.

The defendants Rose and Laird deny, and their denial is unimpeached, that there was any agreement or understanding between them or either of them and the defendant J. H. Beatty that they would support his views in respect of the sale of his steamer to the company; they both, however, admit that, previously to the transfers of the shares to them, they considered that the purchase of the steamer would be beneficial to the company, that they accepted the transfers with the view of becoming directors, and that the defendant was well aware of the opinions and views entertained by them. Indeed, the defendant Rose states that he would not have joined the company but for the intention to purchase the steamer.

By the transfers to the defendants Rose and Laird the number of shares held by the defendant J. H. Beatty was reduced to 291, but the united voting power of the three last-named defendants was such that they could command a majority at any meeting of the shareholders.

Though there was a discussion, at the annual meeting on the 7th of February, as to the expediency of purchasing the steamer, the resolution, directing a bye-law to be prepared, appears to have been passed without any division.

At the meeting of directors of the 10th the same three defendants were in a position to carry any resolution or to pass any bye-law upon which they were agreed.

At the shareholders' meeting of the 16th the voting was as follows:—

For the confirmation of the bye-law—

	Votes.
The defendant J. H. Beatty	291
The defendant J. E. Rose	5
The defendant R. Laird	5
The defendant William Beatty	5
Total	306

Against the confirmation—

	Votes.
John C. Graham	39
F. L. Hankey	71
The plaintiff	120
The defendant John D. Beatty	59
Total	289

It follows that the majority of votes in favour of the confirmation of the bye-law was due to the votes of the defendant J. H. Beatty.

These last-mentioned facts were stated by the plaintiff in his claim in the action, and he not only insisted that the defendant J. H. Beatty was in such a fiduciary relation to the company that it was not competent for him, under any circumstances, to enter into the contract for the sale of his steamer to the company, but he made various charges of fraud and collusion against the defendant directors, other than the defendant J. D. Beatty, who was also the secretary of the company.

These charges of fraud and collusion were abandoned at the trial of the action, but the facts before referred to were pressed upon the judges, before whom, in succession, the action came, and afforded to those judges, who were of opinion that the sale should be set aside, the substantial grounds for their decisions.

The action first came on to be heard before the Chancellor of Ontario, who, on the 6th of May, 1884, ordered the sale to be set aside, with the usual consequential directions. All charges of fraud and collusion being discarded, the Chancellor treated the question as one of "purely equitable law," and held that the threefold character of director, shareholder, and vendor, sustained by the defendant J. H. Beatty, involved a conflict between duty and interest, and that, being so circumstanced, he could not be permitted, in the conduct of the company's affairs, to exercise the balance of power which he possessed, to the possible prejudice of the other shareholders.

The defendants appealed against the order of the Chancellor, and on the 17th of April, 1885, the Court of Appeal of Ontario allowed the appeal, and ordered that the plaintiff's bill should be dismissed with costs. In the opinion of the members of that court the resolution to purchase the steamer was a pure question of internal management, and the shareholders had a perfect right either to ratify the act of the directors or to treat the matter as an original offer to themselves, and to assent to and complete the purchase.

From the order of the Court of Appeal the plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, and on the 9th of April, 1886, the Supreme Court reversed the order of the Court of Appeal and affirmed that of the Chancellor. It appears to have been the opinion of the judges of the Supreme Court that the case turned entirely on the fiduciary character of the defendant J. H. Beatty as a director; that if the acts or transactions of an interested director were to be confirmed by the shareholders it should be by an exercise of the impartial, independent, and intelligent judgment of disinterested shareholders and not by the votes of the interested director, who ought never to have departed from his duty; that the course pursued by the defendant J. H. Beatty was an oppressive proceeding on his part; and that, consequently, the vote of the shareholders at the meeting of the 16th of February, 1883, was ineffectual to confirm the bye-law which had been enacted by the directors. The nature of the transaction itself does not appear to have been taken into consideration by the judges in their decision of the case.

From this decision of the Supreme Court of Canada the appeal has been brought with which their lordships have now to deal. The question involved is doubtless novel in its circumstances, and the decision important in its consequences; it would be very undesirable even to appear to relax the rules relating to dealings between trustees and their beneficiaries; on the other hand, great confusion would be introduced into the affairs of joint stock companies if the circumstances of shareholders, voting in that character at general meetings, were to be examined, and their votes practically nullified, if they also stood in some fiduciary relation to the company.

It is clear upon the authorities that the contract entered into by the directors on the 10th of February could not have been enforced against the company at the instance of the defendant J. H. Beatty, but it is equally clear that it was within the competency of the shareholders at the meeting of the 16th to adopt or reject it. In form and in terms they adopted it by a majority of votes, and the vote of the majority must prevail, unless the adoption was brought about by unfair or improper means.

The only unfairness or impropriety, which, consistently with the admitted and established facts, could be suggested, arises out of the fact that the defendant J. H. Beatty possessed a voting power as a shareholder, which enabled him, and those who thought with him, to adopt the bye-law, and thereby either to ratify and adopt a voidable contract, into which he, as a director, and his co-directors had entered, or to make a similar contract, which latter seems to have been what was intended to be done by the resolution passed on the 7th of February.

It may be quite right that, in such a case, the opposing minority should be able, in a suit like this, to challenge the transaction, and to show that it is an improper one, and to be freed from the objection that a suit with such an object can only be maintained by the company itself.

But the constitution of the company enabled the defendant J. H. Beatty to acquire this voting power; there was no limit upon the number of shares which a shareholder might hold, and for every share so held he was entitled to a vote; the charter itself recognized the defendant as a holder of 200 shares, one-third of the aggregate number; he had a perfect right to acquire further shares, and to exercise his voting power in such a manner as to secure the election of directors whose views upon policy agreed with his own, and to support those views at any shareholders' meeting; the acquisition of The United Empire was a pure question of policy, as to which it might be expected that there would be differences of opinion, and upon which the voice of the majority ought to prevail; to reject the votes of the defendant upon the question of the adoption of the bye-law would be to give effect to the views of the minority, and to disregard those of the majority.

The judges of the Supreme Court appear to have regarded the exercise by the defendant J. H. Beatty of his voting power as of so oppressive a character as to invalidate the adoption of the bye-law; their lordships are unable to adopt this view; in their opinion the defendant was acting within his rights in voting as he did, though they agree with the Chief Justice in the views, expressed by him in the Court of Appeal, that the matter might have been conducted in a manner less likely to give rise to objection.

Their lordships will humbly advise her Majesty to allow the appeal; to discharge the order of the Supreme Court of Canada; and to dismiss the appeal to that court, with costs; the respondent must bear the costs of the present appeal.

From Chan. Div. Dec. 14, 17, 19, 20.

MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. v. ROBINSON. (a.)

Railway company—"Mines or minerals lying under railway"—Notice of intention to work—Open quarrying—Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 77, 78, 79.

An owner of mines or minerals lying under a railway who is desirous of working them, not as his own speculation, but through the medium of lessees, is a person entitled, under section 78 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, to give notice of intention to work the same.

To justify an owner giving such a notice, there must be not merely an expression of desire, but an honest actual existence of the desire to work, either by himself or his lessees, the mines or minerals.

The words "mines" and "minerals," as used in section 77 and the following sections of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, extend to open quarries and to minerals got by open quarrying.

Midland Railway Co. v. Haunchwood Brick and Tile Co., 30 W. R. 640, 20 Ch. D. 552, approved.

Appeal from Chitty, J.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was for an injunction to restrain the defendant, Sir F. Robinson, from working minerals under or adjoining a line of railway worked by the plaintiff company so as to injure the railway of the plaintiff company.

The defendant was the owner of land through which about a mile and a half of the railway passed. The land, both under and adjoining the railway, contained ironstone, limestone, and brick clay.

The defendant was the owner in possession of the minerals under the railway and of the minerals under a portion of the land adjoining the railway. The minerals under the remaining portion of the lands adjoining the railway line had been leased by the defendant to a colliery company, but with right of access to the defendant across or through the lands so demised, to the minerals under the railway.

On January 25, 1886, the defendant served a written notice on the railway company that he was desirous of working the mines and minerals under the railway and adjoining thereto as set out in the plan annexed thereto, and that it was his intention to work them after the expiration of thirty days. Negotiations with the railway company ensued, but fell through; and the railway company then instituted this action, and on October 28, 1887, moved for an injunction till the hearing. Chitty, J., refused the application.

The plaintiff company appealed.

Rigby, Q.C., Sir A. Watson, Q.C., and Phipson Beale, for the appellant company.—The defendant, at the time of giving the notice, was not in a position to give the notice, for at that time there had been no investigation as to whether the minerals were or were not available; it was not till some time after the 25th of January that the defendant began to sink bore-holes. The mere expression of a desire at some day or other to work minerals somewhere or other is not sufficient. The notice here given is too general; it ought to have been confined to certain definite parts of the land intended to be worked, and not to extend over an area of two miles: Smith v. Directors of Great Western Railway Co., 26 W. R. 130, 3 App. Cas. 165. The word "mines" in section 78 does not include "quarries": Dixon v. Caledonian Railway Co., 29 W. R. 249, 5 App. Cas. 820. The decision of Kay, J., in Midland Railway Co. v. Haunchwood Brick and Tile Co., 30 W. R. 640, 20 Ch. D. 552, has not been sanctioned in any case by the Court of Appeal, and the point is now before the House of Lords.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Romer, Q.C., and Percy Gye, for the respondent.—The landowner is not bound to limit his notice to a particular part of the land intended to be worked; that would entail the giving of separate notices for each part as he went to work. A notice that the owner is prepared to work the whole seam or bed of minerals underlying the railway is sufficient and proper. The railway company are not embarrassed, in fact. They are entitled, without having to pay compensation, to whatever minerals they dig, carry away, and use in the construction of the line, and they are also entitled to support from subjacent minerals until the owner gives notice of his intention to work them and to claim compensation: Great Western Railway Co. v. Bennett, 15 W. R. 647, L. R. 2 H. L. 27; Locomotive v. Tiverton and North Devon Railway Co., 31 W. R. 130, 22 Ch. D. 25; Smith v. Directors of Great Western Railway Co. The defendant was the proper person to give the notice, as he was the owner of the minerals under the railway; the colliery company, to whom part of the adjacent lands were demised, were neither owners, lessees, or occupiers of the minerals under the railway.

Rigby, Q.C., replied.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an appeal by the Midland Railway Co., the plaintiffs, against a decision of Chitty, J., who refused to grant them an injunction to restrain the defendant from working minerals under their line. I say "minerals," and I will deal with the question of what is meant by that word afterwards.

Under the 77th and following sections of the Railways Clauses Act it has been established that a railway company, when they give notice to buy land, do not buy any right of support from minerals under the surface. If they want to get them they may get them, but if the owner is desirous of working the minerals he is not to have them taken away, and the right of working them taken away, without compensation being given under section 6 of the Act and under the provisions of sections 78 and 79. It has been decided that the railway company is not bound to give their notice under section 78 of their desire or intention to purchase within thirty days. They may give that at any time. They may postpone their intention of purchasing on the owner giving notice of his intention to work until the support which would be taken away by working becomes to them a practical question. That is very important, because, if they were bound within thirty days, once for all, to make up their minds as to whether they would buy or not, questions would arise which, in my opinion, do not arise here. Also, as far as I can see, the railway company, if they think it advisable, may give notice to the landowner to buy one plot at one time and another plot at another time—that is to say, to buy the minerals in that portion which there is an immediate danger of his working, and they might afterwards, when he is coming near to work another portion, give another notice of their intention to buy that.

The question raised here is, Was there any intention or desire on the part of the defendant to work the mines within the meaning of this section, and had he the right to express such a desire? It is said that no one but an owner, lessee, or occupier who is intending to work personally—i.e., by his servants and those who are merely acting for him—could give such a notice, and that an owner of minerals who is not desirous of working as his own speculation, but desirous of having the mine worked by a lessee, cannot give such a notice. A great part of the argument in this case turns upon that, but in my opinion the contention of the railway company is wrong. What are the words here? "If the owner, lessee, or occupier of any mines or minerals lying under the railway . . . or within forty yards therefrom, be desirous of working the same, such owner, lessee, or occupier shall give to the company notice in writing of his intention so to do." There is nothing there in my opinion to restrict an owner giving notice unless he intends by his own servants and his own agents to work it. If he intends to do it in the way which is usually adopted by owners, by letting it to the lessees, who will work, rendering him a royalty or rent, in my opinion he is a person who, being deprived of that right and deprived of that mode of employing his land, would be entitled to compensation under section 6, and comes within the terms of this clause as an owner who is desirous of working. To hold the contrary would be to prejudice owners of mines under or near a railway, because a man cannot make arrangements for letting a mine unless he is able to assure those who are offering to take that they can work it if they take a lease; but if he does not know whether the railway company will exercise their right or whether they will allow it to be worked by him or his lessees it is impossible for him to enter into any arrangement with persons who are willing to work and to lay out, as is often necessary, large sums of money in order to enable them to work profitably the minerals of which they are lessees.

In my opinion the defendant had a right to give the notice of his desire to work by his lessees, and on the evidence it is clearly established that he was desirous of so working, and that there was a strong probability of his being able to let it even at the time when he gave this notice. I quite agree that there must be not merely an expression of desire, but an honest actual existence of the desire to work, either by himself or his lessees, to justify an owner in giving such a notice. If he gave the notice when it was obvious either that there were no minerals or that he could not possibly intend either to let them or work them himself, that would be vexatious, and the court would not allow that to be acted upon. If it was acted upon it is very true the railway company might be put to some expense in arbitrations unless they made an offer of rather more than nothing, which is probably what the arbitrator would give if there were no minerals or no possibility of working them. If it appeared the notice was a mere vexatious one, that would not be a notice of a desire to work within the meaning of this section.

Then it is said that this does not apply to limestone or ironstone, which, according to the ordinary course of working, would be properly worked by quarrying. That is to say, that these sections do not except or apply to anything which can be properly worked according to the practice of the country by open quarrying. I cannot accede to that. Let us look at the words of section 77: "The company shall not be entitled to any mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals under any land purchased by them." Slate, as a rule, is worked by open quarrying, and when one looks at that and considers how very often the word "mines" is not used strictly as indicating a working by means of underground cutting only, I think the meaning here is that the notice is to apply to all seams or veins of what is there referred to —coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals—which are in strata under the surface occupied by the railway. It may come up to the surface, and then it may be said that that portion which is actually on the surface is used for the purpose of the railway, and that would be comprised within their purchase. In my opinion those words—although the word "mines" is not used in a very strict and proper sense as regards working—are used here not to designate the mode of working, but that which is in seams or strata so as to be worked, whether by mines properly so called or by quarrying. Section 80 deals with there being strata under the line of railway when no mine is being worked under the railway. There it gives to the landowner power, if he is working his minerals, in carrying on his mining operations to make mines and openings under the line of railway; but that points, to my mind, to this, that the word "mines" is an inaccurate expression for minerals in strata, and does not define or restrict the mode of working to that mode of working which is properly called "mining" as distinct from quarrying. Therefore, in my opinion, that contention will not prevail.

Then it is said that the area covered by this notice is a great deal too large. In this case the extent seems to be about a mile and a half. I give no opinion as to what the result would be if the owner of twenty miles of land through which a railway went gave a general notice of this sort. It may be that the court would come to the conclusion that there was not an honest actual intention of working those minerals. But in an ordinary case all difficulty is got rid of in this way, that where the railway company know the owner is intending to work any particular portion of that which is included in his notice, they can at once, although the thirty days may have elapsed, give him a counter-notice and say that they are going to purchase the minerals in that portion. But in the present case, where they know well from the bore-holes where there are minerals and where there are not, it would be the most unwise thing in the world for the company to divide the land comprised in the notice, and say "We give you a counter-notice as between A. and B., but we leave the rest, though you may afterwards find out something there which you intend to work." It would be much better for them to deal with the matter, and to have the expense of one arbitration with the possibility that they may have made an offer that will quite satisfy the arbitrator that they have offered more than enough. In my opinion that objection cannot prevail. If the landowner proceeded to open a mine under the railway in a place where it was obvious there could be no minerals—no ironstone or limestone—which could be worked, in my opinion a court of equity would very properly hold that what was done was done, not in pursuance of an honest desire to work, but merely maliciously in order to embarrass the railway company. If the court came to that conclusion it would be right in granting an injunction to restrain interference with the railway, not for the purpose of working, but for the mere purpose of embarrassing the railway company. In my opinion this appeal fails.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The questions raised are undoubtedly important. What are the facts of the case? [The Lord Justice referred to the facts as above stated, and continued:—] The presence of minerals not being open to doubt, the question is, What is the effect of the notice served by Sir Frederick Robinson on the 25th of January, 1886? I will allude first of all to the argument of Sir Arthur Watson, that the ironstone in this part of the country is usually got by quarrying as distinguished from mining, and that Sir F. Robinson is not entitled to give notice, inasmuch as section 77 and the subsequent sections do not apply to quarries or to minerals usually got by quarrying. This point has arisen and been discussed before, and there is admittedly one decision—Midland Railway Co. v. Haunchwood Brick and Tile Co.—in which it was held that the construction contended for by Sir Arthur Watson was inaccurate. It is said that that point is now before the House of Lords. If so I am sorry we have not got the decision of the House of Lords to guide us, but in the absence of that guide we must do the best we can upon the language of the Act and the authorities as they stand.

There are indications which show that that argument is untenable, and in particular I refer to and rely upon the express mention of slate in section 77. It is common knowledge that slate, at all events, is got as often by quarrying as by mining; and when we find the word slate in connection with the other words it seems to me that the correct view of the section is, that it extends to minerals which may be got by open quarrying as well as subterranean mining, and therefore that Sir Arthur Watson's contention is untenable.

The next point is whether Sir F. Robinson's notice is bad on the ground that he had no intention to work the mines. His position is this—he has not let the minerals in question and he has not granted to any occupier or other person a licence to get them; he is, in fact, the owner of them, and he is personally in the position of having a present right to work them if he chooses. It is said that he had no intention to work them himself. I cannot find any words in section 78 which required that the owner should work them himself. The contention is, that he is to work them by his servants and agents as distinguished from lessees or licensees. I see no reason for so holding. There being no lease and no licence to get the minerals he is the only person at present interested in them, and one way in which a person desirous of working mines can do so is by letting them, if he can, or by granting licences as distinguished from a lease of the mines. Any mode by which he can make the minerals productive to himself appears to me to be warranted by the clause in question. The construction that the owner cannot give notice unless he intends working the mines himself as contradistinguished from working by lessees or licensees appears to me to be too narrow and not warranted by the language of the section.

Then it is said that if we uphold this notice we expose railways to dangers never contemplated by the Act, and that we should be enabling landowners to give general notices which would be excessively embarrassing. I was struck with this contention, but when examined it will be found to be incorrect. Suppose a landowner, when a railway company gives him notice to take his land, or soon afterwards, gives a general roving notice to the railway company of his intention to work the minerals, what is the position of the railway company? They may disregard the notice. If they think it frivolous they need not do anything. They have power of inspecting; they have power of ascertaining what it is desirable to do for the protection of their own interests.

If they come to the conclusion that the notice is seriously meant, and that the landowner really does intend to work the minerals, they can give him a counter-notice, and if you look at the words "any part thereof" in sections 78 and 79 it seems tolerably plain that they can limit the counter-notice to a portion only of the minerals referred to. Of course the consequence of so limiting their counter-notice would be that the landowner who had served a mere general notice can force them to give another notice if he is in a position really to work the minerals, but the railway company can judge of their own interests about that.

Then it is said that if we put this construction on these sections it will be competent for the landowner to give a general notice and do nothing, let the thirty days go by, and then at any time suddenly come down and work the mines. There is an obvious answer to that. If any landowner did act in that way, which is highly unreasonable, he would be exposed to the risk of being told that he never had had any bonâ fide intention of working, and that his notice was bad ab initio; or that, whether his notice was good or not in the first instance, he had abandoned it.

Looking at the evidence in this case it seems to me on the question of fact that Chitty, J., has taken a view which we cannot possibly depart from. He came to the conclusion on the evidence and after hearing the cross-examination of the witnesses that Sir F. Robinson, when he gave the notice, intended bonâ fide to work; and I think he did. Of course Sir F. Robinson foresaw that if he was in a position to work, the railway company would be forced to give a counter-notice and compensate him; but it appears to me that if the railway company were to stand on their strict rights and decline to compensate him he was in a position to work these minerals, which were there to be worked. The only remedy in this particular case for the railway company is to give the counter-notice and proceed under the Act to give him compensation.

LOPES, L.J.—This case raises very important questions under the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, s. 77 and the following sections, with regard to working mines. It is to be observed that section 6 must be read with these sections. It is said that these sections do not apply to ironstone and limestone or any minerals obtained by open quarrying. In my opinion that contention cannot be maintained. I think the word "minerals," as used in these sections, applies to minerals whether they are won by open quarrying or by underground working. If that were not so many minerals won by open quarrying would pass by the conveyance to the company, and, therefore, would have to be taken into consideration in assessing the compensation in the first instance, a thing which we know never happens. In my opinion the true construction of section 77 and the following sections is this.

I think that the provision that the minerals are not to pass by the conveyance to the company is a provision in favour of the company—that the company is not to be compelled in the first instance to enter into a long and difficult question as to the existence or value of minerals which may not exist at all, or, if they exist, are not capable of being commercially worked—and shows an intention that the company shall be entitled to the adjacent and subjacent support afforded by the minerals until the owner shall give a notice of his desire to work the minerals. Section 78 provides that the owner may, if desirous of working the minerals, give a thirty days' notice of his desire to work them. That I take it means a bonâ fide desire, not merely a capricious one, without any reasonable grounds for believing that minerals exist. The company, on receiving this notice, if they apprehend danger to their railway, may give a counter-notice of their willingness to compensate; and then the company has it in its own power at any moment to secure the support afforded by these minerals to its railway. Upon this counter-notice being given the parties may go to arbitration or go before a jury, and I do not see that the company are prejudiced by this; because, if there are no minerals, or the minerals are not commercially workable, then the owner will obtain no compensation. Moreover, if the company make a reasonable offer in respect of the minerals, and the offer is not exceeded, then the owner will have to pay all the costs incurred by him in going before an arbitrator or a jury.

It is said that the expression "Owner who is desirous of working the minerals" must refer to an owner who intends to work them by his own enterprise, and not to an owner who intends to work them by means of granting a licence, a set, or a lease, which are the usual modes by which owners realize their minerals. I cannot adopt that contention. It appears to me that the owner is entitled to work them, if he thinks fit, as a private enterprise of his own, or he is entitled to let them to others and to obtain from those others a royalty, and thereby to realise the value of his minerals.

With respect to the bonâ fide intention of Sir F. Robinson to work these minerals the evidence is strong. Beyond all question valuable minerals exist on this property, and that fact raises a strong presumption that there is a bonâ fide intention and desire on the part of the owner to work them. It was also suggested that the notice was too large, that the land in question extended for nearly two miles, and that the notice, therefore, was an embarrassing notice to the company. I do not see that difficulty, because, in the first place, I think that it is open to the company, when they give their counter-notice, to confine it to any such portions of the land in the extent of the two miles as they think fit. Then they may go to arbitration or to a jury to assess the value of the minerals within that particular area. No doubt the company would then be exposed to this, that the owner, if he thought fit, might commence operations in other parts of the line. It is suggested that workmen might come down surreptitiously and suddenly let down the line. In the first place people cannot come down upon the line in the way suggested without being observed, and in the next place I think that if anything of that kind were done the persons who did it, if any persons were killed, would expose themselves to an indictment for manslaughter; and over and above that I think the company might at once come to the court, and that the court would interfere and prevent such proceedings. For these reasons I think Chitty, J., was right, and that his decision should be affirmed.

Judgment debt—Interest—Insolvent debtor—Surplus in hands of assignee after payment of principal of all debts—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 17, 92.

The effect of section 17 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 is that interest at the rate of four per cent. is a debt necessarily attached to every judgment debt, and recoverable at law as a debt; and the judgment creditor is not confined to the remedy by way of execution mentioned in the section.

Therefore, where, in the case of a deceased insolvent debtor who became insolvent before 1869, a sum of money subsequently came to the hands of the assignee, out of which the principal of all the debts entered in the debtor's schedule was paid, it was held that the judgment debts were not satisfied within the meaning of section 92 (since repealed) of that Act until interest was paid, and the assignee was ordered to pay interest before handing over any surplus to the representatives of the insolvent.

Appeal from the refusal of Mr. Registrar Giffard to make an order for the payment of interest on a judgment debt.

On the 23rd of February, 1844, Charles Lewis obtained a judgment against Horatio Clagett for £365. In January, 1845, Clagett, being in prison for debt, took the benefit of the Insolvency Acts, and applied by petition for his discharge. He obtained his discharge under the provisions of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and an order was made vesting all his property in a provisional assignee. He also executed a warrant of attorney, authorizing judgment to be entered up against him for the amount of the debts stated in the schedule. Lewis's judgment debt was entered in the schedule, the amount of principal then due being £329. Clagett died in 1880, and shortly afterwards a reversionary interest in certain property having fallen in, the assignee recovered on behalf of the estate, by an action in the Chancery Division, the sum of £26,000. The executors of Lewis, who had died in 1864, were paid the principal of the judgment debt, and it was admitted that there was sufficient in the hands of the assignee to pay the principal of all the debts and leave a surplus. The executors claimed interest at four per cent. on the judgment debt from the date of the judgment. The registrar refused to make an order for payment of interest. The executors appealed.

Section 17 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 enacts that "Every judgment debt shall carry interest at the rate of four pounds per centum per annum from the time of entering up judgment until the same shall be satisfied, and such interest may be levied under a writ of execution on such judgment."

Section 92 (repealed by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 83) enacted that if it should appear to the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors that, after the debts of an insolvent debtor had been discharged and satisfied, there remained any suplus in the possession of the assignee, it should be lawful for the said court to order that such surplus should be vested in the insolvent debtor.

The question was whether the executors were entitled to have interest on the judgment debt paid to them before the surplus was handed over to the personal representatives of the insolvent.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case there is an estate in insolvency, which in the result has produced a surplus in the hands of the assignee. There is a judgment debt which was entered in the debtor's schedule; the debt itself has, in a sense, been satisfied, but interest on that debt has not been satisfied. We are asked to say that the judgment creditor is to be paid that interest before anything is handed back to the insolvent debtor. The Act says that interest shall be paid. But it is said that section 92 is so worded that the surplus must be handed back without interest being paid. Section 92 only applies where there is a surplus; it says that if, "after the debts of the insolvent have been discharged and satisfied," there shall be a surplus, the court may make an order vesting the surplus in the insolvent. What are the debts there referred to? It is not necessary to decide whether the section applies to debts not named in the schedule, but it certainly does apply to debts which are. That raises the question, Is this interest a debt named in the schedule? This depends on the true meaning of section 17. Now that section does not say in terms that interest shall be part of a judgment debt, but it says that every judgment debt shall carry interest at four per cent. until the same shall be satisfied. What does that impose on the debtor? It seems to me to impose a statutory obligation to pay interest for every day after judgment. But a statutory duty to pay money reduces that money to a debt. You can always sue on a statutory obligation to pay money. Therefore this interest is a debt. It is not necessary to say that it is part of the judgment debt; it is enough to say that it is a debt necessarily and inevitably attached to the judgment debt if not paid immediately. Therefore, whether part of the judgment debt or not, we may say that it is a debt mentioned in the schedule. And it is obvious that it has not been satisfied. Consequently I am of opinion that the surplus in the hands of the assignee ought not to be handed back till the interest is paid, and that this appeal must be allowed.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The word "satisfied" occurs in both section 17 and section 92. The effect of section 17 is that in order to satisfy a judgment debt you must pay principal and interest up to the time of payment. The original debt is merged in the judgment, and the judgment debt carries interest till satisfied. Then section 92 says that the surplus may be handed back when all the debts are discharged and satisfied. Has this debt been satisfied? No; it is not satisfied till interest is paid. Therefore I think this appeal must be allowed.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It has been argued that the effect of section 17 is limited by the last words—"and such interest may be levied under a writ of execution on such judgment"; that unless it is recovered by execution it can never be recovered at all. But the section itself prevents our adopting that view. The judgment debt is to carry interest. The meaning seems to be this—that the judgment debt is to bear interest, as it were like a tree bears fruit, the interest to be a legal liability accruing de die in diem from the time when judgment is entered up till payment. The section, in addition, gives the judgment creditor a remedy by execution; but I think it is open to him to recover the interest in any way known to the law for recovering debts like this. It may be recovered by a substantive action of debt. It is an obligation in the nature of debt, annexed and tied to the judgment debt by statute, and the judgment debt is not satisfied until it is satisfied in such a way as to put an end to the obligation to pay interest as well as principal.

Leek Improvement Commissioners v. Justices for the County of Stafford. (a.)

Highway—Maintenance of main road—Liability of county authority — Macadamized road subsequently paved—Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 13.

The plaintiffs, having paved with stone setts a road in their highway district which was formerly a macadamized road, sought to recover from the county authority under section 13 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, one-half of the expenses of such paving.

Held, that a different kind of road had been made, and that therefore the plaintiffs had not "maintained" the road, and could not recover against the county authority.

Appeal from the decision of Huddleston, B.

The plaintiffs claim was for £102 18s. under section 13 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, being one-half of the expenses incurred by them in paving a certain main road between the Leek railway station and the town of Leek, in the Leek Highway District in the county of Stafford. The plaintiffs were the highway authority for the Leek Highway District and the defendants were the county authority for the county of Stafford.

By section 13 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), any road which has between the 31st of December, 1870, and the date of the passing of this Act ceased to be a turnpike road, and any road which, being at the time of the passing of this Act a turnpike road, may afterwards cease to be such, shall be deemed to be a main road, and one-half of the expenses incurred from and after the 29th of September, 1878, by the highway authority in the maintenance of such road shall, as to every part thereof which is within the limits of any highway area, be paid to the highway authority of such area by the county authority of the county in which such road is situate, out of the county rate, on the certificate of the surveyor of the county authority, or of such other person or persons as the county authority may appoint, to the effect that such main road has been maintained to his or their satisfaction.

The defendants contended that the expense of paving the road in question was not an expense reasonably or necessarily incurred in the maintenance of the road within the meaning of the section. Huddleston, B., gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and John Rose, for the plaintiffs.—The traffic over the road in question is very heavy. It was therefore both reasonable and economical to pave it. A road is maintained when it is made suitable to the traffic which passes over it. Maintenance does not exclude reasonable improvement in the structure of the road.

They referred to Reg. v. Inhabitants of Claxby, 5 W. R. 451, 24 L. J. Q. B. 223; Reg. v. High Holden, 1 F. & F. 678; Sevenoaks Railway Co. v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 27 W. R. 672, 11 Ch. D. 625.

Jelf, Q.C., Reddam, and R. B. D. Acland, for the defendants, were not called upon to argue.

Lord Esher, M.R.—I think that in this case we must construe the Act in the manner in which we usually construe Acts of Parliament, by giving the ordinary plain English signification to the words used, having regard to the subject-matter of the Act. The Act speaks of roads, but not in the sense of their being rights of way. It does not refer to the way in which the road is to be used, but it refers to the structure of the road and to the way in which it is made. The Legislature speaks of the maintenance of the road. That means the maintenance of the structure of the road.

The road in question was a macadamized road, and, in my opinion, as long as it remained so it must be maintained at the joint expense of the highway district and of the county, as provided by this Act. Of course, as the traffic over the road increased, the road would become more worn, and would need to be repaired more frequently. If the road had originally been made with soft stone, and was repaired with a harder kind of stone, as long as it remained a macadamized road I think that it would be "maintained" within the meaning of this section. Its structure would not be altered, and it would still be a macadamized road.

But there is a vast difference between a macadamized road and a paved road. They are two entirely distinct classes of roads. Therefore I think that, if where there has formerly been a macadamized road a paved road is substituted, the macadamized road can no longer be said to be maintained, since a new road has, in fact, been constructed. The character of the road has been altered, and the old macadamized road has been taken away. That cannot be a maintenance of the road which is really a substitution of a new road for it. Therefore I think that the Improvement Commissioners cannot call upon the county to pay half the expense of the paving under this Act. I agree with the decision of Huddleston, B., and I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

Bowen, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The only question for us is whether the county authorities are bound to pay one-half of the costs of paving this road. We have to say whether the paving of the road was a maintenance of the road as to enable the plaintiffs to recover under the Act one-half of the expenses from the county.

That the plaintiffs have maintained the road in one sense must be admitted to be true, but they have done more than that. Section 13 of the Act, by which the plaintiffs seek to recover their expenses, after saying that one-half of the expenses incurred by the highway authority in the maintenance of such a road shall be paid by the county authority, goes on:—"The term expenses in this section shall mean the cost of repairs defrayed out of current rates."

Now, although the cost of paving this road was paid out of the current rates, yet in paving the road instead of repairing it a good deal more was done than was contemplated by the section, and I therefore think that the plaintiffs cannot be said to have maintained the road within the meaning of the section, and cannot succeed as against the county authorities.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the word "maintenance" as used in this section is in effect the same as "repair." The section deals with disturnpiked roads and the expenses of their maintenance. I take that to mean the maintenance or repair of such roads as they then existed. Repair means doing that which is reasonably proper and necessary to the character of the road and for the traffic passing over such a road. But to say that when a paved road is substituted for a macadamized road the macadamized road is maintained and repaired is as repugnant to the ordinary meaning of the language as to say that Augustus repaired Rome when he found it brick and left it marble, or to say that a man when he buys a new coat is repairing his old one. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must fail.

Ex parte Woodhall. (a.)

Practice—Extradition crime—Habeas corpus—Appeal—"Criminal cause or matter"—Jurisdiction—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 47.

No appeal lies from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division upon an application for a writ of habeas corpus in the case of a fugitive criminal committed to prison under the Extradition Act, 1870, with a view to his surrender to a foreign country, as the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division is a "judgment in a criminal cause or matter" within section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873.

Appeal from the refusal of the Queen's Bench Division to grant a rule nisi for a writ of habeas corpus.

The applicant, Alice Woodhall, was arrested in England under the Extradition Act, 1870, as a fugitive criminal, charged with having committed forgery in New York. She was brought before the chief magistrate at Bow-street Police-court, who committed her to prison under section 10 of the Extradition Act, 1870, with a view to her surrender to the United States of America. A motion was made on her behalf in the Queen's Bench Division for a rule nisi for a writ of habeas corpus upon the ground that the magistrate had refused to hear evidence on her behalf. The Queen's Bench Division refused to grant a rule.

Finlay, Q.C. (David with him), moved by way of appeal for a rule nisi for a writ of habeas corpus.—The first question is whether this court has jurisdiction to entertain this appeal. Section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873, provides that "no appeal shall lie from any judgment of the said High Court in any criminal cause or matter, save for some error of law apparent upon the record," &c. That means a judgment in the course of a criminal cause or matter. An application for a writ of habeas corpus is not made in the course of a criminal cause or matter: it is entirely collateral to the criminal proceeding. A writ of habeas corpus, as in Ex parte Bell Cox, ante, p. 209, 20 Q. B. D. 1, may be granted in all sorts of cases, and it would be most inconvenient to apply one rule as to appeal to one case and a different rule to another case. It is further submitted that the words "criminal cause or matter" in section 47 only apply to cases triable in England. Hence section 47 does not apply, and an appeal lies under section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873.

He referred to Reg. v. Steel, 25 W. R. 34, 2 Q. B. D. 37; Reg. v. Fletcher, 25 W. R. 149, 2 Q. B. D. 43; Reg. v. Foote, 31 W. R. 490, 10 Q. B. D. 378; and Reg. v. Justices of the Central Criminal Court, 35 W. R. 243, 18 Q. B. D. 314.

Lord Esher, M.R.—An application was made to the Divisional Court for a rule nisi for a writ of habeas corpus with respect to a person in custody, who had been arrested and brought before a magistrate and committed by him to prison under the Extradition Act, 1870, for the purpose of being sent to the United States. The Divisional Court came to a certain decision upon that application, and an appeal has been brought to this court. The question, therefore, arises whether we have jurisdiction to hear the appeal. It is urged that the decision was not a judgment in a criminal cause or matter within the latter clause of section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873. Those words have been before the Court of Appeal on several previous occasions, and in Reg. v. Weil, 31 W. R. 60, 9 Q. B. D. 701, the court declined to give an opinion upon the very point now before us, holding that, even if there was jurisdiction, the appeal must be dismissed. In the present case, however, we think that we ought not to flinch from deciding the question of jurisdiction.

Upon looking at all the cases, they seem to me to point to this, that the words "criminal cause or matter" are to receive as wide an interpretation as can reasonably be given to them. This court is a court of appeal in civil matters only, and was not intended to be a court of appeal in matters of a criminal nature. Those words have been considered in several cases, but I desire to refer especially to the case of Reg. v. Fletcher. There the Queen's Bench Division discharged a rule for a certiorari to bring up a summary conviction of justices for the purpose of quashing it on the ground of want of jurisdiction, and this court held that that was a judgment of the High Court in a criminal matter, and that no appeal lay. Mellish, L.J., said:—"In Reg. v. Steel we held that clause was not confined, as was contended, to the High Court when sitting as the court to hear points reserved in criminal cases, but extended to all criminal cases in the High Court, and therefore to criminal cases in the Queen's Bench Division. The question here is somewhat wider, whether the exemption from appeal extends to a proceeding in the Queen's Bench Division, which might be said to be not strictly a criminal proceeding in that court, but was a proceeding taken in that court for the purpose of quashing a conviction before justices, which was clearly a criminal proceeding. Was that proceeding in the Queen's Bench Division a proceeding in a criminal matter?" He goes on to answer that question in the affirmative. I myself, in giving judgment in that case, said:—"In the present case it is said that judgment must be confined to a judgment in a criminal cause or matter in the High Court itself, and does not extend to a proceeding in a case which has not its inception in the High Court. I cannot agree to that. I should read the clause as meaning no appeal shall lie from any decision of the High Court by way of judgment in any criminal cause or matter. Is not this a decision by way of judgment?" I must now try whether, for the purposes of this case, I cannot express my meaning in different language. In my opinion the last clause of section 47 applies to any decision by way of judicial determination of any question raised in or with regard to proceedings the subject-matter of which is criminal, at whatever stage of the proceedings the question arises. The decision of the High Court in this case was a decision by way of judicial determination of a question raised with regard to proceedings the subject-matter of which was criminal, as the proceedings before the magistrate were taken for the purpose of having the accused surrendered for trial in the United States. The subject-matter of the proceedings before the magistrate was, therefore, criminal, and the case comes within the last clause of section 47, and the judgment of the Divisional Court was a "judgment in a criminal cause or matter." It does not follow from our decision that this court has not jurisdiction to hear an appeal in any case of habeas corpus. If the subject-matter is criminal there is no appeal; if not criminal, there is an appeal. Our decision is that we have no jurisdiction to hear this appeal.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It seems to me, whether we regard the language of section 47 or the series of decisions upon that language, that the case is perfectly clear. In Reg. v. Steel the construction of the last clause of section 47 came in question, and the doubt which was put an end to in that case is thus stated by Mellish, L.J.:—"By section 19 of the Act of 1873 the Court of Appeal has jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals from any judgment or order of the High Court of Justice. These are the general words on which the appellants rely as giving them the right of appeal in the present case. But it is save as hereinafter mentioned, and the respondents rely on section 47 as excepting all criminal matters, whereas the appellants say section 47 only applies to the Court for Crown Cases Reserved. I am of opinion that the section has the effect the respondents contend for, and that it does more than take away an appeal from the judgment of the High Court when sitting as a court for Crown cases reserved." He then referred to the last clause of section 47 and said:—"Are you to confine this to the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, or is it general, extending the exception or exemption from appeal to all criminal causes or matters? I am clearly of opinion that it is general; and then the saving clause was necessary to retain the former right of appeal for error on the record. If this were not so there would be an appeal from the Court of Queen's Bench, not only on every judgment, but on any order in a criminal case. The intention of the latter part of section 47 was to prevent this; and there appears no reason, but the contrary, why the words, no appeal shall lie from any judgment of the said High Court in any criminal cause or matter, should be confined, as the appellants contend, to the High Court when sitting as a court for Crown cases reserved." That decision in 1876 has been observed ever since. We have to consider whether the present application to the Queen's Bench Division is not an application in a criminal cause or matter. The object of the application was to enable the accused to be relieved from prosecution upon a criminal charge, and from being sent to America to take her trial. I confess it seems to me plain that that is an application in a criminal cause or matter, and that we have no jurisdiction to entertain this appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division upon that application. It does not follow that we have not jurisdiction to entertain an appeal in other cases of habeas corpus.

BOWEN, L.J.—I think that in this case we ought to decide the question of jurisdiction in the interests of the administration of justice, and not upon the merits. Whether or not there is jurisdiction to hear this appeal depends upon whether the judgment of the court below was a judgment in a criminal cause or matter within section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873. The judgment was pronounced upon an application to discharge a person from custody to which she had been committed by the magistrate under section 10 of the Extradition Act, 1870. Section 10 commences with words which direct that the proceedings were taken "in the case of a fugitive criminal accused of an extradition crime"—that is to say, a crime which, if committed in England, would be one of the crimes described in the first schedule to the Act. There was a foreign warrant authorising the arrest of the accused. The magistrates' duty, upon the accused being brought before him, was to decide whether there was sufficient evidence which would, according to the law of England, justify the committal for trial of the prisoner if the crime had been committed in England. That seems to me to be clearly a criminal matter. That being so, the application for a habeas corpus to discharge the accused from custody was made, and the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division thereon was pronounced, in a criminal matter, though the criminal matter did not have its inception in the High Court. In my opinion, therefore, the question is quite free from doubt, and we have no jurisdiction to entertain this appeal.

Income tax—Business in Australia—Partner resident in England—Liability for profits accruing abroad and not transmitted to England—16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, schedule D.

A partner in a firm carrying on business solely at Melbourne resided wholly in England. A portion of his share in the profits of the Melbourne business was transmitted to him in England and duly returned by him for assessment to income tax. The remainder of his share was left in Australia, and stood to his credit on the books of the firm. Having been assessed to income tax on the whole amount of his share of the profits, Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Stephen and Wills, JJ.), reported ante, p. 332, 19 Q. B. D. 400.

Mr. Henry Brooks, who resided solely in England, and carried on business here, was also a partner in the firm of Brooks, Robinson, & Co., of Melbourne, Australia, which was entirely distinct from his English business.

A certain portion of the profits made in the Australian business were annually transmitted to Mr. Brooks, and on that portion so received by him in England he had paid income tax. The remainder of the annual profits was placed to his credit in the books of the Australian firm, and was not transmitted to him in England. Mr. Brooks having been assessed on the whole amount of his share in the profits of the Melbourne firm, contended that he ought only to have been charged on so much of it as was actually received by him in England, and a case was stated by the Income Tax Commissioners under 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 59, for the opinion of the court.

The court were divided in opinion, Stephen, J., holding that Mr. Brooks was liable in respect of the whole share of the profits, and Wills, J., being of opinion that he was only liable in respect of that portion of the profits actually received by him in this country. Wills, J., as the junior judge, having withdrawn his judgment, Mr. Brooks appealed.

The arguments used were the same as in the court below.

The following additional cases were cited:—Attorney-General v. Alexander, 23 W. R. 255, L. R. 10 Ex. 20; Werle v. Colquhoun, ante, p. 613.

April 28.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—This case appears to me to be one of the highest importance. The appellant is a subject of the Queen, solely resident in England. He has a business which he carries on in England, and in respect of which he pays income tax He is also a partner in a business which is carried on in one of the colonies. That business is managed solely in the colony by his partners there, the appellant taking no part in the management, and the whole of that business is carried on outside the United Kingdom. Part of the proceeds of that business have from time to time been remitted to him in this country, and in respect of that part of the proceeds which he has actually received he has paid income tax. But it has been said that he is bound to pay income tax not only upon that part of the profits of the colonial business which he has received in this country, but also on the whole of the rest of his share of the profits of that business.

The question really depends upon the construction to be put upon schedule D. of section 2 of the Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34).

It is impossible to have words larger than those there used. The only condition appears to be that the person taxed must be a person residing in the United Kingdom. There is no limitation as to the time for which he must reside or as to the class of person so residing.

The words, if taken in their largest sense, apply to a foreigner just as much as to a servant of the Queen. It is this which, in my opinion, makes the case of such great importance. For, if the words are to be read in their fullest sense, any foreigner residing in this country for a time sufficient to make his stay a residence, would have to pay income tax for any kind of property whatever, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere. That is to say, although not a farthing of the income derived from that property is received in this country, and although that property is managed and carried on wholly outside this country, nevertheless, the mere fact of the owner of the property residing here will make that property liable to income tax. Let us take an instance—one which, as we know, is happening every day. Suppose an American who is carrying on an enormous business in the United States comes over here to reside for a year, as is not uncommon. He brings his family and takes a house in London or elsewhere—which is obviously sufficient to satisfy the term "residing"—for three months or for a longer period. Then if the words of this enactment are to be given their fullest meaning he is to be subject to income tax in respect of the whole of his American trade, no part of which may be with or from this country, and although he may be taking no part whatever in the management of that trade while he is resident here. He will have to subject the circumstances of that business to persons in England, who will have the right to require from him affidavits as to the profits of that business, and, for aught I know, will have the right to require him to produce the trade books and accounts for their inspection.

If such were the case I think this Government would receive a remonstrance from the Government of the United States—a remonstrance which they would find it hard to answer.

Such an inquiry and such a method of taxation would be absolutely contrary to the comity of nations.

Or, again, let us take some great Hungarian nobleman with enormous estates in Hungary. He comes to this country on a visit with his wife and family, and he takes a residence of his own for a time, such, for instance, as a moor in Scotland, and there he resides for awhile. His vast estate in Hungary is in the meantime managed by his stewards and people there. Can it be suggested that he must pay income tax while he resides here on the whole of that property, although no part of the proceeds of it are received in this country? Surely if such were the case we should have unanswerable remonstrances from every foreign Government. I think they would be unanswerable because this would be a most tyrannical and abnormal enactment with regard to matters with which this country has nothing to do. Now what is the rule of interpretation to be applied to an Act of Parliament which, by reason of its general words, produces such consequences as these? I take the rule to be this—that it cannot be supposed that the English Parliament, by reason of its having used general words, are attempting to do that which would be an outrage on the law and comity of nations, and which would lead to inevitable and unanswerable remonstrance.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It is true that if we should be perfectly certain that Parliament had intended to commit that which I deliberately stigmatize as an outrage, we, as mere administrators of the law, should be bound to carry it out, leaving it to the Government of the country to meet the consequences of such an enactment. But unless that is made perfectly clear, unless it appears from the direct words that the Legislature expressly intended to do this, I think we ought not so to construe the enactment. I think that we ought so to limit mere general words as to make them reasonable and proper. That is the ground on which I intend to decide this case.

Reliance was placed, both by Stephen, J., and in argument here, upon sections of the Act which specifically deal with the difference between things belonging to other countries and things belonging to this country, and upon the maxim expressio unius exclusio alterius, but I agree with Wills, J., in thinking that that is not a binding doctrine, but is only one which must be used where it is reasonable to use it.

I could, if I thought it advisable, show from the early part of schedule D. that the words "from any kind of property whatever" must be limited. The method of arriving at the annual value of landed property, for instance, by taking the rack rent value, would be inapplicable to foreign lands where, for aught we know, there are no such things as rack rents. So, too, as to foreign funds which must be included if the largest signification is given to these words, yet they are expressly dealt with by the Act which is incorporated with this. Nor do I think the words in "the United Kingdom or elsewhere" were intended to apply to colonies which have a separate parliament of their own or to foreign countries. I think they probably were intended to include only those outlying parts of the Queen's dominions over which Parliament has a right to exercise such powers. But, as I say, I deliberately abstain from entertaining such questions as these, because I desire to rest my judgment on the broad ground which I have stated before.

I agree, therefore, with Wills, J. I adopt all the reasons which he has given in his judgment, and I think the judgment which has been entered must be reversed.

FRY, L.J.—In this case I have the misfortune to differ from the Master of the Rolls, and to think that the decision of the Divisional Court expressed by Stephen, J., is the correct decision.

The question which we have to determine is this. Can a resident in the United Kingdom be charged with income tax in respect of the profits of a business in the colonies or a foreign country which profits belong to the resident, but have not been transmitted to him or received by him in this country? With regard to such portion of the profits as he had actually received in this country, he has, as I understand, been charged without question. The point arises with regard to profits accrued to him, but not received by him. To answer that question we must turn to the schedule D. of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, and we find there the intention to create a charge on the person for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom "from any kind of property, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere," to be charged at a certain rate. Then the same schedule goes on to provide or to create a charge "in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person whatever, whether a subject of her Majesty or not, although not resident in the United Kingdom, from any property whatever within the United Kingdom or any profession, trade, employment, or vocation exercised in the United Kingdom." Now I pause to make upon that schedule two or three observations.

In the first place it is upon "profits or gains arising or accruing." I cannot read those words to mean "received by." If they were limited to profits and gains "received," the limitations would apply equally to all her Majesty's subjects, and to all foreigners residing in the country. The result would be that no income tax would be payable upon profits which accrued, but which are not actually received, although such profits might both be earned and have accrued in the United Kingdom.

Now, in the next place, I wish to observe that the language of the statute is express. It is "from any profession, trade," and so forth, "whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere." What is the meaning of inserting that clause, except to indicate the mind of the Legislature that for the purpose of taxation it is immaterial whether the trade be carried on in the United Kingdom or in any part of the world outside the United Kingdom. "The United Kingdom or elsewhere," by its alternative description, includes the whole world, and those words can be introduced, it seems to me, for no purpose except to express the intention of the Legislature to charge persons resident in this country with profits derived from any trade carried on in any part of the world.

It will be observed that the whole scope of schedule D. is this: If the person be within the United Kingdom, then he is to be charged in respect of profits accruing or arising in any part of the world, and, if the profits arise from a business or property within the United Kingdom, then it is to be deducted from any person, though he may reside in any part of the world.

The two branches of the schedule are aimed, the one at the person residing or to whom the accrual of profit arises, the other at the thing from which the profits accrue, and I cannot help coming to the conclusion that not merely are profits arising in a foreign country within the words, but they are within the emphatically-expressed meaning of this section.

It may not be, perhaps, immaterial to observe that the language of this section is ancient in this sense, that with the single exception of persons residing abroad, who were not charged by Pitt's Act (39 Geo. III.), schedule D. has been in the same form, I believe, in all the Income Tax Acts which have ever been passed, with the exception I refer to, it is the same in Pitt's Act, the same in Addington's Act, and it has remained the same throughout. Now I turn from schedule D. itself to the rules that are still in force with regard to it, and which will be found with the 100th section of the earlier Act. The statute of 1842 provides "that the duties hereby granted under schedule D. shall be assessed and charged under the following rules." The first of those rules is important, since it distinctly shows that the charge is not a charge upon the profits, but a charge upon the person. It says that the last-mentioned duties "shall be charged annually on, and paid by, the persons, bodies politic, and so forth receiving or entitled unto the same," and then it goes on to provide certain "rules for ascertaining the said last-mentioned duties in the particular cases herein mentioned." I desire to dwell upon these words, because they seem to me to show this, that the intention of the rules is not to diminish the generality of the preceding enactment, but only to furnish a mode or guide where the particular rules apply. Where they do not apply, effect must be given to the general enactment independently of them. Now those rules proceed in this way. They state six distinct cases which are subordinate divisions of the charge created by schedule D., and the first of those is the case in question:—"Duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade not contained in any other schedule of this Act." Now I merely refer to these rules to point out that the second rule, which follows that first case, is as emphatic as the language of schedule D. itself, showing the intention to charge the persons with the profits on any concern carried on by them in the United Kingdom or elsewhere.

Pausing there, I confess that the conclusion, to my mind, is this, that the obvious and express language of the Legislature does create a charge upon persons resident in this country in respect of any profits wherever they may have been earned.

Against that conclusion various propositions have been presented to us. The first is that which has been expressed with so much force in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. It is said that it is an outrage on the law of nations to suppose that the Legislature of this country could have created a charge upon foreigners resident within this country in respect of the profits on their trades carried on in other countries. Now it appears to me that that is an argument not for the judge but for the lawgiver; and that the forcible observations of the Master of the Rolls might well be addressed to the House of Lords in his character as a legislator, but are not adapted to the tribunal which has merely to determine what was in the mind of the Legislature as expressed in those enactments. It must be borne in mind that the Legislature of every country asserts the right to impose certain taxes upon every person who enters their territory or becomes a resident in it. It cannot, I suppose, be argued for one moment that colonists and foreigners are not liable to customs duties, or to the excise, or to the licence duties, or to local rates when they take up their residence within this country.

Whether, therefore, the mind of the Legislature is to charge the persons who are foreigners and require them to pay income tax according to a particular standard, seems to me to be a mere question of enactment. I do not understand that it is argued that a foreigner is not to be charged with income tax in respect of profits which he receives in this country from trade carried on abroad, but if it be lawful and competent to the Legislature of this country to charge him with the profits so received by him here in respect of trade abroad, why is it not within their competence to charge him with profits accrued to him while resident in this country? The principle upon which we ought to proceed in considering an Act of this description is, I think, to be learned from the language of Lord Cairns. In addressing the House of Lords in the case of Partington v. The Attorney-General, L. R. 4 H. L. 100, at p. 122, he said:—"The principle of all fiscal legislation is this. If the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law he must be taxed, however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. On the other hand, if the Crown seeking to recover the tax cannot bring the subject within the letter of the law the subject is free, however apparently within the spirit of the law the case might otherwise appear to be. In other words, if there be admissible in any statute what is called an equitable construction, certainly such a construction is not admissible in a taxing statute where you can only adhere to the words of the statute."

Now the next argument which is addressed to us is this: It is said, in the language of Lord Westbury, that the English Act of Parliament cannot be applied to foreign property whilst it remains foreign property. I quote his observations in the case of The Attorney-General v. Campbell, 21 W. R. 34n, L. R. 5 H. L. 34, which was dwelt upon by Wills, J., in his able judgment in the court below. That proposition of Lord Westbury's I have no desire—if I had the power—to dissent from, but in my judgment it does not apply or govern the present case.

The income tax is not like the succession duty or the legacy duty, a charge upon a thing. The income tax, as I have already shown from the language used in the statute in schedule D., is a charge upon a person in respect of a thing, and I know of no principle of law which prohibits the Legislature from using foreign property or anything in the world they like as the standard by which the person resident within this country is to be charged. That is all that is sought in the present case.

The third argument which I desire to consider is this: It is said that there are, in the statute itself, indications that the charge is to be made only in respect of the foreign moneys received in this country. For that our attention was drawn to cases 4, 5, and 6. I have already observed that the cases are only subordinate divisions. The rules with regard to each case only apply to the particular case. Now the fourth case is this: It is for the computation of duties on securities in the Colonies, and undoubtedly there the rule is this.

The duty to be charged in respect of it "shall be computed on a sum not less than a full amount of the sums (so far as the same can be computed) which have been or will be received in the United Kingdom in the current year, without any deduction or abatement," and in the same way case 5, which deals with the computation of duties in respect of foreign possessions or possessions in the Colonies, must be on the sums actually received in the United Kingdom, and the computation of duty on undescribed profits is undoubtedly on the profits and gains received annually.

In those cases, undoubtedly, the Legislature has been minded, probably from reasons of convenience, to confine its rule to moneys received. That appears to be the true construction to be put upon the rules relating to those cases. But I am unable to find anything which authorizes me to extend the particular language in those cases to a portion of the tax which comes, not within those cases, but within other cases. I have no right to extend the limitation imposed upon those particular portions of the duty to the other portions of the duty. The rules, as I have already pointed out, are only to be used in the particular cases to which they apply.

They do not, therefore, in my judgment, furnish any general guide for the interpretation of the statute. On the contrary, they seem to me to show this, that the "reception," "the receipt," is not the same as "accruer," and that when the Legislature were minded to deal with actual receipts they used unequivocal language. Therefore I feel myself all the more bound to give the natural and full significance to the words "arising" and "accruing" as applied to the profits with which we have to deal. For these reasons I feel myself compelled to hold that the decision of the Divisional Court was correct.

Lopes, L.J.—I agree with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls and of Wills, J., and I cannot agree with the judgment of my brother Fry, L.J., and of Stephen, J.

The question raised in this case is most important. It is whether a resident in the United Kingdom is to be charged with income tax in respect of the profits of a business in the Colonies or in foreign parts, which profits belong to that resident, but are not transmitted to or received by him in this country.

This depends upon what is the true construction of schedule D of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34.

It is said that the intention of the Legislature was if the person was within the United Kingdom, to charge him for profits wherever arising, or if the business was within the United Kingdom, to charge the person wherever residing.

I think that this is a correct construction of schedule D., but subject always to this, that the profit or gain must be received by, or come to, the person to be charged, in the United Kingdom. I understand the words "arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom" to mean "coming to his hands or received by him in the United Kingdom." The second part of schedule D. refers to profits or gains actually made in the United Kingdom, which would be chargeable wherever the recipient resided. It is difficult to believe that the Legislature intended to make a resident in this country, maybe for a temporary purpose only, chargeable with income tax in respect of profits made in another country and which are never transmitted to or received in this country, and which are expended in the colony or foreign country.

The provision with regard to temporary residence in the United Kingdom for less than six months favours the construction I put upon schedule D. Such temporary residents are not to be charged with income tax as persons residing in the United Kingdom in respect of profits or gains received from or out of any possessions in any of her Majesty's dominions or any foreign possessions, or from securities in any of her Majesty's dominions or foreign securities, but are to be chargeable after six months' residence. The chargeability here depends, it must be observed, upon the profits or gains being received in this country. Again, there is another indication in the statute that the charge is to be made only in respect of foreign moneys received in this country (see case 4 and the rule applicable to that case). Can it be successfully contended that, while the computation of profits on securities and possessions out of the United Kingdom are to be made on the amount only received in this country, profits made abroad in a trade or business which are never transmitted to or received in this country are to be chargeable, and that, too, although the person to be charged is residing here for a temporary purpose—for instance, less than six months and in circumstances where he is not chargeable even in respect of profits or securities or possessions received in this country? I am at a loss to understand on what principle such a distinction can be maintained. It seems to me obvious that the general words in schedule D. (having regard to the provisions to which I have just alluded) must receive some limitation. I think that the limitation to be inferred from these sections is that the duty is chargeable only on the amounts received in this country from the business carried on abroad by the persons sought to be charged.

The maxim expressio unius exclusio alterius has been pressed upon us. I agree with what was said in the court below by Wills, J., about this maxim. It is often a valuable servant but a dangerous master to follow in the construction of statutes or documents. The exclusio is often the result of inadvertence or accident, and the maxim ought not to be applied when its application, having regard to the subject-matter to which it is to be applied, leads to inconsistency or injustice. I think that a rigid observance of the maxim in this case would make other provisions of the statute inconsistent and absurd, and would result in injustice. I cannot, therefore, permit it to govern my decision.

The judgment, therefore, in the court below, in my opinion, was wrong, and must be reversed.

In re HOLLINGSHEAD.

HOLLINGSHEAD v. WEBSTER. (a.)

Simple contract debt—Tenant for life—Payment of interest by—Acknowledgment—Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16)—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104—Part payment—Executor—9 Geo. 4, c. 14—19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 14.

The law in regard to the effect of payment of interest on a simple contract debt of a testator by the tenant for life of the real estate stands on the same footing as that in respect of payment of interest on a specialty debt.

The principle in Roddam v. Morley, 5 W. R. 510, 1 De G. J. & S. 1, discussed.

Payments made by a tenant for life under a will of real estate held to be sufficient admission of the liability of the real estate, and sufficient evidence to keep alive a simple contract debt of the testator.

Thomas Hollingshead, the testator, was at the date of his will possessed of certain freehold estate subject to mortgages thereon for £700, and also indebted to his brother, James Hollingshead, in a sum of £400, secured by promissory note, with interest at four and a half per cent.

By his will, dated September, 1870, the testator bequeathed to his wife, Mary Ann Hollingshead, absolutely, all his personal estate, subject to the payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and devised all his real estate to his said wife for her life, subject to any mortgages or charges thereon which might be subsisting at his death, with divers remainders over in favour of his children, and appointed his wife and Joseph Webster executrix and executor of his will.

The testator died in April, 1871, and his will was duly proved by both the widow and Joseph Webster, the personal estate being sworn under £600.

The widow entered into possession of the testator's real and personal estate, and continued in such possession till her death. From the testator's death to her own, she regularly paid to James Hollingshead, and afterwards to his executors, the interest on the £400, but there was no evidence, from the form of the receipts or otherwise, to show whether these payments were made by her in her character of executrix or as tenant for life. Joseph Webster never received any portion of the assets, and beyond proving the will never took any part in the administration of the testator's estate. The widow died in February, 1884, having appointed Joseph Webster her executor, but as her estate was insolvent he had never proved her will.

In May, 1885, the mortgagees sold the freeholds under their power of sale, and, after having satisfied their own mortgage debt and costs, paid the surplus, amounting to £397, into court under the Trustee Relief Act.

In April, 1886, the executors of James Hollingshead commenced the present action against Joseph Webster and the devisees under the testator's will, claiming as creditors for £400, to have the real and personal estate of the testator administered. There was also pending a summons on behalf of the devisees for payment out to them of the fund in court, and also another by the executors of James Hollingshead for payment out to them. It was admitted that the plaintiffs in the administration action were the only creditors of the testator. It was also admitted that there was no personal estate of the testator outstanding. There was no direct evidence that the widow received any part of the testator's personal estate, but the judge came to the conclusion that the just inference was that she did receive some portion of it, though there was no evidence to show how much she received or how she applied what she did receive. There was no evidence as to the testator's funeral expenses, or as to his debts other than the £400 debt.

All the summonses now came on for hearing together, but all accounts and inquiries as to these matters, and generally as to the administration of the testator's estate, were waived at the bar; and upon these facts, as admitted, the only questions argued were as to the effect of the payment of interest by the widow during her life on the simple contract debt of £400, and who was entitled to the fund in court representing the testator's real estate.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 30.—CHITTY, J., after stating the facts and admissions as set out above, continued:—The first question which arises is, in what character the widow paid the interest. The receipts taken are silent on the subject. It was argued for the defendants that she paid in her own right, but this is untenable; she was under no personal liability. She made the first payment in April, 1871, about a fortnight after the testator's death. It was then argued for the defendants that she made the payments in her character of executrix only. But I think the just inference is that she made the payments in her character of tenant for life of the real estate as well as in her character of executrix. She paid the interest because she was in possession of assets of the testator; there is no sufficient reason for attributing the payments to her character of executrix only; on the contrary, the case, on the facts, is, if anything, stronger for saying that she paid in her character of tenant for life of the real estate of which she was in possession, and which has proved more than sufficient for payment of the mortgage debt; whereas it is not shown that she was in possession of personal estate applicable to the payment of the interest. In Fordham v. Wallis Sir George Turner, upon facts similar to the present, considered that the payments ought to be attributed to both characters.

The last payment of interest was made by the widow in September, 1883, and the present proceedings by the executors of the creditor were commenced within six years after the last payment. The defendants, the persons entitled to the testator's real estate in remainder after the widow's death, set up the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16) as a bar to the claim, and contend that the proceedings ought to have been commenced within six years after the testator's death, and that they are not affected by the payments of interest made by the tenant for life. The question which then arises is as to the effect against the remainderman of payment by a tenant for life of interest on a simple contract debt carrying interest.

Strange to say, the point does not appear to have been decided. Roddam v. Morley was the case of a debt on a specialty by which the testator's heirs were bound. There it was decided by Lord Cranworth, with the assistance of two common law judges, that the effect of payment of interest on the specialty by the tenant for life was to keep the debt alive and set the action free as against the remainderman. This decision is not a conclusive authority in favour of the plaintiffs, because the exact point there decided turned upon different statutes from those which apply to the present case. But the general observations of the Lord Chancellor, and the course of reasoning pursued in his judgment, have an important bearing on the question before me.

The statutes which apply to the present case are the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104, and the Statute of Limitations of James; the arguments at the bar extended also to Lord Tenterden's Act (9 Geo. 4, c. 14) and the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97).

The statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104, enacts that where (as in the present case) there is no charge of debts, the real estate of a deceased debtor "shall be assets to be administered in courts of equity for the payment of the past debts of such person, as well debts due on simple contract as on specialty," and that "the devisees of such debtor shall be liable to all the same suits in equity at the suit of any of the creditors of such debtor, whether creditors by simple contract or by specialty, as" the heirs or devisees of any person dying seised of freehold estates were, before the passing of the Act, liable to in respect of such freehold estates at the suit of creditors by specialty in which the heirs were bound. The Act contains a proviso giving a priority to specialty creditors, which has since been abolished by statute. The general effect of the Act is plainly to place the simple contract creditors and specialty creditors on the same footing in regard to the real estate of the debtor, save that the specialty creditors have a priority.

It was suggested, rather than argued, for the plaintiffs that the effect of this statute of Will. 4 was, with the exception only of the priority in the proviso, to place simple contract creditors on the same footing, in regard to real estate, as specialty creditors, so as to confer on simple contract creditors the benefit of the same Statutes of Limitations as those which relate to specialties. It is enough to say that the suggestion cannot be maintained.

The Statute of Limitations, then, which applies to the present case is that of James. As is well known, that statute required the action for the recovery of a simple contract debt to be brought within six years "next after the cause of action." It contained no provision as to acknowledgments, or part payment of principal, or payment of interest. But there has been grafted on this statute a series of judicial decisions as to the effect of acknowledgments and payments to take the case out of this statute. Under these decisions part payment of principal and payment of interest stand upon the same footing. Payment of interest is regarded as an acknowledgment of the debt, and from the acknowledgment a promise to pay the debt may, and ought, to be implied (see the judgment of Lord Tenterden in Tanner v. Smart, 5 L. J. K. B. 218, and of Sir George Turner in Fordham v. Wallis). That was one way of stating the result of the decisions on acknowledgments or part payments. Another was that the acknowledgment was sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract (see Lord Tenterden's Act, s. 1). Lord Tenterden's Act required that a simple acknowledgment should be in writing; it dealt only with simple acknowledgment by words as distinguished from the acknowledgment of the debt by part payment of principal or payment of interest, and it expressly excepted such payments from its operation. The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, dealt with part payment of principal and part payment of interest, but only with regard to co-contractors and executors or administrators. The short effect of the enactment as to executors is that no executor shall "lose the benefit of the" statute of James "so as to be chargeable in respect or by reason only of payment of any principal, interest, or other money by any other" executor (see section 14). The Mercantile Law Amendment Act and Lord Tenterden's Act are both silent on the subject of any such payment made by a tenant for life of the real estate of a deceased testator, and these Acts, therefore, have no direct bearing on the question to be decided.

An elaborate argument was delivered at the bar as to the effect of payment of interest on a simple contract debt by one only of two executors in regard to the other executor and the testator's personal estate. But as no relief is asked against Webster, the surviving executor, and as all administration accounts or inquiries of any kind in reference to the testator's personal estate are waived at the bar, it is not necessary to decide any question as to the effect of the payments by the widow as executrix, either in regard to Webster or the testator's personal estate. The only ground for entertaining the general arguments on these points is the bearing they may have in ascertaining the effect of the widow's payments in her character of tenant for life. I will briefly state the nature of these arguments. It was said that the payment of interest by one executor affected him only, and did not in any way affect his co-executor, and the argument was pushed to the extreme length of saying that the payment involved the executor who made it in a personal liability to pay the debt. Therefore it was urged that, where one of two executors, having assets in his hand, applies those assets, so far as they extend, in payment of interest on a simple contract debt, the result is that, after the lapse of six years from the testator's death, not only is the co-executor absolved, but the testator's personal estate, whether in the hands of the co-executor or outstanding, is exempted from all liability to pay the debt, and that the creditor's sole remedy is against the executor personally who made the payment. This argument was founded on the language of the 14th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. But it appears to me that proper effect may be given to every word in that enactment without producing so extraordinary a result. Some reasonable interpretation may be put on the words "so as to be chargeable" which would stop short of such a conclusion; as, for instance, by holding that the co-executor who has not paid is not to be personally chargeable as for a devastavit in paying over to beneficiaries assets which have come to his hands. But I dissent altogether from the proposition that the executor by whom the payment is made is thereby involved in any personal liability. The promise to pay the debt arising from the payment of interest, whether such promise is an inference of fact or an implication of law, is a promise to pay as executor—that is, out of the personal assets of the testator. The inference or implication must be consistent with the facts from which it is drawn or raised, and it would be wholly inconsistent with the facts to hold that in such a case as that supposed the executor has incurred any personal liability. But it is unnecessary to pursue these matters any further.

In the case before me the plaintiffs are suing on a legal demand or debt for a remedy which can be granted only by a court of equity, and for a remedy against property of the deceased debtor which can be reached only by a court of equity. The statute of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104, already cited, does not confer on the simple contract creditor any right at law against the real estate of the deceased debtor, but makes such real estate assets to be administered in courts of equity, and confers a remedy by suit in equity only. In regard to demands to which the statute of 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, applies, courts of equity undoubtedly follow the law. But there have not been, and indeed there cannot be, any decision in a court of law as to the effect of payment of interest on a simple contract debt by a tenant for life of real estate. In determining this question a court of equity ought to follow the analogy of the decisions at law, so far as they are applicable in relation to acknowledgments and part payment of principal or payment of interest, but there are equitable considerations also which must be carefully attended to. Now what is the duty and what are the powers of a tenant for life in possession of real assets of a deceased testator? His duty, as was pointed out by Lord Cranworth in Roddam v. Morley, is to keep down the interest on the debt, and nothing more. He has no power to sell the real estate in order to pay the debt. By discharging his duties to pay the interest he relieves the remainderman from the burden of interest. It would be absurdly unjust to hold that, from the performance of this duty, a personal promise on his part to pay the debt ought to be inferred. I reject this argument on the part of the defendants. The right principle to adopt is, that so far as the real estate is concerned, there is no one else but the tenant for life to pay the interest; that in making such payment he represents the whole estate; that the payment is an admission of the liability to the debt affecting the real estate of which he is in possession; it is sufficient evidence for a continuance of the testator's contract to pay the debt, or (if it be necessary to have recourse to the somewhat subtle doctrine of a promise to pay), it is a promise to pay out of such real estate which he, as the person in possession of such real asset, is competent to give on behalf of the real asset generally and so as to bind those who take the remainder. This places the law, in regard to payment of interest on a simple contract by a tenant for life, on the same footing as payment of interest on a specialty debt. The decision in Roddam v. Morley turned principally on the 5th section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42. That section says nothing about the effect of payment of interest by a tenant for life, but in dealing with the enactment and in arriving at the conclusion that the effect was to keep the debt alive as against the remainderman Lord Cranworth founded his judgment to a considerable extent on a consideration of the position and duty of a tenant for life. In Coope v. Cresswell, 15 W. R. 242, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 112, Lord Chelmsford stated he was unable to concur in the reasoning which led to the ultimate decisions in Roddam v. Morley. I apprehend it was not competent for him to overrule the decision in Roddam v. Morley, nor, indeed, does he purport so to do. But, while not concurring with the reasoning in Roddam v. Morley, he adds that it is unnecessary for him to consider whether the position of tenant for life and remainderman—are not so unlike in interest that payment by the one might not be regarded as an acknowledgment of the debt by the other; but he adds that it would undoubtedly have been the case if the bond debt had been a charge upon the land. By this I may observe that neither in Roddam v. Morley nor in the case before me was or is the debt a charge upon the land; a debt or specialty on which the lands are bound does not create, either at law or in equity, a charge; the land is merely assets in the hands of the heir or devisee for payment of the specialty debt, just as the land is, since the passing of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104, assets for payment of the simple contract debt. In this respect the case before me stands on the same footing as Roddam v. Morley. In my opinion the observations of Lord Chelmsford have not weakened the effect of the course of reasoning adopted by Lord

Cranworth so far as it bears upon the question which I have to decide.

The only other authority which requires any distinct notice on this point is Fordham v. Wallis, already mentioned, which was decided before Roddam v. Morley. The defendants, on an examination of the terms of the decree, claimed this case as an authority in their favour. But whatever may have crept into the decree, it is clear that Sir George Turner did not intend to decide the question whether payment of interest by a tenant for life would keep alive the debt against the fee; he states expressly in his judgment that he abstained from giving any judgment on that point.

The result is, that the plaintiffs are entitled to have the £397 applied in payment of this debt.

In re Fleck.
Colston v. Roberts. (a.)

Will—Construction—Mortgage debt—Locke King's Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 113)—Amendment Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 69).

A testator by his will directed his executors to appropriate the moneys to arise from certain policies on his life, in payment of his private debts, not being trade debts, and funeral and testamentary expenses, and bequeathed his residuary personalty, subject to the payment of his trade debts, which he declared should be a charge on his personal estate, to his son, and devised his real estate to his daughter.

At the date of his death he owed a debt admitted to be a trade debt to his bankers, to secure which he had deposited the title deeds of his real estate.

Held, that the provision in the will as to the payment of trade debts amounted to a declaration of intention contrary to the rule established by Locke King's Act, and that the trade debt was payable out of the testator's personal estate, and not out of the real estate, the title deeds of which were deposited with the bankers to secure the debt.

Adjourned summons.

J. T. Fleck, a twine manufacturer, by his will, after giving certain legacies and annuities, and after mentioning two sums of £999 19s. and £1,000 respectively, to arise from two policies on his life, with bonuses, proceeded as follows:—"I direct my executors to receive the said moneys and appropriate the same in or towards payment in due course of all my private debts, including my promissory notes or other engagements whatsoever which I may have entered into previous to my death, not being trade debts, and all my funeral and testamentary expenses, and the legacies hereby bequeathed, and the surplus (if any) of such moneys, after making such payments thereout as aforesaid, shall be placed to the credit of my current account with Messrs. William Williams, Brown, & Co., of Leeds." He devised his real and residuary personal estate to trustees upon trust as to his real estate for the benefit of his daughter and her children, and then proceeded:—"And as to all the residue of my personal estate, after and subject to the bequests and provisions in regard thereto hereinbefore contained, and to the payment of my trade debts (which I hereby declare shall be a charge upon my personal estate), I will and direct that the same, including the whole of the twine machinery in my said mill, but not the main shafting (which, together with engine, boilers, and other fixtures, shall, as I have hereinbefore directed, form part of, and be deemed to belong to, my real estate), and the stock-in-trade of yarns, twines, and other trade effects, together with all books, debts, and other matters and things connected with my said trade (over and beyond what is needful for payment of all my trade debts) shall be held in trust for my said son Henry Arthur Fleck."

The testator afterwards overdrew his account at his bankers, Messrs. William Williams, Brown, & Co., and at their request deposited with them the title deeds of his real estate as security for the overdraft.

The testator died in 1887. At that time the overdraft amounted to £4,900 1s., as appeared from the books kept by the testator at his mill; and the title deeds remained in the possession of Messrs. William Williams, Brown, & Co.

This present summons was taken out by the trustees for the determination of the question whether the debt due to Messrs. William Williams, Brown, & Co., which was admitted to be a trade debt, was payable out of the testator's real estate, the title deeds of which were deposited with them, in accordance with Locke King's Act, or whether the provision in the will of the testator, with respect to his trade debts, amounted to a contrary intention that the Act should not apply, so that the debt was payable out of the testator's personal estate, notwithstanding the provisions of the statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 69.

The statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 69 enacts, by section 1, that "a general direction that the debts or that all the debts of the testator shall be paid out of his personal estate shall not be deemed to be a declaration of an intention contrary to or other than the rule established by the said Act, unless such contrary or other intention shall be further declared by words expressly or by necessary implication referring to all or some of the testator's debts or debt charged by way of mortgage on any part of his real estate."

Vernon Smith, for the trustees, stated the facts.

Cookson-Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Archibald Brown, for the testator's daughter.—The provision in the will of the testator as to the payment of his trade debts out of his personal estate shows an intention that the debt should be paid out of his personal estate, and not out of the real estate, the title deeds of which were deposited as a security for it: Eno v. Tatham, 11 W. R. 475, 3 De G. J. & S. 443; Mellish v. Vallins, 2 J. & H. 194.

T. R. Warrington, for the testator's son.—The provision of the testator with respect to the payment of his trade debts only amounts to a direction that the debts shall be paid out of his personal estate, and comes within section 1 of statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 69. The fact that two classes of debts are directed to be paid out of two different parts of his personal estate makes no difference. There is no reference to the payment of any mortgage debt out of the personal estate. The debt to the bankers must be paid out of the real estate, the title deeds of which were deposited with them: Nelson v. Page, 17 W. R. 27, L. R. 7 Eq. 25; In re Rossiter, 28 W. R. 238, 13 Ch. D. 355.

North, J. [after reading the 1st section of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 69, proceeded:—] It is not necessary under that statute that the debt should be referred to as a mortgage debt, but it must be sufficiently described to identify it as the particular debt which happens to be secured by mortgage. If a debt is described as the debt which the testator owes his banker, and that debt is, in fact, secured by mortgage, there would not, by reason of that fact, be the less an expression of a contrary intention. The words of the Act only require that the debt shall be specifically described and identified in some way, not that it shall be described as a mortgage debt; but anything that will identify it will be sufficient. A general direction that all debts shall be paid out of the personal estate is not sufficient. There is not here such a general direction. In the present case the testator provides very carefully for the payment of different debts out of different parts of his estate. His private debts are to be paid out of the proceeds of certain policies; and he disposes of his residue "after and subject to the bequests and provisions in regard thereto hereinbefore contained, and to the payment of my trade debts (which I hereby declare shall be a charge on my personal estate)." That is a clear direction that the trade debts are to be paid out of a particular fund, and that it is only the surplus which is to go for the benefit of the son. The debts, therefore, are divided into two classes, which is an exhaustive division. It has been suggested that it is not exhaustive, but there is no debt which is neither a trade debt nor a private debt, but which is a mortgage debt. The fact that the testator had received large sums of money for his trade, and that he gives security to his bankers by way of deposit, does not make that which is a trade debt other than a trade debt. Before the deposit the debt was a trade debt, and can it be said that the testator's intention is changed by his making the deposit? In my opinion, the last thing he intended was to take the secured debt out of the class of trade debts. It seems to me that, in this case, one set of the debts was charged on a particular part of the personal estate, and the other portion of the debts was charged on another part of the personal estate, and there was some personal estate on which neither set of debts was charged. Of course, the incidence of debts by operation of law in case the funds provided should not be sufficient would not be affected. The testator has not made any general direction that his debts are to be paid out of his personal estate, but he has made a particular specific provision which takes the case out of the Act, and has, by necessary implication, shown an intention that the Act shall not apply.

Brooking v. Maudslay, Son, & Field. (a.)

Marine insurance—Unseaworthiness of ship—Innocent shippers—Action by underwriters to restrain proceedings on policy.

In an action by underwriters for an injunction to restrain policyholders from taking any proceedings with reference to a policy of insurance, on the ground that the underwriters had an admittedly good defence to any action that might be brought on such policy,

Held, that an injunction ought not to be granted.

Action.

This was an action by Marmaduke Hart Brooking, on behalf of himself and all other the underwriters on a policy of insurance, dated in February, 1884, on machinery carried by the steamship Elephant, on a voyage from London to Portsmouth, against the insurers, Messrs. Maudslay, Son, & Field; and by the re-amended statement of claim the plaintiff asked a declaration that the said policy was void, and that it might be delivered up to be cancelled; or, alternatively, a declaration that the policy was not binding on the plaintiff and the others on whose behalf he sued, and that they and he were discharged from all liability for loss on the voyage; and an injunction restraining the defendants from taking any proceedings on the policy.

The circumstances out of which the action arose were these:—

The defendants were engineers carrying on business at Lambeth.

In January, 1884, they were desirous of procuring certain machinery, which they had made for one of her Majesty's ships, to be conveyed from London to Portsmouth; and for this purpose they entered into a charter-party, dated the 8th of January, 1884, with one Scott, the owner of the steamship Elephant, whereby it was agreed that the machinery in question, which weighed about 867 tons, should be carried by that vessel from Millwall Dock to Portsmouth Dockyard in consideration of a lump sum of £600 as freight. The machinery was to be loaded, stowed, and discharged by the defendants, and was to be carried in two voyages, if the vessel could take all, the owner having an option of making a third voyage or supplying another vessel to take the balance, if any.

The vessel, loaded with 422 tons of the machinery, left Millwall Dock on the 28th of January, 1884, and reached Portsmouth in safety on the 3rd of February.

On the 14th of the same month she again set sail from Millwall Dock carrying the rest of the machinery, but on this occasion was lost with all hands on board.

On the 25th of January the defendants, through their insurance broker, procured an insurance to be effected on the machinery which constituted the cargo on the second voyage, to the amount of £30,000, and on the 13th of February the amount was increased to £40,000; and a slip was initialled by the underwriters on those days.

The policy in question was dated the 15th of February, and included the whole £40,000, and was made out in accordance with the slip. The risk included "risk of barges, lighters, &c., from assured premises and while waiting shipment on land or water."

Upon the occurrence of the loss some of the underwriters paid, but a large majority disputed their liability.

An inquiry into the circumstances attending the loss of the vessel took place in the Wreck Commissioner's Court, and the judgment on that inquiry was given on the 14th of May. The Commissioner found that the Elephant had been sent to sea in an unseaworthy condition, and that Scott, the owner, and he alone, was responsible for the manner in which the ship went to sea.

The defendants, upon this, applied to the underwriters to pay, and a few did so, but a large majority still refused to do so; and on the 23rd of May the present action was brought.

The original statement of claim was delivered on the 24th of May, and alleged that, by reason of the weight of the machinery, the mode of stowage, the weight intended to be carried on the deck, and the fact that part of the machinery would be carried in the hatches, rendering it impossible to put on the hatches, the cargo was of a special and dangerous character, as the defendants and their agents well knew, or ought to have known, that they failed to communicate these facts to the plaintiffs; and (paragraph 4) that the vessel, with the machinery on board, set sail "in a grossly unseaworthy state"; and they claimed a declaration that the policy was void, and that it might be delivered up to be cancelled.

The defendants, in the first instance, met this by an application to strike out paragraph 4, relating to unsea-worthiness, and upon this application an order was made giving the plaintiffs liberty to amend.

The plaintiffs accordingly, on the 6th of August, amended by alleging that the policy was void, "or the underwriters discharged from liability thereunder," retaining their former allegation that "the defendants nevertheless claim and intend to make use of the same and treat it as a valid and existing contract on the part of the plaintiff, and those on whose behalf he sues, and adding a claim for the alternative declaration mentioned above."

To this amended statement of claim the defendants put in a defence in which (as also amended) they admitted that the ship was unseaworthy, but stated that the unseaworthiness was owing to her being overladen, and was not known to them until after the ship had been lost, and they wholly denied the allegations of concealment and non-communication of facts. And they further alleged that the overloading did not take place until after the slip for the policy of insurance was initialled, so that the question of overloading did not arise until after the contract was entered into; and they asserted that the policy was valid, and had not been avoided; and, further, that although the vessel was unseaworthy, yet, according to the universal practice that had hitherto prevailed with all leading underwriters at Lloyd's, the plaintiff and the other underwriters of the policy were bound in honour, though not in law, to pay, but the defendants denied that they had claimed or intended to deal with or make use of the policy as a valid existing policy, or that they even threatened legal proceedings.

The plaintiffs then put in a reply in which they joined issue generally, but stated that they "did not proceed further in this action with the charges in the statement of claim as to concealment and non-communication by the defendants of material facts."

On an application of the defendants to strike out the reply, an order was, on the 15th of July, 1886, made, that so much of the statement of claim as contained charges of concealment and non-communication by the defendants of material facts be struck out, and that the plaintiff should pay the defendants the costs of the motion and also their costs occasioned by the introduction of such charges.

The pleadings were accordingly amended and the action now came on for hearing.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., Graham Hastings, Q.C., Gorell Barnes, Q.C., and Hurst, for the plaintiff.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 21.—Stirling, J., after stating the facts and reading the pleadings, continued:—On these pleadings the action has been brought to trial. At the trial it was admitted by counsel for the plaintiffs that the policy was not void, and that judgment for cancellation cannot be given; but they contended that they were entitled to relief in accordance with the alternative prayer in the statement of claim. The defendants, on the other hand, admit that the unseaworthiness of The Elephant constitutes a good defence to the action at law on the policy; but they deny the right of the plaintiffs to the relief claimed by them or any other relief. This question formed the main subject of argument before me. A correspondence between the legal advisers of the plaintiffs and defendants was, however, put in evidence, from which it appears that the real issue between the underwriters and the defendants is one which is not and cannot be raised in this action. It is of this nature. It is the practice of underwriters, who may have a good defence to an action on a policy founded on the unseaworthiness of a vessel, to pay insurers who are "innocent shippers." Whatever may have been the case at first, it is not now asserted by the underwriters that the members of the defendants' firm are personally to blame for the condition in which the vessel left for sea; but it appears to be alleged that through their servants or agents they are in some way implicated in the unseaworthiness, and the real question between them is whether Messrs. Maudslay are innocent shippers and entitled to the benefit of the practice to which I have referred. This issue cannot be tried in this action, nor, indeed, so far as I can see, by any legal tribunal whatever. It must be decided, if at all, by some court of honour to be selected by the parties interested.

Most certainly it cannot be affected one way or the other by the judgment I am about to pronounce. My decision depends upon the dry and technical (though not unimportant) question whether (regard being had to the rules which govern the procedure of the court) the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief for which they ask at the bar. The case stands thus. The defendants are entitled to the benefit of a policy of insurance on which they may sue at law. The plaintiffs allege and the defendants admit by the pleadings that the plaintiffs have a valid defence to any action which may be brought at law on the policy. The defendants say that they have not threatened legal proceedings, but they have declined to give an undertaking not to take any, and they abstain from stating whether it is their intention to take proceedings or not. Under these circumstances, can the underwriters bring the defendants before a court of equity and obtain a declaration and injunction according to the second alternative of the statement of claim? If the policy were liable to be completely avoided—as, for example, if it had been obtained by misrepresentation—a court of equity would have jurisdiction to direct the delivery up and cancellation of the instrument. This is clearly shown by the case of Duncan v. Worrall, 10 Price, 31. On the other hand, where the policy cannot be avoided, but there is a good legal defence to an action upon it (as, for example, unseaworthiness or deviation), a court of equity cannot make a decree for cancellation: Thornton v. Knight, 16 Sim. 509, where the Vice-Chancellor in a few words draws the distinction between the two classes of cases. He says:—"If the policy, though good on the face of it, had been proved to be void on the ground that the representation made by the insurers when they effected it, as to the seaworthiness of the ship, was false, I could have interfered, for then a case of fraud would have been made out against the insurers. But I cannot interfere on the mere ground of deviation, unless this court has a concurrent jurisdiction with a court of law, in all cases in which relief is sought against instruments like the one in question. That, however, is not so; and therefore I shall dismiss the bill with costs." In that case, however, an action at law had been brought, and the decision does not cover the question before me—viz., whether the court can make a declaration that the underwriters are not liable on the policy, and grant an injunction against future proceedings at law.

Prior to the Judicature Acts a plaintiff coming into equity to restrain proceedings at law was bound to show some equitable ground for relief. He had not, as a rule, a right to come into a court of equity to restrain proceedings in a court of law if he had a good defence at law. If authority for this is wanted I may refer to the cases of Hardinge v. Webster, 8 W. R. 71, 1 Drew. & Sm. 101, and Kemp v. Tucker, 21 W. R. 470, L. R. 8 Ch. 369. The present plaintiffs come before the court without alleging any case which would give a court of equity jurisdiction, either exclusive or concurrent, with the courts of law. The sole ground on which they claim the relief is that, although there is a good legal defence to any claim by the defendants against them, that defence depends on extrinsic facts the evidence of which may not be forthcoming at all times and under all circumstances. The existence of such evidence is not alleged in the statement of claim nor proved at the trial; if it had been it would seem to me the appropriate remedy would be found in an action for the perpetuation of testimony rather than in proceedings such as the present. Upon this I may refer to two authorities. In the case of Angell v. Angell, 1 S. & St. 83, Sir John Leach lays down the law as to the cases in which the jurisdiction of courts of equity to perpetuate testimony is exercised. He says, page 89:—"If it be possible that the matter in question can, by the party who files the bill, be made the subject of immediate judicial investigation, no such suit is entertained. But if the party who files the bill can, by no means, bring the matter into present judicial investigation . . . there courts of equity will entertain such a suit, for, otherwise, the only testimony which could support the plaintiff's title might be lost by the deaths of his witnesses. Where he is himself in possession the adverse party might purposely delay his claim with a view to that event." Obviously it did not occur to Sir John Leach that a person in possession of real estate and threatened with an action of ejectment to which he had a good legal defence might file a bill in Chancery to establish that defence and obtain an injunction to restrain proceedings at law. The other case is Earl Spencer v. Peek, 15 W. R. 478, L. R. 3 Eq. 415, where Lord Romilly decided that the pendency of an action in which the issue could be tried was an answer to a bill to perpetuate testimony.

It could not, therefore, have been his opinion that a person threatened with proceedings at law to which he had a good legal defence could bring a suit in equity to restrain them on the ground that his evidence in support of his case might be lost. On principle it is difficult to see why the defendants, having a claim which they may assert in a court of law at any time within the period fixed by the Statute of Limitations, should be compelled to try the issue on which the validity of that claim depends in a court of equity, and at another time than that which they may select as the most convenient for themselves. The authorities mainly relied on by the plaintiffs were the judgment of Lord Eldon in Bromley v. Holland, 7 Ves. 3, and certain paragraphs in the judgments of Lord Cottenham in Simpson v. Lord Howden, 3 My. & Cr. 97, see p. 102, and of Lord Selborne in Hoare v. Bremridge, L. R. 8 Ch. 22, see p. 26, 21 W. R. Dig. 113. These authorities are no doubt of great weight, but they relate to the cancellation of void instruments (as is shown by the case of Thornton v. Knight, already cited), and do not necessarily apply to cases where, as here, the instrument is not void or voidable, and relief by way of cancellation cannot be given. In Cooper v. Joel, 27 Beav. 313, the defendants claimed the benefit of a guarantee which was held by Lord Romilly, M.R., to be invalid, although the invalidity did not appear on the face of it, and his lordship thus dealt with it. He said (at pp. 319, 320): "In that state of circumstances I think that the defendants could not succeed at law, and that this would have been a good defence to the action. But as the case which is made out by the defendants, upon the affidavits, confessedly or professedly is, that the proceedings at law are only suspended, as they say, 'for the present,' their argument being that they may sue again upon a fresh instalment under the guarantee becoming due, I am of opinion (referring again to the principle laid down by Lord Cottenham in the case I have referred to) that as lapse of time might deprive the plaintiffs chargeable upon this document of the means of defence, and as the defendants may hold it, and profess to hold it, for the purpose of suing at a future time, this court ought to interfere and direct it to be delivered up."

This appears to be an authority in favour of the plaintiffs. The case, however, was brought on appeal (1 De G. F. & J. 240, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 22) before the Lord Chancellor, Lord Campbell. [His lordship read the judgment at pp. 244—246, and continued:—] The judgment of the Lord Chancellor appears to me to amount to a reversal of the decision of the Master of the Rolls, so far as it is based upon any principle applicable to the present case, and that, too, although cancellation, and not an injunction, was the remedy sought. If, in the present case, the argument on behalf of the plaintiff is well founded, it appears to me that any person liable to have a claim made against him at law and having a good defence to it may bring the matter before a court of equity in the same way as the present plaintiff does; and, indeed, the case was put as high as this by the learned counsel of the plaintiff in the course of his reply. Such a right appears to be negatived by the words of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Campbell, in Cooper v. Joel. He said (p. 245): "If that was the rule, hardly any dispute could arise upon a contract"—or, indeed, as to any other legal right—"which might not be drawn into court of equity." In my opinion no such rule exists. In my judgment, therefore, the claims of the plaintiffs are not warranted by principle or supported by authority. I think that this action is in the nature of an experiment, and as the experiment fails I see no reason why the costs should not follow the event.

Action dismissed.

Webb v. Jonas. (a.)

Trustee and cestui que trust—Lending money on contributory mortgage—Liability of trustee.

The trustees of a marriage settlement had power to invest the funds "in their or his name or names" on (amongst other investments) real securities. The trustees, being two in number, joined with the two trustees of a will, one of them being a trustee both of the settlement and the will, in advancing £2,000 on a contributory mortgage, the trustees of the settlement advancing £1,500, those of the will £500.

The security subsequently depreciated in value, and an action was brought by the cestui que trust under the settlement claiming a declaration that the trustees of the will had committed a breach of trust.

Held, that, by advancing money on a contributory mortgage, the trustees had not complete control over the mortgaged property, and were liable to make good the deficiency in value, as such an investment was not authorized.

Trial of action.

By a post-nuptial settlement of the 5th of October, 1852, and made between George Webb and Frances his wife of the one part, and S. Webb and William Bennett Freeland, as trustees, of the other part, it was declared that the trustees should stand possessed of the moneys to arise from the sale of certain hereditaments upon trust to invest the same in their or his names or name on Government, Parliamentary, or real securities

(a.) Reported by C. H. F. Christie, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

England or Wales, or on the security of the bonds or debentures of any railway company, or the security of settled personalty, with power to vary such investments in such manner as they should think fit, and to pay the income to the said Frances Webb and her children as therein mentioned.

The plaintiffs were two of the children of Frances Webb, the first plaintiff being her administratrix.

W. Bennett Freeland was also trustee, with B. G. Giblin, of the will of one Henry Giblin, who died in 1874.

In 1875 Henry J. C. Giblin, a son of Henry Giblin, borrowed on mortgage of a freehold estate a sum of £2,000 from the trustees of his father's will and the trustees of the settlement already referred to. The money was advanced, as to £1,500 by the trustees of the settlement, being the exact amount in their hands as such trustees, and as to £500 by the trustees of the will, and was secured by a mortgage deed dated the 2nd of June, 1875, and made between H. J. C. Giblin of the first part, S. Webb and W. B. Freeland of the second part, and B. G. Giblin and the said W. B. Freeland of the third part, whereby the lands were conveyed to the mortgagees and their heirs to such uses as the said S. Webb and W. B. Freeland, as mortgagees to the extent of £1,500, and the said B. G. Giblin and W. B. Freeland, as mortgagees to the extent of £500, should jointly or separately as such several mortgagees, and to the extent of their several debts, and either by way of realizing their mortgage security and obtaining repayment of their principal and interest moneys respectively, or by way of release and re-assurance of the mortgaged hereditaments, by any deed or deeds to be executed, &c., direct or appoint, and, in default of such appointment, to the use of the mortgagees, their heirs and assigns, for ever. The proviso for redemption provided that, on repayment of the respective principal sums of money and interest, or either of them, the hereditaments should be re-assured by the persons or person who should have received such principal and interest moneys.

By a deed of appointment, to which the mortgagor was not a party, indorsed on the mortgage, dated the 25th of October, 1884, and expressed to be made between W. B. Freeland and B. G. Giblin of the first part, J. G. Bellingham of the second part, the said W. B. Freeland of the third part, and the said W. B. Freeland and B. G. Giblin of the fourth part, the legal estate in the mortgaged premises was vested in W. B. Freeland as to three-fourth parts, and in W. B. Freeland and B. G. Giblin as to the remaining fourth part. The value of the mortgage security having fallen, the plaintiffs brought this action for a declaration that the investment above mentioned was a breach of trust, and claiming repayment of the £1,500.

The defendants were the executors of S. Webb and W. B. Freeland.

Barber, Q.C., and Bardswell, for the plaintiffs.—There is no direct authority that, in the absence of an express power in the instrument, trustees are justified in lending on a contributory mortgage. In this case they have committed a breach of trust: Lewin on Trusts, 8th ed., p. 331; Davidson's Conveyancing, vol. 3, p. 40, 3rd ed. By lending on this kind of security they lose their proper and absolute control over the trust-moneys.

Palmer v. Earl of Carlisle, 1 S. & S. 423; Tolson v. Sheard, 25 W. R. 667, 5 Ch. D. 19, were also cited.

Warmington, Q.C., and F. H. Coll, for the defendants.—The court will not make trustees liable for a technical breach of trust if they have acted honestly. It will not decide for the first time a new question against trustees: Speight v. Gaunt, 30 W. R. 785, 31 W. R. 401, 32 W. R. 435, 22 Ch. D. 727, 9 App. Cas. 1. [KEKEWICH, J.—Is this an investment on a security authorized by the trust? Whiteley v. Learoyd, 34 W. R. 450, 33 Ch. D. 347.] There was power in the settlement to lend on real security—which this was. Trustees, in the absence of prohibition may lend money on an undivided share of realty. The difference between that security and this is very shadowy. The two funds are clearly divided all through the deed. The mortgage money can be recovered by each set of trustees, apart from the other set. Tolson v. Sheard is in our favour. Palmer v. Earl of Carlisle is distinguishable. One trustee can bring his action for foreclosure and make the other trustees defendants: Luke v. South Kensington Hotel Co., 27 W. R. 514, 11 Ch. D. 121. This case is different from those which appear to be authorities the other way; Lupton v. White, 15 Ves. 432; Robinson v. Robinson, 1 De G. M. & G. 247.

Barber, in reply, cited Fry v. Tapson, 33 W. R. 113, 28 Ch. D. 268.

KEKEWICH, J.—I am sorry to be obliged to decide against trustees, especially when, as in this case, they have behaved perfectly honestly. But here the question is, have these trustees, as agents, acted up to their authority or gone beyond it? If they have gone beyond it it is no answer to say they acted in good faith. Their authority was to invest in certain securities. [His lordship stated the power of investment.] The question turns on the meaning of the words "in their or his names or name"—that is the essence of the investment clause. There is no difference between an investment in the names of three persons, two of whom are trustees of one deed, and a third, who, with one of the first two, is trustee of another deed, and an investment in the names of two trustees and two entire strangers.

Here the whole estate is conveyed to four persons (in reality three, as one is trustee in both cases) so they must keep the control of the securities, that is, the money, and they do not even get the legal estate. True they have a power of appointment, which they exercised. I accept the reason suggested for its being given—namely, to enable them to accept one part of the security and not the other. It was urged that the power of sale is so expressed that either set of mortgagees may sell, and so may grant leases. But one set cannot enter without the concurrence of the other, and whatever is done is for the benefit of all. It is said that is the essential form of a contributory mortgage; if so, it forms the strongest possible reason for trustees not to invest in it. They lose control over the fund, if they have to foreclose they must bring other parties before the court as in Luke v. South Kensington Hotel Co., this involves trouble and expense, and it is not a difficulty that trustees ought to embrace of themselves when it is not forced upon them. The plaintiffs are entitled to the relief asked in their statement of claim.

subsequently to the institution of an action for administration, added by amending the statement of claim, and without the leave of the court being obtained under ord. 18, r. 2. The defendant pleaded to the amended statement of claim, and raised the objection to this joinder of causes of action without leave, but took no step to insist on the objection until the trial of the action.

Held, that the objection to the joinder of such claims could not be insisted on at the trial, as it would be too late under ord. 70, r. 2.

Trial of action.

The plaintiffs, two tenants for life under a will, brought an action against one of the trustees and the executors of another for administration of the will and the appointment of a receiver. They afterwards, without leave of the court, added by way of amendment of the claim, a demand for possession of an inn, part of the trust property, of which one of the defendants was tenant, and that the said defendant should pay an occupation rent.

The defendants pleaded to the amended statement of claim that this joining another action with one for the recovery of land was irregular without leave of the court, but took no further steps to insist on the objection until the trial of the action.

Ord. 70, r. 2, is in these terms: "No application to set aside any proceeding for irregularity shall be allowed unless made within reasonable time, nor if the party applying has taken any fresh step after knowledge of the irregularity."

Barber, Q.C., and Fawcus (Williamson with them), for the defendant.—The action, according to the writ, only asks for administration of a receiver. KEKEWICH, J.—In this case after the defendant appeared the plaintiff amended, not his writ, but his claim, and added, without leave, a claim for the recovery of land. The defendant noticed this, and called attention to it, but did not insist on his objection. Many more steps were taken in the action, and at last the defendant definitely took the point that this pleading is bad under ord. 18, r. 2. I am of opinion that the objection is now too late: Mulckern v. Doerks. On any irregularity a party should come at once to have it cured: ord. 70, r. 2; he ought not to go on to trial before taking his objection. The reason for the latter rule is that the defendant may not be harassed, and it is for his benefit; but he must make a fair use of it. In this case he is too late.

REG. v. COUNTY COURT JUDGE OF GREENWICH AND MOXON. (a.)

County courts—Jurisdiction—New trials.

On an application to a county court judge for a new trial, he refused the application on the two grounds then urged, but intimated that the applicant might apply on a fresh ground if affidavits could be produced in support of such fresh ground. On the second application, upon fresh grounds, the judge granted the new trial.

Held, that the judge had not "finally determined" the application for a new trial, and that no writ of prohibition could issue to prevent the new trial, as the judge had not exercised his full discretion on the first application, but had only disposed of the two specific grounds on which that application had been based.

Great Northern Railway Co. v. Mossop, 4 W. R. 116, 17 C. B. 130, distinguished.

Per Wills, J.—The High Court has only power to look into the grounds of such applications for new trials to see whether they are such that a judge could have reasonably exercised his discretion upon them, and they cannot interfere with his discretion beyond that limit.

Application upon a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition against his honour Judge Pitt-Taylor at the Greenwich County Court.

This was an action by a Mrs. Moxon for personal injury, against a tramway company, which had been remitted to the county court at Greenwich on the ground that the plaintiff had no visible means. The jury found a verdict for the defendants. The judge pronounced the verdict an unsatisfactory one, and the plaintiff's counsel at once applied for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and of surprise. The judge refused the application on these grounds, but intimated to the plaintiff that she might apply again on the ground of the misconduct of the jury if affidavits could be produced to that effect. Application was made on another day on this ground, whereupon the judge granted the new trial. The defendants obtained a rule for a writ of prohibition against the rehearing of the action, on the ground that the judge had refused the application for a new trial once, and could not afterwards re-open the question.

Lush-Wilson, for the plaintiff Moxon, showed cause against the rule.—"Res judicata" is only a ground for prohibition when the same application is renewed after having been once disposed of: Irving v. Aikin, [illegible] W. R. 467, L. R. 5 Q. B. 208.

M'Clymont, for the defendants.—The county court judge has only statutable authority to grant a new trial under section 89 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. He has exercised that authority once by refusing to grant a new trial, and cannot re-open the case: Great Northern Railway Co. v. Mossop, 4 W. R. 116, 17 C. B. 130; Jones v. Currey, 20 L. J. Q. B. 438. This court may review the grounds on which a judge grants a new trial to see whether they are unreasonable or not.

FIELD, J.—This was an action in the High Court which was remitted, by the beneficial enactment of section 10 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 147, to the county court on account of the poverty of the plaintiff. It was remitted for all purposes, and was, so far, out of the jurisdiction of this court. The cause was heard, and the result a verdict was given for the defendants, the tramway company. The plaintiff at once applied for a new trial, on the ground of the verdict being against weight of evidence, and of surprise. A new trial was refused by the county court judge on those grounds. Had nothing more occurred, had a new trial been definitely refused, judgment been given, and certificate been signed, it would undoubtedly have not been competent for the county court judge again to entertain a further application for a rehearing of the cause. That principle is clearly stated, in Mossop v. Great Northern Railway Co., by Jervis, L.C.J., with his usual clearness of language and great knowledge of law. "The case proceeds to judgment, and there is a decision in favour of the defendants. An application is then made by the plaintiff for a new trial. That application is refused, and the costs are paid. The suit is then at an end; it is practically out of court. The claim has been adjudicated upon; there is an end of the judge's jurisdiction. Having exhausted his power over the suit, what right has he to revive it?" It is true that Williams, J., throws out a doubt of the principle applying in certain cases; but Willes, J., on the other hand, enforces the law of the Chief Justice. "Immediately that the judge has exercised his discretion to grant or refuse a new trial, the exception to the general rule is exhausted, and the general rule must prevail. The decision once pronounced, there ought to be an end of the matter—specially when it has been acted upon and the fruits reaped."

That is the only authority cited to us by Mr. M'Clymont, but it is not applicable here, where, by the defendants' own affidavit, it is shown that the judge distinctly confined his refusal to the two grounds first urged, but that, upon the plaintiff's counsel applying for leave to make a further application on the ground of misconduct of the jury, the judge went on to say that the plaintiff might apply if affidavits could be produced showing such misconduct. There was, upon these facts, no definite end put to the cause. It was not finally determined. The judge did not dispose of all his discretion in the matter; he only disposed of it on the two grounds first mentioned, but reserved to himself the doubtful discretion to deal with an application made on another ground. Substantially the application for a new trial was adjourned, with liberty to the plaintiff to make further application on another ground. Had the plaintiff made the application on the two grounds, the above case would have applied, and the judge could not have properly reheard what he had already disposed of. But that was not the case. The second application for a new trial was made on fresh grounds, partly on the judge's suggestion. He had not finally determined the cause, but he merely exercised that discretion which he had very properly reserved for dealing with a fresh application; and, looking at the facts as stated in the plaintiff's affidavit produced before him on the second application, I am not prepared at the way in which the judge did exercise his discretion.

The present application for a prohibition must be granted, with costs.

Willes, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite clear that the judge had not fully exercised his discretion upon the application for a new trial, and not finally disposed of the cause. It is said that a judge cannot revise his own judgment in the same cause when once he has determined it. That is so; but here he reserved his power of determining the application, and only exercised that power in regard to two grounds. I am not sure that the case of Mossop v. Great Northern Railway Co. goes quite so far as the defendants' counsel contended. It only shows that in the case under discussion there the judge had finally disposed of it on the grounds upon which he had sought to re-open it. In any rate, it is not a decision affecting this case, where the judge left it open to the plaintiff to apply on a fresh ground. It would be unreasonable and unjust to lay down that, under certain circumstances, where it was shown that some definite gross injustice had occurred, a judge might not re-open a case which he had at the time intended to dispose of. However, there is, at any rate, a distinction between such occurrences where a matter of practice only is involved, and not a matter of jurisdiction; and here it is a matter of practice only which is involved. The judge really dealt with two grounds for the application and adjourned the consideration of other grounds for such application, as he clearly had the right to do.

It has been urged that we have a right to review the grounds on which the application was based. I admit that we have a right to see whether these were so ridiculous or absurd as not to constitute any grounds at all on which a court should act, because in such a case the judge could be held not to have exercised his judgment at all, and we might prohibit a judge from granting a new trial without having practically exercised his judicial function at all. But beyond that limit I think we have no jurisdiction to review the discretion of the judge, and I see no reason in the affidavits here to consider that that limit had been reached. It was a matter for his discretion, and he has properly exercised his jurisdiction upon such an application.

Application refused, and rule discharged.

Crew v. Cummings.

Wood, Claimant. (a.)

Bill of sale—Affidavit by attesting witness—Omission of residence and occupation—Power to order rectification—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 10, sub-sections 2, 12, 14.

The power of a judge to rectify any accidental omission or misstatement in the register under section 14 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, does not enable him to rectify such omission or misstatement in an affidavit filed in the course of registration.

This was an appeal from Field, J., at chambers, who, upon the trial of an interpleader issue before him, ordered the rectification of an affidavit made by an attesting witness and filed in the course of registering the bill of sale, as he was satisfied that the omission contained in it was made through inadvertence.

Kisch, for the execution creditor.—This order is wrong. The judge has no power to make it. The only power of ordering rectifications of this kind is conferred by section 14 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and that is confined to causing insertions to be made in the register. The register is defined by section 12 of the Act, and consists of a book kept by the registrar. The form in Schedule B referred to in section 12 does not contain a space for the address and occupation of attesting witnesses, and that is what the judge has ordered to be inserted. The affidavit is part of the process of registration, and the judge has no power to interfere with it.

Bassett Hopkins, for the claimant.—The order is in accordance with the intention of the Act of 1878. The Legislature meant to prevent injustice being done by accidental omissions, and conferred a general power upon a judge to rectify them. The words "insertion in the register" should be construed as "the process of registration" mentioned in section 10, sub-section 2.

MATHEW, J.—I decide with reluctance that this appeal should be allowed. The objection to the order is technical; but I am not satisfied that the court can decide in the respondent's favour without doing violence to the meaning of the statute. The Act provides that for the purpose of registering a bill of sale it shall be necessary to file an affidavit stating the address and occupation of each of the attesting witnesses. In this case the address and occupation of one of the attesting witnesses were accidentally omitted in the affidavit filed when the bill of sale was given.

The Act, no doubt, intends that such an omission may be rectified, but, unfortunately, in section 14 it expressly provides that the rectification shall be effected by means of a judge's order for the "insertion in the register" of the "true residence and occupation" of the witness. The "register" is defined in the 12th section. It is a book which the registrar is to keep, and in which he is to make an entry of certain particulars relating to each bill of sale in a prescribed form. The form in the schedule to the Act does not contain a space for the addresses and occupations of the attesting witnesses. The language of section 14 is, however, clear, and the order, not being an order for the "insertion in the register" of the omitted particulars, is not in conformity with the Act.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is a flaw in the statute. The order is one which I can well suppose that I should myself have made at chambers, though, perhaps, I might have made it without prejudice to the rights of the execution creditor. But section 14 does not give the judge power to make this order. It is impossible, in the face of the definition of "register" given in section 12, to construe section 14, as investing the judge with any general discretion as to the correction of errors accidentally made in the process of registration.

In my opinion, and I regret that it should be so, the Act does not permit the correction of a mistake in the affidavit which is filed under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, as a part of the process of registration.

Appeal allowed.

PREVIDI v. GATTI & CO. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 7—Notice of action—Service of notice.

A notice of action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, omitted the address of the person injured, and also the cause of injury, and gave the date of the accident incorrectly. But the county court judge who tried the action was of opinion that the defendants were not prejudiced by any defect or inaccuracy in the notice, and that there had been no intention to mislead.

Held, that the notice was valid.

It was proved that the notice was posted, though not in a registered letter, to the defendants on the day before the day on which the six weeks from the accident elapsed, and a reply was received from the defendants' solicitors a few days afterwards.

Held, that this was evidence on which the county court judge might find that the notice was received within the six weeks.

Appeal from a judgment of the judge of the Clerkenwell County Court.

This was an action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, to recover compensation for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, who was in the employment of the defendants, by reason of a defect in the condition of the plant connected with or used in the business of the defendants.

On the 9th of August, 1887, the plaintiff, in the ordinary course of his employment, was descending an ice well belonging to the defendants, who were ice merchants. The method of letting down the blocks of ice into this well and bringing them up again was by means of an iron "dog," which was lowered and raised by a winch and chain. There being no steps or ladder leading down into the well, the defendants' workmen had for years been in the habit of using the "dog" for ascending and descending, standing on the "dog" and holding on to the chain. The plaintiff was descending in this manner, when suddenly he lost his foothold, and fell to the bottom of the well, receiving serious injuries. The alleged defect was a projection on the side of the well, which, as the plaintiff said, came in contact with the "dog," and caused its two limbs to come apart.

At the trial, in order to prove notice of action as required by the Employers' Liability Act, the following letter from the plaintiff's then solicitor to the defendants, dated the 19th of September, 1887, was put in:—"I have been consulted by Mr. Previdi with reference to serious injury sustained by him at your place on the 8th August last. As his injuries are sure to be permanent, I am instructed to apply for substantial compensation, and shall be pleased to hear what you intend to do in the matter before proceeding further." It was proved that this letter was posted, though not registered, on the morning of the 19th of September, the six weeks from the accident elapsing on the 20th; and that a reply came from the defendants' solicitors dated the 23rd of September. Objection was taken to this notice on the grounds, first, that it did not give the address of the person injured; secondly, it did not state the cause of the injury; thirdly, it gave the date of the accident wrongly, the 8th of August instead of the 9th. It was further objected that, the notice not having been served by posting a registered letter under section 7 of the Employers' Liability Act, the plaintiff had not given proper proof of service within six weeks. The county court judge, who tried the case without a jury, was of opinion that the defendants had not been prejudiced by any defect or inaccuracy in the notice, and that there had been no intention to mislead, and therefore he held that the notice was rendered valid by the last clause of section 7. As to service, he thought that the letter of the 23rd of September showed that the notice had reached the party to whom it was addressed, and that the presumption was that it reached him in due course. On the merits the county court judge found in favour of the plaintiff, and gave him judgment for £200.

Bucknill, Q.C. (Percy Gye with him), for the defendants.—This notice was a nullity. In Stone v. Hyde, W. R. 816, 9 Q. B. D. 76, there was only one defect; here there are three. The plaintiff ought at least to have given the defendants notice of what he alleged to be the cause of injury, what defect or negligence he relied on. This is a statutory remedy, and the statute must be complied with: Keen v. Millwall Dock Co., W. R. 503, 8 Q. B. D. 482. Secondly, the plaintiff failed to give any proof of service of notice within six weeks. He did not comply with section 7, which says that notice "may be served by post by a registered letter addressed to the person on whom it is to be served at his last known place of residence or place of business; and, if served by post, shall be deemed to have been served at the time when a letter containing the same would be delivered in the ordinary course of post; and, in proving the service of such notice, it shall be sufficient to prove that the notice was properly addressed and registered." Proof of the postage of an unregistered letter is not sufficient.

Wilbey-Wright (McCullagh with him), for the plaintiff.

Cave, J.—I am of opinion that the points which have been taken cannot succeed. The first point is that no proper notice, as required by the Act, was given to the defendants. The question whether the notice which was given contains all that the Act requires depends, of course, upon the terms of the Act. Section 4 says that an action under this Act shall not be maintainable "unless notice that injury has been sustained is given within six weeks." The notice is required to be a notice that injury has been sustained; it must contain that. Then section 7 requires that it shall contain certain further facts. It says that the notice "shall give the name and address of the person injured, and shall state in ordinary language the cause of the injury and the date at which it was sustained." It is clear that, if section 7 stopped there, the notice must have contained all the matters there mentioned. But at the end of the section we have this clause—"A notice under this section shall not be deemed invalid by reason of any defect or inaccuracy therein, unless the judge who tries the action arising from the injury mentioned in the notice shall be of opinion that the defendant in the action is prejudiced in his defence by such defect or inaccuracy, and that the defect or inaccuracy was for the purpose of misleading." A defect must mean the omission of some particular, and an inaccuracy a wrong statement of some particular. The intention of the Act is that there must be a notice containing particulars to enable the defendant to understand the case and to make necessary inquiries, but if any of these particulars, which are only to assist the defendant, are omitted or incorrectly stated, that is not to make the notice invalid, unless the defendant is thereby prejudiced. In Stone v. Hyde the omission of one particular was held to be a curable defect. Why is not the omission of two particulars or three to be also curable? In the Millwall Dock case the county court judge was not asked to say whether the defendants were prejudiced by the defects in the notice.

The second point taken by the defendants is that the plaintiff gave no proof of service of the notice within six weeks. There was proof that the letter was posted on the 19th, and that an answer came from the defendants' solicitor on the 23rd. I think that was evidence to go to a jury, and, therefore, evidence on which the county court judge might himself find that the notice was received in due time. And I can have no doubt as to what conclusion a jury would come to on such evidence.

A. L. Smith, J.—Section 4 says that the plaintiff must give a notice that injury has been sustained. If the matter depended on section 4 alone this present notice would be sufficient. Then section 7 gives an answer to the question, What shall be the form of the notice? It says it must contain four things: the name of the person injured, his address, the cause of injury, and the date; provided that it is not to be rendered invalid by a defect or inaccuracy, unless the defendant is thereby prejudiced.

Now, looking at this notice—the name it has right, the address it has not, the cause of injury it has not, the date it has wrong. The omission of the address is a defect, so is omitting the cause of injury. The giving a wrong date is an inaccuracy. Then the proviso comes in and says that the notice is not to be invalidated by any defect or inaccuracy if the judge is of opinion that the defendant is not thereby prejudiced, and that there has been no intention to mislead. And here the county court judge has so found. I quite agree with Stone v. Hyde, which is an authority in favour of this notice being a good one. But then we are met with the Millwall case. There, however, the plaintiff did not get the county court judge to say that the defendants were not prejudiced. I think that case does not carry the matter so far as has been contended.

As to service, I think that proof of postage on the 19th was primâ facie evidence of receipt by the defendants on the 20th, on which the judge was entitled to act. The meaning of the statute seems to me to be that if notice is sent as a registered letter, that is to be conclusive that the defendant received it in due course of post.

Appeal dismissed.

The Queen v. Commissioners for Special Purposes of Income Tax. (a.) Revenue—Income tax—Claim for repayment—Discovery and proof of diminution of profits—"Within or at the end of the year"—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 133—23 Vict. c. 14, s. 10.

Section 133 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35 provides that income tax assessed under schedule D. in respect of profits shall be repaid if, "within or at the end of the year," in respect of which such assessment is made, the person claiming repayment "shall find and shall prove . . . that his profits and gains during such year for which the computation was made fell short of the sum so computed in respect of the same source of profit on which the calculation was made."

Held (Grantham, J., dissenting), that the words "at the end of the year" do not mean "at any time after the end of the year," but that reasonable diligence must be used to "discover and prove" diminution of profits, and the claim must be made within a reasonable time after the end of the year in respect of which the assessment is made.

Rule nisi to show cause why a mandamus should not issue against the Commissioners for Special Purposes of the Income Tax, commanding them to order repayment to the Cape Copper Mining Co. (Limited) of certain overpaid income tax, pursuant to 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 133.

The Income Tax Commissioners for the City of London having granted certificates to the above-mentioned company entitling them to repayment of alleged overpaid income tax for the years ending respectively April 5, 1884; April 5, 1885; and April 5, 1886, their claim in respect of the years 1884 and 1885 was subsequently disallowed by the respondents, on the ground that the claim was not made until March, 1887, whereas it was their custom to refuse all claims for repayment of income tax in respect of profits unless made within a year from the end of the year of assessment to which they related.

The affidavit of the secretary of the company stated that in computing the profits for each of the years in question, he had in the first instance taken the average of the three preceding years, but, "upon subsequent examination and comparison," discovered mistakes which gave rise to the diminution in the profits in respect of which the claim for repayment was made.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and A. V. Dicey, showed cause.—The claim for the years 1884 and 1885 was not made until March, 1887. There was not discovery and proof as required by the statute "at the end of the year" for which the profits were assessed. We must attach some definite meaning to the words "at the end of the year." They cannot mean "at any time after the end of the year." Section 10 of 23 Vict. c. 18 limits the time within which a person who is entitled to repayment can enforce his claim, to "three years next after the year of assessment to which the claim shall relate." This does not, however, extend the time for discovery and proof under section 133 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35.

Meadows White, Q.C., and Pollard, in support of the rule.—The company are entitled to claim repayment any time within three years from the end of the year of assessment. This is the only statutory restriction as regards time. If any other restriction had been intended the Act would have expressly stated it, and, consequently, "at the end of the year" must be taken to mean "at any time after the end of the year."

Grantham, J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. The question turns chiefly on the construction of section 133 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35.

The section enacts that an assessed person can demand a return of income tax overpaid on profits "if within or at the end of the year current at the time of making the assessment he shall find, and shall prove to the satisfaction of the commissioners, that his profits and gains during such year fell short" of the sum at which he estimated them. Now in 1842, when this Act passed, the computation of the profits of a mercantile firm trading with distant parts of the world was a matter of greater difficulty than it is in these days of easier communication. It was, therefore, essential that time should be allowed for the computation of profits if it was to be made honestly. The effect of allowing too short a time must have been to tempt mercantile firms to under-estimate their profits in order to avoid the new tax. I can scarcely believe that this danger was not present to the mind of the Legislature in 1842, and I think that this danger would almost certainly result if the narrow construction which has been suggested were put upon the words "shall find and shall prove at the end of the year." When the Act passed it must have been practically impossible for a great firm to calculate their profits so as to be in a position to support a claim for repayment during, or immediately after, the year of assessment.

For this reason I do not think that this is the meaning of the words.

What, then, is the meaning? In my opinion, in construing them it is necessary to separate "find" from "prove," and to confine the words of limitation to the process of discovery. The section, it appears to me, contemplates the discovery of a mistake in the profits when all the transactions for the year of assessment are over, and, so far as it is concerned, allows such a mistake to be proved at any time. This liberty is, however, in my opinion, cut down by section 10 of 23 Vict. c. 14, an Act passed after the operation of the tax had become well understood. The result is that an applicant is confined to three years from the end of the year of assessment.

If this view is correct, the company are in time, as their claim relates to April, 1884, and April, 1885, and was made in March, 1887.

They are, therefore, entitled to repayment. As, however, my brother Cave does not agree with this conclusion, and the court is thus equally divided, I withdraw my judgment.

Cave, J.—I have the misfortune to differ from my learned brother. The question is as to the meaning of the words "at the end of the year" of assessment in section 133 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35. It is said on the one side that they mean "at any time after the end of the year" of assessment, on the other that they mean in some real sense "at the end of the year" of assessment.

Now, in this Act and the subsequent Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 35 taken together, the time for claims is dealt with in five other cases. In three cases—sections 61 and 105 of this, and section 54 of the later Act—the time is limited. Either the statute is silent, or it says "at any time" after some event which it names. On the other hand, in two cases—section 134 of this, and section 18 of the later Act—a definite limit, in the one case of three months, in the other of six months, is fixed. This difference shows, as it appears to me, that the Legislature was careful in this matter of limitation and intentionally fixed, or did not fix, a definite time. I, therefore, conclude that "at the end of the year" of assessment means in some real sense "at the end of the year" of assessment.

The context is "shall find and shall prove." What is the meaning of "shall find and shall prove at the end of the year" of assessment? My opinion is that the words are designedly rather indefinite.

It was not thought desirable to fix a precise time for discovery and proof. The mistake in the profits might be obvious, or might be impossible to discover and prove without a great deal of examination and calculation. What the Legislature intends is that the mistake is to be found and proved "at the end of the year" by the exercise of reasonable diligence on the part of the applicant.

He is to act, not to sleep, upon his right under the statute.

Upon this interpretation of the words, have the applicants shown reasonable diligence as regards discovery and proof? I am of opinion that they have not shown reasonable diligence. They found it impossible to prepare their case as regards the year ending April, 1887, as early as March, 1887; but as regards the years ending April, 1884, they claim nearly three years, as regards the year ending April, 1885, they claim nearly two years after its expiration. What explanation do they offer? The affidavit of their secretary merely states in the most general terms, that he discovered the mistake "upon a subsequent examination of the accounts."

This is, as it appears to me, no explanation at all. I think, therefore, that due diligence has not been shown, and that for this reason the applicants are not entitled to repayment under the statute.

I should add that, in my opinion, section 10 of 23 Vict. c. 14 does not apply. That section refers to both the unlimited and the limited periods, and what it shortens the former does not lengthen the latter.

I think, therefore, that the rule should be discharged, and as my learned brother withdraws his judgment this will be the effect of our decision.

Rule discharged.

Bayley and Hanbury's Cases. (a.)

Company—Shares issued as fully paid up—No registered contract—Transferees with notice—Estoppel—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.

A company incorporated as a company limited by shares contracted with a French association to issue and allot to the French association, or its nominee, shares in the company, such shares to be credited as fully paid up, in consideration of services to be rendered by the French association to the company; and the contract contained a clause that the company should procure registration of this contract before issuing the shares. Two hundred shares were, in pursuance of this contract, issued and allotted to S., the nominee of the French association, as fully paid-up shares, but no money was in fact paid for them by S., nor was any sum of money at the time due by the company to S. and set off against the amount of the shares. S. transferred these 200 shares to H., a director of the company, and H. transferred 100 of them to B., another director. Certificates were issued stating these shares to be fully paid up. The contract with the French association was in fact never registered. The company went into liquidation, and the liquidator put H. and B. on the list of contributories as liable for the full amount of these 100 shares respectively held by them. H. and B. applied to have the certificate of contributories varied by having their names expunged therefrom. The evidence showed that S. and H. and B., when they respectively took the shares in question, were aware of the fact that nothing had been paid on them, but that both H. and B. believed that the contract with the French association had been registered. There was no evidence to show that either H. or B. had given any value for the respective transfers of the shares to them.

Held, on the facts of the case as appearing from the evidence, that neither the company nor its liquidator were estopped from saying either that no payment had been made in respect of the shares, or that the contract had not been registered, and that H. and B. were liable for the full amount of the shares.

Decision of Kay, J., affirmed.

Appeal from Kay, J.

The London Celluloid Co. was incorporated under the Companies Acts as a company limited by shares in February, 1881. The memorandum of association fixed the capital to be £30,000 divided into 3,000 shares of £10 each. The objects of the company were therein stated to be (inter alia) the manufacture, application, and sale of celluloid and the acquisition of any invention capable of being used for any such purpose which might be deemed useful to the company. The articles of association, so far as material to the present appeal, provided (art. 79) that E. H. Bayley and R. W. Hanbury, with certain other persons, be appointed directors of the company; that the shares should be under the control of the directors, who might (subject to the provisions of the Companies Act, 1867) issue any shares as the consideration or part of the consideration for any property acquired by, or work done for, the company, and might issue shares to such persons and on such terms and conditions as they might think fit (art. 7); and that they might, in their discretion, pay for any rights acquired by, or services rendered to, the company, either wholly or partially in cash, or in shares of the company, and any such shares might be issued either as fully paid up or with such amount credited as paid up thereon as might be agreed on (art. 100 (3)).

On July 18, 1882, a contract in writing was entered into between La Compagnie des Matières Plastiques, therein referred to as the French company, and the London Celluloid Co., therein referred to as the English company, whereby the French company agreed to send a competent person to England to give instructions to the English company as to the best mode of manufacturing celluloid and as to the processes and details of such manufacture, and, in consideration of the services to be so rendered by the French company, the English company agreed to cause to be transferred to the French company, or their nominees, 1,000 shares of £10 each in the English company, numbered respectively 1,901 to 2,900 (both inclusive), such shares to be credited as fully paid up, and to be issued and allotted as fully paid up to the French company, and to be deposited at the bankers of the English company in the joint names of the two companies, and if and when the French company performed what they undertook the said shares should be transferred to the French company or their nominees or nominee; and clause 8 of this agreement provided as follows:—"Before the above-mentioned 1,000 shares are issued and allotted in trust as aforesaid the English company shall procure this agreement to be filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies in England." At a meeting of directors of the company, held on July 23, 1883, Hanbury and Bayley being both present as directors, it was resolved that 1,000 shares, numbered respectively 1,501 to 2,500 (both inclusive), be issued and allotted forthwith to the French company and deposited at the English company's bankers in the joint names of the two companies. The French company nominated Albert Sauvée as a person to whom 200 of the said 1,000 shares should be allotted; and on July 30, 1883, at a meeting of directors, Hanbury and Bayley being again present, it was resolved that the shares be allotted to the French company and M. Sauvée, as requested, and certificates were issued and handed to the secretary to be deposited at the bank.

On August 9, 1883, at a meeting of shareholders of the company, it was resolved that the shares issued to the French company under the agreement of the 18th of July, 1882, be handed over to M. Sauvée, acting on behalf of the French company, on the understanding that the said company would give full information and instructions in the manufacture of celluloid on the terms as heretofore.

This contract with the French company was never registered in fact. On December 20, 1884, an order for the compulsory winding up of the English company was made.

E. H. Bayley and R. W. Hanbury were respectively placed on the list of contributories in respect (inter alia) of 100 shares with a liability for the full amount, £10, on each such share.

It appeared from the evidence of the official liquidator, which was not denied by Bayley or Hanbury, that these 200 shares had been allotted originally to A. Sauvée as fully paid up, but that it was not intended by the directors that Sauvée should pay any money for them, and that no sum of money was at any time due by the company to Sauvée, and set off against the amount due under the said shares, but that the shares were given to Sauvée in return for some services alleged to have been rendered or to be rendered by him to the company; that on November 19, 1883, A. Sauvée transferred these 200 shares to R. W. Hanbury, and that on November 24, 1883, Hanbury transferred 100 of the said shares to E. H. Bayley, but that no payments were made on any of the said 200 shares by any person whomsoever. Both Bayley and Hanbury, in their affidavits, stated that until November, 1886, they believed that the contract with the French company had been registered, and they also stated that certificates had been issued stating that the said 200 shares were fully paid up, but they did not, in their affidavits, state that they believed that anything had, in fact, been paid on the said shares or that they had given any value for the shares on the respective transfers to them.

Messrs. Bayley and Hanbury applied by way of summons to vary the certificate of contributories by having their names expunged therefrom. Kay, J., before whom the summons was adjourned on the 25th of January, 1888, made an order varying the certificate of contributories in other respects, but refused to vary it by expunging the names of Bayley and Hanbury from the list of contributories in respect of these 100 shares respectively held by them. Bayley and Hanbury appealed from this refusal.

Marten, Q.C., Millar, Q.C., and Ribton, for the appellants.—The evidence shows that these shares were allotted, and certificates of them issued, as fully paid up, under the contract to that effect with the French company, and it was part of that contract that the English company should procure registration of the contract before issuing the shares. The shares were issued as fully paid up to Sauvée in the ordinary course of business at the request of the French company, who had given consideration for them, and Sauvée took the shares as a bonâ fide holder for value without notice that the contract had not been registered. As against Sauvée, therefore, the company is estopped from saying either that the shares were not fully paid up or that the contract was not registered, and the liquidator of the company is also estopped: Burkinshaw v. Nicolls, 26 W. R. 819, 3 App. Cas. 1004. The present appellants are transferees from Sauvée, and if Sauvée had not notice it is immaterial whether they had notice or not: Barrow's case, 14 Ch. D. 432. [COTTON, L.J.—I doubt the correctness of the opinion expressed in that case, that the equitable rule which protects a purchaser with notice taking from a purchaser without notice applies to a legal liability which can only be got rid of by estoppel.] Even if not estopped under the principles laid down in Burkinshaw v. Nicolls, the company, having broken its contract to procure registration, cannot take advantage of its own wrong. [COTTON, L.J.—Would that be a good plea in bar, or merely give a right to a cross action?] It would be a plea in bar: Molton v. Camroux, 2 Ex. 487, affirmed on appeal, 4 Ex. 17. [FRY, L.J.—To hold the contract to register binding so as to make it a plea in bar would be to render section 25 a nullity.] There is nothing in the Companies Acts to render a contract by the company, to register an agreement, illegal. Again, the undertaking of the English company to register the contract was a condition precedent to the taking of shares at all by the French company, and if that condition is unfulfilled the mere fact that the appellants' names are on the register in respect of the shares will not entitle either the English company or its liquidator to bring an action for calls on the shares: Pellatt's case, 15 W. R. 726, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 527; Reese River Silver Co. v. Smith, L. R. 4 H. L. 64. [COTTON, L.J.—But the appellants are on the register by virtue of an agreement to take a transfer of the shares, which transfer has been assented to by the company.]

The following cases were also referred to:—Arnot's case, 36 Ch. D. 702; In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., 29 W. R. 768, 17 Ch. D. 76. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Hooper v. Lane, 6 W. R. 146, 6 H. L. 443.]

Renshaw, Q.C., and Bramwell Davis, for the respondent, the official liquidator of the company, were not called on to argue the point as to estoppel.—As to the contention that the company—or the liquidator on its behalf—cannot take advantage of its own wrong, assuming that there had been a completed contract by the company to issue the shares as fully paid up and to register that contract, the wrong arises by breach of that contract, and the present appellants cannot raise that point, because the contract, if any, was not made with them but with the French company. Again, the liability of the appellants arises from the fact of their being on the register as shareholders, and it is they, and not the company, who set up the contract in question. But, assuming that the appellants are entitled to the benefit of the contract, if any, made with the French company, it is too late for them, after a winding up has occurred, and no question of estoppel arising, to seek to be relieved from liability in respect of the shares they hold on such a ground, for Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, 28 W. R. 677, 5 App. Cas. 317, and In re Addlestone Linoleum Co., ante, p. 37 Ch. D. 191, show that after winding up a new set of rights intervenes and the liquidator seeks to enforce the statutory rights of creditors. Again, it was the duty of the appellants themselves, being directors of the company, to have that the contract was registered: In re New upon-Tyne Co., Ex parte Brown, 3 W. R. 5, 19 Beav. 97. But in fact there never was any completed contract made by the company with the French company. The seal of the English company was not affixed to the contract, which was merely a draft agreement. The registrar would not have registered such a document.

Marten, Q.C., in reply.—Section 37 of the Act of 1867 shows that it is not necessary that the contract should be under seal of the company, and this contract was in fact signed by Bayley acting under authority in that behalf for the company. The company during its continuance would not have been allowed to take advantage of its own wrong by suing either Sauvée or Sauvée's transferees for calls on these shares, and the fact that a winding up has occurred can make no difference, as the liquidator acquires thereby no new right of action. [FRY, L.J.—The liquidator may acquire a new right of action, but the fact of a winding up having occurred may make some difference: [illegible] v. Turquand, L. R. 2 H. L. 345, 16 W. R. H. L. Dig. 15.] The Court of Appeal in Blyth [illegible], 17 W. R. 194, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 140, thought that the liquidator suing for calls was in a better position than the company, but Burkinshaw v. Nicolls [illegible] Waterhouse v. Jamieson, L. R. 2 Sc. App. 29, [illegible] W. R. H. L. Dig. 8, show that that view is not correct. [COTTON, L.J.—In Waterhouse v. Jamieson the company had made an admission that it had received the money in respect of which the liquidator was suing, and it was held that that admission being acted on by the holder of the shares bound the liquidator; that I think is the effect of that case and also of Burkinshaw v. Nicolls.] Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank and In re Addlestone Linoleum Co. were cases, not of claims by the company or its liquidator against the holders of shares, but claims by the holder against the company for misrepresentation and breach of contract in respect of the issue of the shares. [COTTON, L.J.—Neither of those cases decide that, if what are called outside creditors were all paid, there would be anything to prevent the shareholders making claims of that kind.] The mere fact that the appellants were directors of the company does not impute to them knowledge of everything done or omitted to be done by the company: [illegible] Hallmark's case, 26 W. R. 824, 9 Ch. D. 329; [illegible] Denham & Co., 32 W. R. 487, 25 Ch. D. 752.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kay, J., refusing to relieve the appellants from liability in respect of these shares. The shares in question were issued as shares fully paid up in pursuance of a contract to that effect made by the company, and which the company undertook to register before the issue of the shares, but in fact the contract was not registered as required by section 25 of the Act of 1867. Certificates for these shares were issued stating that the shares were fully paid up. The appellants claim to be relieved from any liability in respect of these shares, on the authority of the case of Burkinshaw v. Nicolls, and they say that these shares were transferred to them in the ordinary course of business as fully paid-up shares, and therefore that they, as holders of the shares, are entitled to treat them as shares fully paid up. Now, M. Sauvée must be taken to have known that these shares were issued as fully paid up under a contract which was to have been registered, but that nothing was in fact paid on them, and I am of opinion that the decision in Burkinshaw v. Nicolls is not applicable to the circumstances of this case. In that case it was found, as a matter of evidence, that the holder of the shares took and held the shares on the faith of a statement made in the certificates that the shares were fully paid up, and the House of Lords held that the matter of evidence which was binding on the company bound the liquidator of the company also. Lord Cairns, at p. 1016, 3 App. Cas., says this: "In the course of business Goulton," who was the original allottee, "transfers for valuable consideration to a transferee a share as to which there is a statement in the certificate made by the company that the money has been paid up. Now I desire to know in what way this section affects a transaction of that kind. It appears to me that it leaves altogether untouched the question of the payment of the money upon the share, which payment it declares shall, no doubt, be an attribute or consideration of every share in the company. But how that is to be or what is to be the evidence of that payment it leaves altogether untouched. If the money is paid and if the receipt is given for it, of course no question could be made but that the transferee would have a right to hold it as a paid-up share; but if a receipt is given for the money by the company, and the share passes into the hands of a person who has given valuable consideration for it and knows nothing about the fact that the payment has not really taken place, there is nothing whatever in this section which would in any way invalidate his title. He comes before the court not in any way affecting to break in upon the enactment which I have read. He says, 'I bow to the words of the enactment. I have not in any way attempted to interfere with it, but I have taken in the course of business a share, in regard to which I have the representation of the company that that section has been complied with.'" Those last words, I think, mean a representation that the section had been complied with in the sense that the company had received the money and that the liquidator was bound thereby. Lord Blackburn says the same thing in effect in somewhat different terms at p. 1026, "In the present case there is no . . . registered contract, and consequently the shares are payable in cash, but then the section does not say that that is to be conclusive against everyone, nor, as it was argued, that anyone who has become a shareholder under any circumstances shall be compelled to pay them up in cash. That is not the statute. These shares were bought, and the liquidator may require payment of the calls unless either it be proved that they were paid in cash or circumstances have arisen which render it unnecessary to prove that. The present case is of the latter description. Now sometimes there is a degree of odium thrown upon the doctrine of estoppel because the same word is used occasionally in a very technical sense, and the doctrine of estoppel in pais has even been thought to deserve some of the odium of the more technical classes of homologation. But the moment the doctrine is looked at in its true light it will be found a most equitable one, and one without which, in fact, the law of the country could not be satisfactorily administered. When a person makes to another the representation, 'I take upon myself to say such and such things do exist, and you may act upon the basis that they do exist,' and the other man does really act upon that basis, it seems to me it is of the very essence of justice that between those two parties their rights should be regulated, not by the real state of facts, but by that conventional state of facts which the two parties agree to make the basis of their action; and that is what I apprehend is meant by estoppel in pais or homologation."

But in the present case there was no representation made that the contract had been registered, and therefore we need not enter into the question as to what might be the result if such a representation had been made. In my opinion a representation that the money had been paid on the shares could only be effectual in favour of those who did not know that the money had not in fact been paid. If a person buys shares on the faith of a representation made by the company that the money on the shares had been paid up, such a representation is binding against the company; and any admission made by the company and acted on by the person who takes shares is binding on the company. I except, however, from the last observation such a singular admission as this if made by the company—viz., that the person taking the shares should be under no liability to pay for them, as the Act of Parliament prevents the shareholder from relying on such an admission.

Then, assuming for the purposes of the argument that there was here a contract in writing made by the company, it was argued that it would have been impossible for the company, while a going concern, to have sued the present appellants for calls in respect of these shares on the ground that no one can take advantage of his own wrong, and the case of Molton v. Camroux was relied on as an authority for that contention. In that case a contract had been made granting an annuity to a man during his life, and the annuity was so paid. No memorial of the grant was, however, registered as required by statute, and after the death of the grantee his legal personal representative brought an action against the grantor to recover the money paid by the grantee as consideration for the grant of the annuity. That case followed the decision in the case of Davis v. Bryan, 6 B. & C. 651, which laid down the rule that it was the duty of the grantee to register, and Bayley, J., said: "Here a bargain was made and the testator paid a consideration of £300, and the defendant agreed for that to pay a certain annuity. The testator received the whole of that which he bargained for, and now his representative says the contract was void from the beginning." In both those cases the personal representatives of a grantee of an annuity, who had received the whole of what he bargained for during his life, sought after his death to set aside the contract on the ground of non-registration; but the non-registration arose from the neglect of their principal to do what was required by the Act of Parliament, and it was held they could not succeed in setting the contract aside. Those cases are obviously distinguishable from the present case. Here the company—or the liquidator of the company—is not suing in respect of any right arising under the contract which the company neglected to register, but is suing in respect of a liability imposed by the Act of Parliament on anyone who holds shares. [The Lord Justice then read section 25 of the Act of 1867, and continued:—] If the company had made a representation that the holder of the shares was under no liability in respect of them, it might—though not necessarily—be that the shareholder would have a right to have his name removed from the register, but that cannot be done after a winding up has occurred, for in that respect the liquidator does not stand in the same position as the company; and so, again, a shareholder cannot, after winding up, compete with outside creditors of the company by bringing an action for damages against the company for misrepresentation or breach of contract. In my opinion, even if the company had entered into a contract not to enforce the liability in respect of the shares, it could not be prevented from bringing an action to enforce that liability, as the contract would have been ultrâ vires and one not allowed by the Act of Parliament.

As to the case of Waterhouse v. Jamieson, that case only went on the same footing as Burkinshaw v. Nicolls—viz., that there had been a statement that the shares had been paid for in cash, which, under the circumstances of the case, was binding on the company, and bound the liquidator also. The appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. And the result, it seems to me, follows as the logical conclusion of the language contained in section 25 of the Act of 1867. [The Lord Justice read the section, and continued:—] Nothing can be clearer than the words of the section stating the obligation imposed on the original holder of the shares, and attaching to the holder on a transfer—viz., that the whole amount of each share must be paid in cash—and the holder can only escape from making payment in one way—viz., by following the mode of escape, and the only mode of escape indicated in the section itself. Can there be any other way of escape on equitable principles? That can only be if the company so acted as to preclude itself from denying that the Act has been complied with, or, in other words, if the company be estopped from saying that the Act has not been complied with—which amounts to this, that there is conclusive evidence as against the company that the Act has been complied with.

Now, as to the mode of working out such estoppel, if the company make a representation to a person other than the original holder that there has been payment in cash, and the shares are taken by that person on the faith of that representation, then neither the company nor the liquidator can say that there has not been payment in cash, and they cannot say that the statute has not been complied with. The case of Burkinshaw v. Nicolls shows such a case of estoppel may arise, but that case also goes further, and contains a ruling as to a point of evidence; but that was only a ruling on the facts and circumstances of that particular case, and a ruling on a point of evidence on the facts of a particular case is not to be crystallized into a general proposition of law. The ruling was that as the evidence showed that the shares were taken in the ordinary course of business as fully paid up, the onus would rest on the company to show that the person who so took them had notice that they were not actually paid up. But how can you apply the doctrine of estoppel laid down in that case in favour of Sauvée or the present appellants? The evidence here is quite inconsistent with Sauvée's being ignorant of the fact that the shares were not paid up in cash; it is clear that he must have known that the shares were not paid up in cash. There is no suggestion on the evidence that could lead us to suppose that the present appellants were ignorant of the fact that the shares were not paid up in cash. The inference I draw from the evidence is that everyone knew that these shares were not paid up in cash, and, therefore, no case of estoppel arises against the company. But estoppel might arise under circumstances not existing here—viz., if there had been a representation made by the company that the contract had been registered. If a company did make such a representation, I do not say but that there might be some estoppel to prevent the company saying that the contract had not been registered, but that would operate, not to enable the company to evade compliance with the Act, but to prevent the company saying that the Act had not been complied with.

Mr. Marten tried to escape on the ground that the company—though not estopped from denying either registration of the contract or payment in full of the shares—would, if allowed now to enforce this demand, be taking advantage of its own wrong. The maxim that a man cannot take advantage of his own wrong is as old as the hills, and is somewhat obscure. In my opinion it means that a man cannot enforce against another, whom he has wronged by a breach of contract or breach of duty, a right that he has acquired against that other by means of such breach of contract or breach of duty. The observations of Bramwell, B., as to the meaning of the maxim, in his opinion submitted to the Lords in the case of Hooper v. Lane, 6 H. L. 443, at pp. 460—1, bear out this construction, and will be found very instructive. What is the wrong here of which the company is said to be taking advantage? It is the breach of contract to register. Can the company, having regard to section 25, preclude itself from demanding payment in cash by such a contract? In my opinion, if that were to be allowed the whole effect of the section would be vain. If the company could lawfully contract not to sue a holder in respect of his shares, even though no contract be filed under section 25—which I think must be admitted to be the law—how can the company hamper itself by a contract which falls short of that? On the ground alone, then, that this contract cannot be pleaded in bar as between the company and Sauvée, Mr. Marten's argument fails. But, again, the right to payment in cash in respect of which the company is suing is not a right acquired through the breach of contract to register. The cases of Mellor v. Camroux and Davis v. Bryan are wholly distinct from this case. [The Lord Justice here referred to the facts of those cases, and continued:—] Then, again, the maxim is only applicable when the right arises against the person to whom the wrong was done or persons clothed with the full rights of that person, and not as against strangers. For these reasons it seems to me that the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

FRY, L.J.—It seems to me that section 25 is fatal to the case of the appellant. That section was for the benefit of creditors of the company, and therefore it is not possible for the company to contract itself out of that section. The result of the section is this, that the whole amount of every share must be paid for. I do not like to follow the words of the section and say "paid in cash"—having regard to what was said by the Court of Appeal in Spargo's case, 21 W. R. 306, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 407—but must be paid for, unless otherwise determined by a contract in writing registered before the issue of the shares. No shareholder can escape the liability to make payment by any other method whatever than by this. No release by the company, no covenant not to sue, no accord and satisfaction, no breach of contract to register, will suffice to discharge the shareholder of that liability. It follows distinctly, therefore, that the argument set up, viz., that the company is precluded from suing because it contracted to register the agreement—fails to the ground. To hold otherwise would, in effect, be relieving the shareholder from the obligation to pay. The object of the provision in section 25 as to registration of the agreement, was to have the agreement filed, so that persons afterwards dealing with the company could inspect it.

As to Waterhouse v. Jamieson and Burkinshaw v. Nicolls, they have nothing to say to the point to be decided here. They only decide that, on the circumstances in those cases, there was a good estoppel against the company and the liquidator, on the question of payment in cash; but they do not show that the shareholder might be relieved from the obligations of section 25. In the present case there are no facts whatever which could lead a jury or a judge sitting as a jury to conclude that either of the present appellants believed that these shares had been paid in cash. I may add that I share the doubt expressed by Cotton, L.J., that there was any valid agreement.

Railway stock — Transfer — Passing of legal estate — Non-delivery to or acceptance by secretary of company — Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16), ss. 14—16.

In 1868 certain stock of the London and North-Western Railway Co. was standing in the names of A. and B., who were trustees of it for C. In that year a transfer of the stock by A. and B. to C. was executed and sent to the company for registration; but, in consequence of its being improperly stamped, and the stock certificate not being sent with it, it was returned by the company unregistered. The proper stamp was then affixed, but no further step was taken until 1872. In 1869 C. purported, by a voluntary deed, to settle the stock. The Act by which the stock was created incorporated the Companies Clauses Act, 1845.

Held, that, at the date of the settlement, the stock was not legally vested in C., for that it was essential to the validity of the transfer that it should be delivered to the secretary of the company, to be kept by him in accordance with section 15 of that Act; and that the transfer in question, being improperly stamped, was rightly returned by the company.

Held, therefore, that the representative of C. must transfer the stock to the trustees of the voluntary settlement.

Decision of Stirling, J. (35 W. R. 713, 35 Ch. D. 598), affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Stirling, J., reported 35 W. R. 713, 35 Ch. D. 598.

The facts fully appear in the report in the court below, and may be shortly stated as follows:—In 1868 a sum of £6,500 Consolidated Ordinary Stock of the London and North-Western Railway Co. was standing in the names of Richard Meredith Richards, since deceased, and the defendant, William Griffith, as trustees of the marriage settlement of Howel Morgan and his wife. Under a power in that settlement Mrs. Morgan had made an appointment of the stock to her husband, and he desired to make a voluntary settlement of it. The trustees executed a transfer of the stock to him, and the transfer was duly delivered to the secretary of the railway company for registration, but the company declined to register it, because it was not properly stamped and the date was incomplete, because the year was omitted. The stock accordingly remained in the names of the trustees, notwithstanding the execution of the transfer by them. In November, 1869, Howel Morgan executed a voluntary settlement of the stock. In 1872 the deed of transfer, duly stamped and dated, was delivered to the secretary of the company, and Howel Morgan was registered in the books of the company as the holder of the stock. He died in October, 1884, and the question was whether the stock passed to his personal representative as part of his estate, or whether the persons claiming under the voluntary settlement were entitled to it.

Stirling, J., held that the stock was not, at the date of the voluntary settlement, legally vested in Howel Morgan, and that his legal personal representative must transfer it to the trustees of the voluntary settlement.

From this decision the legal personal representative of Howel Morgan appealed.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the appellant, contended that the stock passed to Howel Morgan as soon as the transfer to him by the trustees was executed, and that it, therefore, was legally vested in him at the date of the voluntary deed.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Eyre, for the appointee, submitted that, by reason of the irregularity in the transfer, the stock did not become legally vested in Howel Morgan.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Stirling, J., and there is no authority which much helps us to arrive at a conclusion. Howel Morgan executed a voluntary settlement which purported to comprise certain stocks and shares, including £6,505 stock in the London and North-Western Railway. That stock was in the names of the trustees of his marriage settlement, and under his marriage settlement his wife had a power of appointment under which she appointed to him absolutely all the settled funds. That gave him an equitable right to this stock. Previous to the execution of the voluntary settlement he had got from the trustees of the marriage settlement the execution of a voluntary transfer. That, unless it was effectual to pass the legal estate, would not give him any interest at all, because there was no contract for value, but he had an equitable title to the stock under the appointment, which gave him a right to say to the trustees of the marriage settlement, you are trustees of the stock for me. The question is whether, as regards that stock, the voluntary settlement was effectual. The law as regards a voluntary settlement is this. If the settlor transfers all the interest that he is in a position to transfer at that time, then it is effectual. If he does not, then the court will not assist volunteers as against the settlor, and the settlement is ineffectual as regards that which he might have effectually transferred, and which he did not transfer as effectually as he could.

When this case came on at the original hearing a reference was directed to ascertain what stocks and shares were legally vested in Howel Morgan, and it was declared that such as were legally vested in him did not pass by the assignment in the voluntary settlement, but that such as were not legally vested in him, though belonging to him in equity, did pass. I do not think that language very appropriate, for the terms "legal estate" and "legal interest" are terms properly applicable to land. Now what is a share in a company? It is a right to call upon the company for a share of the profits, and to attend and vote at the general meetings. Those are rights which are valuable, and, therefore, the share is saleable in the market. Then the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, gives a power of transferring it, and the question is what, under the circumstances of this case, was the effect of the deed of transfer which was executed by the trustees previous to the voluntary settlement? It was taken to the company before the date of the voluntary settlement, but as it was not duly stamped and was not properly dated the company would not receive it, and it remained in the possession of the transferor. Some years afterwards, in 1872, it was taken to the company, and then the formalities were complied with. It was duly stamped and duly dated, and was received by the secretary of the company, and the stock was registered in the name of Howel Morgan. The question turns upon sections 14, 15, and 16 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

I may say that I do not consider that there is any distinction, as was pressed upon us by Mr. Eyre, between stocks and shares. Section 14, which was very much relied on by Mr. Upjohn, is in these terms:—"Subject to the regulations herein or in the special Act contained, every shareholder may sell or transfer all or any of his shares in the undertaking, or all or part of his interest in the capital stock of the company, in case such shares shall, under the provisions hereinafter contained, be consolidated into capital stock; and every such transfer shall be by deed duly stamped, in which the consideration shall be truly stated; and such deed may be according to the form in the schedule B. to this Act annexed, or to the like effect." Then there is a particular provision in section 16 that no shareholder shall transfer as long as the calls are in arrear, and Mr. Upjohn says that is the only thing referred to by the words of section 14, subject to the regulations herein or in the special Act contained, the "special Act" here being out of the question, as it contains nothing about the transfer of shares. But is that right? If the effect of a transfer of shares is to give to the transferee the rights against the company which the transferor had, the deed alone clearly does not transfer them effectually, for section 15 says:—"The said deed of transfer (when duly executed) shall be delivered to the secretary, and be kept by him; and the secretary shall enter a memorial thereof in a book to be called 'the Registers of Transfers,' and shall indorse such entry on the deed of transfer, and shall, on demand, deliver a new certificate to the purchaser." So something more than the execution of the deed is required, and then at the end of the section we find these words: "And until such transfer has been so delivered to the secretary as aforesaid, the vendor of the share shall continue liable to the company for any calls that may be made upon the share, and the purchaser of the share shall not be entitled to receive any share of the profits of the undertaking, or to vote in respect of such share." That, as regards the company, provides that the deed shall not have any effect so as to put the transferee into the position of the transferor until it has been left with the secretary, and it must be not only left, but accepted by him as properly left, because if the secretary finds it does not comply with the provisions of the Act it is his duty to refuse to receive it. In my opinion here the deed of transfer had no effect until it was duly stamped and was received by the secretary so as to make the transfer effectual as between the company and the transferee. Therefore, as between the company and everyone else, it is clear that, under the Act, what may be called the legal right to this stock at the time of the execution of the voluntary settlement still remained in the transferors as trustees of the marriage settlement. We must then remember the 20th section, which says that the company shall not be bound in any way to have regard to trusts, but shall only have regard to the legal title shown by their register and by the transfer which they have received. I do not place any reliance on the transferee being entered on the register, because when a deed duly executed is left with the secretary it becomes the duty of the company to register the transferee as entitled to the shares, and the mere neglect of the company to do that will not, in my opinion, affect the right of the transferee to be treated as the legal owner of the shares.

Then it was said, where at the time of the voluntary settlement was the legal estate? If "the legal estate" means the right to call upon the company to recognize the title of some person as holder of the shares, it clearly remained in the transferors, in the trustees of the marriage settlement. There is, indeed, a difficulty which I put to Mr. Graham Hastings during the argument. Could these trustees who are on the register have created a subsequent transfer to another person? If their original deed of transfer was for value, they would not be at liberty to transfer to anyone else, and the original transferee could interfere to restrain them from doing so. But if he did not interfere, the transferors, in my opinion, could substitute another person instead of the person they had originally proposed to substitute as the shareholder to be recognized by the company as intended to have, and as having, all the rights against the company which the latter part of the 15th section says shall not be transferred from those on the register to anyone else until certain things are done. In my opinion, therefore, the answer of Stirling, J., to this inquiry was right, and we must say that these shares were not legally vested in the voluntary settlor at the time when he executed the voluntary settlement.

Then comes another question, which does not seem to have been argued at all in the court below. Was the learned judge right in ordering the personal representatives of the voluntary settlor to transfer these shares to the trustees of the voluntary settlement? That, I think, depends upon the questions which I have already been discussing. If the legal title was acquired by Howel Morgan subsequently to the execution of the voluntary settlement, which settlement was effectual if he had only an equitable title when he executed it, the order was right, because it is perfectly clear then that he could not keep to himself the legal interest in shares the equitable interest in which had been effectually settled, and so defeat the voluntary settlement. On the facts which we have here, I come to the conclusion that he by a subsequent act, not his own, acquired the legal estate or legal interest in these shares. The deed of transfer was never delivered to him, and subsequently to the execution of the voluntary settlement one of the trustees to the marriage settlement took the transfer deed to the secretary of the company and presented it duly executed, duly dated, and duly stamped, and in consequence of that act the deed of transfer, which had been imperfect and ineffectual to pass the legal interest, became effectual and passed the legal interest to Howel Morgan, the voluntary settlor, and then he, so acquiring it, could not retain it as against those claiming under the trust which had been effectually declared. It therefore was right to order his personal representative, who stands in exactly the same position as himself, to transfer that legal interest which he took subject to a trust, to the duly constituted trustees of the voluntary settlement. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal fails.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I have nothing to add.

LOPES, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I should not add anything were it not that certain important questions arise with regard to clauses 14, 15, and 16 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. In this case a deed of transfer of the stock in question to Howel Morgan was executed, but Howel Morgan never had that deed of transfer nor the stock certificates in his possession. At the time of the execution of the voluntary settlement the deed of transfer had not been duly delivered to the secretary of the company, but remained in the possession of the transferors, and had not been registered. In expressing what I desire to say I think I need state no more facts than those which I have just mentioned.

Now, in those circumstances, what was the position of Howel Morgan? I think that, in the circumstances, nothing passed to him by the deed of transfer. The words at the end of section 15 are these: "And until such transfer has been so delivered to the secretary as aforesaid, the vendor of the share shall continue liable to the company for any calls that may be made upon such share, and the purchaser of the share shall not be entitled to receive any share of the profits of the undertaking or to vote in respect of such share." Therefore the transferor, until the delivery of the deed of transfer to the secretary, is subject to all the liabilities and entitled to all the rights which belong to a shareholder or stockholder, and, in my opinion, until the requisite formalities are complied with, he continues the legal proprietor of the stock or shares, subject to that proprietorship being divested, which it may be at any moment by a compliance with the requisite formalities. One of those formalities, as I have pointed out, is a delivery of the deed of transfer to the secretary of the company. Whether the registration of the transfer as well as delivery to the secretary is a necessary formality it is not necessary in the present case to express an opinion. The necessary formality of the delivery of the transfer to the secretary in this case was not complied with, and I think at the time of the voluntary settlement nothing had passed to Howel Morgan by the deed of transfer, and he, therefore, was not the legal proprietor of this stock. I may add that the construction which the court is putting upon these sections of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act is consistent with that put upon them by Lord Campbell in the case of Copeland v. North-Eastern Railway Co., where he says: "We are satisfied that the Legislature intended that every transfer should be by deed to be left with the company, which the new taker was to execute, to testify unequivocally his acceptance of the shares and his taking upon himself the liabilities of a shareholder." I think that the decision of the learned judge below was right.

HORNBY v. SILVESTER AND OTHERS. (a.)

Commons—Inclosure—Power to stop up roads—"Old inclosures"—Inclosure Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118), s. 62.

The meaning of the words "old inclosures" in section 62 of the Inclosure Act, 1845, is not limited to old inclosures from the waste, but applies to all old inclosed lands whatever their condition was prior to their being inclosed.

Held, therefore, that the valuer has power to stop up, divert, or alter roads or ways passing through any old inclosed lands in the parish.

Action of trespass for wrongfully breaking and entering the plaintiff's land, and using his roads. At the trial the action was referred to an arbitrator to state a case for the opinion of the court, and accordingly a case was stated, of which the following are the material parts:—

The plaintiff was tenant for life of certain manors called the Hook Manors, situate in the parish of Titchfield. At the time of the inclosure award hereinafter mentioned there were certain roads leading from the village of Hook to the sea-shore. The soil of the roads was part of the demesne lands of one or other of the Hook Manors, and the roads were situate within the parish of Titchfield. These roads were public highways.

On the 11th of May 1866, the valuer appointed under the Inclosure Act, 1845, made his award under that Act, whereby he stopped up the roads above-mentioned leading from the village of Hook to the sea-shore, and set out certain other public roads in lieu thereof. The award was confirmed by the Inclosure Commissioners on the 16th of July, 1866. There was no evidence that the roads so stopped up or any of them were, at the date of the award, roads or ways passing through land to be inclosed by the award or through any old inclosures* in the parish in which the land to be inclosed was situate within the meaning of the Inclosure Act, 1845.

Since the award the new roads ordered to be set out were made, and they had since been repaired by the parish of Titchfield, within which they were situate. None of the roads ordered to be stopped up had since the award been repaired by the parish of Titchfield, the lord of the manor having since that time repaired them. In December, 1884, and February, 1885, the defendants came with horses and carts and passed along the roads ordered to be stopped up, and, breaking open gates which were across the roads, proceeded to the sea-shore, and returned the same way.

The question for the opinion of the court was, what judgment should be entered on the case.

The Divisional Court (Mathew and Cave, JJ.) held that the award was ultrà vires so far as related to the stopping up of the roads in question, as the power of the valuer to stop up roads was, by section 62 of the Inclosure Act, 1845, limited to roads passing through land to be inclosed or through any "old inclosures" in the parish, the words "old inclosures" by section 52 meaning old inclosures from the waste. Judgment was therefore entered for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Rigby, Q.C., and Stuart Moore (T. E. Scrutton with them), for the plaintiff.—The sole point is whether the valuer acted within his powers in making the award—"old inclosures" in section 62 of the Inclosure Act, 1845, include inclosures of cultivable lands as well as inclosures from the waste. They include all old inclosures—i.e., all the land in the parish except village greens and such like places.

They referred to the Inclosure Act, 1801 (41 Geo. c. 109), ss. 4, 5, 8; the Inclosure Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118), ss. 11, 12, 50, 52, 61, 62, 66; Goodtitle v. Seymour, 1 Cr. & M. 19; Rex v. Marquis of Downshire, 4 A. & E. 698.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Mackey, for the defendants.—"Old inclosures" mean inclosures from the waste or common. The preamble shows that the scheme of the Act is to deal with commonable lands. Section 61 speaks of land to be inclosed and ancient inclosures and "other lands in the parish," showing that there are other lands in the parish. The Legislature may well have refused to give the valuer a roving power to stop up any road in the parish, and may have limited his power to the land to be inclosed and old inclosures, which were originally of the same nature as the land to be inclosed.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 28.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question for our decision is whether the valuer had jurisdiction to stop up the roads in question. The roads which were stopped up were public roads, not upon lands to be inclosed by the valuer, nor upon lands shown to have been part of the waste of the manor. Therefore the question comes to this—were they roads passing through "old inclosures" within the meaning of section 62 of the Inclosure Act, 1845. If they were the valuer had jurisdiction; but if they were not he had no jurisdiction. It was contended that these words had a technical meaning, signifying old inclosures of land which had once formed part of the waste. The words of section 62, which give the valuer power to stop up roads, are "roads or ways passing through the land to be inclosed or through any old inclosures in the parish." The phrase "land to be inclosed" receives its interpretation from section 11, which shows that it applies to land subject to rights of common or other rights mentioned in that section. Therefore the roads do not pass through "land to be inclosed." Upon looking at section 27 it is clear that, in considering whether common lands shall be inclosed, the commissioners are to regard, not merely the advantage of the lord and tenants of the manor, but also the health, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants of the towns or villages in or near the parish in which the land proposed to be inclosed shall be situate. The instructions to be given to the valuer under section 34 carry out this view. Accordingly, when the valuer has to determine what new roads are to be set out, he is to consider not merely the persons who will get a portion of the inclosed land as an addition to what they have already got, but also the inhabitants of the whole district. Opportunity is taken of the right to inclose to make it work for the benefit of the whole parish. That being so, there must be power to close roads which are of no benefit to anybody. Section 50 provides that encroachments within twenty years upon the land proposed to be inclosed shall be deemed parcel of the land subject to be inclosed. Section 52 provides that all lands which shall have been inclosed from any land subject to be inclosed under this Act for more than twenty years shall be deemed and taken to be ancient inclosures. It does not say that they are ancient inclosures, but that they shall be deemed to be ancient inclosures. Therefore, upon consideration of all these sections, I can see no reason why we should give to the words "old inclosures" in section 62 any other than their ordinary meaning—viz., inclosures which have existed for a length of time, whether upon common lands or not. The valuer, in laying out new roads, is to take into account the benefit to the whole parish or district, and it naturally follows that he can close old roads which thereby cease to be of any benefit to the parish or district. Accordingly the valuer had jurisdiction to close up these roads, and judgment must be entered for the plaintiff.

FRY, L.J.—I also feel unable to agree with the conclusion arrived at by the Divisional Court. The question turns upon the meaning of the words "old inclosures" in section 62. That section deals with the setting out of new roads and the stopping up, diverting, or altering of old roads. The words are not any old inclosures from the common or waste. If that is the meaning of the words, it is not aptly expressed. What is their natural meaning? But for the judgment of the Divisional Court I should have felt no doubt about it. They seem to me to include all lands which have been anciently inclosed in the parish, whatever their condition was prior to their being inclosed. If they have existed for a length of time as inclosed lands, they are accurately described as old inclosures. Again, looking at the intention of the Legislature, as expressed in the section, I come to the same conclusion. There is no reason why power should be given to stop up roads which have become useless if they were formerly taken from the common; while, at the same time, there should be no such power if the roads were not originally taken from the common. Good reason seems to require that there should exist a power of closing up old roads which have become useless, and good sense and law require us to give the words their wider, and not their narrower, meaning. Further, the words of the statute lead me to the same conclusion. I find phrases indicating the same result. In section 61 "ancient inclosures or other lands in the parish" are spoken of in contrast to "the land to be inclosed." That clearly conveys, to my mind, the intention of the Legislature that the former expression should include ancient inclosures of every kind. A similar argument may be drawn from section 86. Upon the other hand, I find expressions which accurately describe inclosures from the common. For instance, in sections 50 and 52, where the Legislature speaks of encroachments upon and inclosures from land subject to be inclosed under the Act, phrases which accurately describe inclosures from the common, and which show that the Legislature knew how to express itself when it intended to convey that meaning. Moreover, on looking back at 41 Geo. 3, c. 109, we see that, by section 4, the commissioners were required to make a survey of all the lands in the parish, with a view to seeing how they ought to be distributed, and the lands are described as lands and grounds to be divided, allotted, and inclosed (that is, waste land), "and also all the messuages, cottages, cottage gardens, homesteads, ancient inclosed lands and grounds within any such parish or manor." That refers to land which is an ancient inclosure, without regard to whether it was inclosed from the common or not. Similar language is to be found in other sections, to which it is unnecessary to refer.

Lastly, I have referred to Seebohm's treatise on The English Village Community, 2nd ed., p. 14, and I find it there stated that nearly 4,000 private Inclosure Acts were passed between 1760 and 1844, and though I do not profess to have looked at them all, yet I cannot find one Act which uses this language to describe inclosures from the commons.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—This case depends upon what is the meaning of the words "old inclosures" contained in section 62 of the Inclosure Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118. The section provides "that, in the first place, the valuer acting in the matter of any inclosure shall and must before he shall proceed to make any of the divisions and allotments of the land to be inclosed, set out and make public roads and ways, and widen public roads and ways, in or over the land to be inclosed, and stop up, divert, or alter any of the roads or ways passing through the land to be inclosed or through any old inclosures in the parish or respective parishes in which the land to be inclosed shall be situate." If "old inclosures" mean old inclosures of twenty years' standing as defined by section 52 of the Act only, the judgment of the court below is right, and the valuer had no power to stop up the roads in question; but if on the other hand, "old inclosures" mean and include the old inclosures in the parish as well as inclosures of twenty years' standing inclosed from the land subject to be inclosed, then the judgment of the court below is wrong, and the valuer had power to stop up the roads in question.

During the argument I was inclined to adopt Mathew, J.'s construction of the words "old inclosures," and I thought they referred only to inclosures of twenty years' standing mentioned in section 52. After careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that this view cannot be maintained. Section 52 enacts that all lands which shall have been inclosed from any land subject to be inclosed under this Act for more than twenty years next preceding the day of the first meeting shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed and taken to be ancient inclosures. I think the Legislature hereby intended to extend the meaning of the words "old inclosures," and not to exhaust or limit them. This section puts inclosures of twenty years' standing from the land subject to be inclosed in the same category with old inclosures—that is, with old inclosures in the parish, not being inclosures of the land to be inclosed of twenty years' standing, but old inclosed lands in the ordinary sense of those words. It does not appear to me that there is any substantial distinction between old inclosures and ancient inclosures. I find the terms ancient inclosures and old inclosures almost invariably used in private Inclosure Acts to denote inclosed lands in the ordinary sense of the words. These private Acts always direct a survey and measurement of the fields, meadows, and commons, yards, gardens, &c., and other ancient inclosures in the parish or manor, where the inclosure is to take place. It is impossible to peruse these private Acts without coming to the conclusion that the words "old or ancient inclosures" have a recognized meaning, and refer to inclosed lands in the ordinary sense, and not to inclosures from the common.

It is said, however, that this construction is inconsistent with section 61 of the Act which gives the valuer power to make watercourses, &c., because the power is there given to him, not only over the land to be inclosed and in ancient inclosures, but also in other lands in the parish or respective parishes in which the land to be inclosed may be situate. It is said where the Legislature intended more than inclosures of twenty years' standing it used words to signify that intention—for instance, "other lands in the parish"—and that if the power contended for was meant to be conferred by section 62, some such expression would have been used. It occurs to me that larger words were used in section 61, because it is not improbable that it might be necessary to enlarge, cleanse, or alter and improve ditches, watercourses, &c., which were neither in the land to be inclosed nor in any ancient inclosures, as, for instance, by the side of roads. This, while it would account for the difference in language of the two sections, would in no way limit the application of the words "any old inclosures in the parish or respective parishes" as used in section 62. Section 50 relates to inclosures within twenty years, and provides that they are to be deemed parcel of the land subject to be inclosed, unless authorized by the custom of the manor or otherwise according to law—for instance, approvement by the lord of the manor.

In my opinion, the valuer had power to stop up the roads in question, and I think the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed.

SMITH v. PEARMAN. (a.)

Mortgage—Goodwill of business—Foreclosure—Form of order—Special form

Where the property subject to a mortgage included the goodwill of a business, and a receiver and manager had been appointed after the commencement of a foreclosure action, the court inserted a proviso into the order for foreclosure that any person redeeming, or, in the event of foreclosure, the plaintiff, should be at liberty to apply to the judge in chambers for payment of any money in court or in the hands of the receiver.

Coleman v. Llewellin, 35 W. R. 82, 34 Ch. D. 143, followed.

This was a foreclosure action, and the question was whether, under the circumstances of the case, the court would insert into the foreclosure order a proviso that any person redeeming, or, in the event of foreclosure, the plaintiff, should be at liberty to apply in chambers for payment of any money in court or in the hands of the receiver.

The statement of claim alleged (amongst other things) that the plaintiff was the equitable mortgagee of certain leasehold hereditaments in the Strand and at Putney and of the goodwill of the defendant's businesses carried on there, each business being that of a tobacconist.

By an order made in this action on the 23rd of March, 1888, a receiver and manager of the goodwill of the above-mentioned businesses and the other property comprised in the mortgage was appointed. The plaintiff's claim for relief included a claim for an account to be taken of what was due to him under the mortgage, foreclosure or sale, and a receiver and manager.

The action came on upon motion for judgment in default of defence, and the plaintiff asked for such judgment as he was entitled to upon his claim. Minutes of the order now asked for had been prepared, and contained directions in the usual form for an account, payment, and, in default of payment, foreclosure, a direction that the receiver and manager already appointed should be continued, and the following clause:—"Let any person redeeming the premises under the provisions of this order, or the plaintiff in the event of foreclosure, be at liberty to apply to the judge in chambers for payment and transfer of any money or the annuities in court to the credit of this action or in the hands of the receiver."

Beddall, for the plaintiff, asked for an order according to the minutes, and referred to Coleman v. Llewellin, 35 W. R. 82, 34 Ch. D. 143; Jenner-Fust v. Needham, 34 W. R. 709, 32 Ch. D. 582.

The mortgagor did not appear.

CHITTY, J.—A proviso similar to that which Mr. Beddall now asks for was inserted in the foreclosure order in Coleman v. Llewellin, but it appears to have been inserted for special reasons. The question is, whether I can see any special reason for inserting a proviso of that sort in the present order. There is a receiver and manager of the mortgaged property, and as that property includes the goodwill of a business, I think that the proviso now asked for ought to be inserted in the order.

Will—Construction—Gifts to a class described by relationship—Half blood.

The presumption is that a gift in a will to relations includes relations of the half blood, but such presumption may be overruled by the context.

A will contained a gift to the sisters of A., and the question arose whether the sisters of the half blood, as well as the sisters of the whole blood, were entitled to take under the gift.

CHITTY, J.—That the description of nephews and nieces must be contrued as including children of a half blood brother or sister was decided long ago. Grieves v. Rawley, 10 Hare, 63, is an authority for that. I have no doubt that a similar construction must be put upon a gift to a class of brothers and sisters. I may observe that in the Statute of Distributions the provisions that no representative shall be admitted to the brothers' and sisters' children does not exclude children of half blood. As to the general rule of construction being that half blood relations are not excluded from participating in gifts to classes of persons described by relationship, I have no doubt whatever. But in the present case the context seems to me to overrule the presumption. Therefore, as I think, the context has such an effect, I in this case decide against the claim of the half-sisters.

DE RECHBERG v. BEETON. (b.)

Succession duty—Purchaser and successor.

Testator by his will devised certain lands at F., held under leases for lives, of which R.'s was the last, upon trust for R. for his life, with remainders over. B. purchased from R. his life interest in the lands, and then purchased the reversion in fee of the lands. Part of the lands were taken under statutory powers for public purposes, and a sum of money was paid into court as purchase and compensation money.

B. applied for payment out to him of the fund in court, but it was held that B., having bought from the tenant for life, was only entitled to the income of the fund in court during R.'s life, and was a trustee of the corpus for the persons entitled under the testator's will, subject to a lien for the price paid for the reversion.

R. died, and S. became entitled, under the testator's will, to the fund in court.

Held, that, although B. would not have been liable to pay succession duty, S. was liable to pay succession duty on R.'s death, inasmuch as the equity of S. to be substituted for B. was by virtue of the testator's will, and that the effect was the same as if there had been a trust in the testator's will for the purchase out of his estate of the reversion in fee of the lands.

Petition.

This was a petition for transfer to the Countess de Rechberg of a sum of £1,652 1s. 3d. Consols in court, representing the purchase and compensation money for lands at Fulham taken by the London School Board in 1878; and for carrying into effect the compromise of an action brought by the countess against the petitioners, R. J. S. Beeton and Elizabeth Crowle (the legal personal representative of Thomas Crowle).

The countess raised the question whether she was liable to pay succession duty inasmuch as she claimed the fund as the cestui que trust of persons who had acquired the land (which was represented by the fund in court) for valuable consideration.

At the date of his will (August, 1814), and at the time of his death, July, 1820, Thomas, the sixth Viscount Ranelagh, the testator, was entitled to certain leaseholds, held of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for lives, and by his will he devised them to trustees on trust for his son Thomas Heron, the seventh Viscount Ranelagh, for life, with remainders in favour of testator's daughters and their issue, and an ultimate remainder in favour of testator's right heirs in fee. The testator, who died in July, 1820, left one son, the seventh Viscount Ranelagh, and three daughters, of whom the Countess de Rechberg was the survivor. In October, 1876, the seventh Viscount Ranelagh contracted to sell, and by deed of the 16th of March, 1879, conveyed his life interest and all other his estate and interest in the Fulham leaseholds to R. J. S. Beeton and Thomas Crowle. On the 7th of August, 1879, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners (in whom, subject to any legally subsisting lease thereof, the property had become vested for the purposes of their Acts), in consideration of £2,300, conveyed the reversion in fee of the Fulham leaseholds to R. J. S. Beeton and Thomas Crowle as tenants in common, but subject to such trusts, equities, and interests as then affected the leasehold interest under a lease of May, 1825. In 1884 R. J. S. Beeton and Thomas Crowle presented a petition for a transfer and payment of the £1,650 in court and accrued interest representing the purchase-money and compensation for the portions of the Fulham leaseholds which had been taken by the London School Board.

The petition was heard before the late Pearson, J., on the 29th and 31st of March, 1884, and his lordship held that it was impossible for R. J. S. Beeton and Thomas Crowle to purchase the reversion otherwise than as trustees for the persons interested in the will under the trusts of the will, and that, subject to their right to be recouped the purchase-money, they were only entitled to an order for payment of so much of the fund in court as represented income or accumulations of income, and during the life of the tenant for life (the seventh Viscount Ranelagh), or, until further order, to the interest upon the residue of the fund (vide In re Lord Ranelagh's Will, 26 Ch. D. 590). Thomas Heron, the seventh Viscount Ranelagh, the last surviving life named in the lease of 1825, died on the 13th of November, 1886. The Countess de Rechberg was the surviving daughter of the sixth Viscount Ranelagh, and by an order of the 25th of June, 1887, made by Mr. Justice Chitty on petition in an old administration suit of Ranelagh v. Ranelagh, it was declared that, upon the true construction of the will of the sixth Viscount Ranelagh and in the events that had happened, the Countess de Rechberg became, on the death of the seventh Viscount Ranelagh, solely entitled as equitable quasi-tenant in tail to the hereditaments at Fulham, held on leases for lives and devised by, and remaining subject to, the trusts of the said will and, subject to a certain agreement (as to the proceeds of sale of certain hereditaments sold to the Metropolitan District Co.), to the moneys representing the sale of such of them as had been sold. She had since executed a disentailing deed.

In December, 1886, the Countess de Rechberg had commenced an action against R. J. S. Beeton and Elizabeth Crowle claiming a declaration that they were trustees for her of the land taken by the London School Board subject to a lien thereof in their favour for the purchase-money of £2,300, with interest from the 13th of November, 1885, and that, subject to such lien, the plaintiff was absolutely entitled to the sum of £1,632 1s. 3d. in court, and that the defendants, on payment by the countess to them of the £2,300, with interest, might be ordered to convey the land to the countess and concur in all necessary acts for procuring the transfer and payment to her of the £1,632 1s. 3d. in court. A compromise of this action had been agreed to upon the terms—(1) that the £1,632 1s. 3d. in court should be transferred to the countess; (2) that upon payment by R. J. S. Beeton to the countess of £200 (for costs) the countess should execute to him a conveyance and release of her equitable interest.

The present petition was presented for the purpose of carrying this compromise into effect, and for payment of the costs of the petition under section 80 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act by the London School Board, except so far as they had been increased by this litigation between the countess and the petitioners, and for payment to the countess of the fund in court.

J. G. Wood, for the Countess de Rechberg.—Succession duty is not payable in respect of the fund in court, which represents the value of the reversion which was purchased for value by Beeton and Crowle from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and never in any way formed part of, nor was it derived from, the estate of the sixth viscount, and the case therefore falls within Fryer v. Morland, 25 W. R. 21, 3 Ch. D. 675.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.

CHITTY, J.—Mr. Beeton and Mrs. Crowle bought the reversion of property which was held under leases for lives, which leases for lives were subject to the trusts of the sixth viscount's will. If Mr. Beeton and Mrs. Crowle had bought on their own account and had been entitled to hold on their own behalf there is no question that succession duty would not have attached. But it cannot be contested, and, in fact, it is admitted, that if there had been a trust in the will of the sixth viscount out of his estate to purchase this reversion, then the person who came in on the death of the seventh viscount succeeded to the estate by virtue of the trusts of the sixth viscount's will, and would have had to pay duty upon that succession. That being so, it appears to me that the circumstances of this case bring it exactly within the second, and not within the first, class of cases I have described. Mr. Beeton and Mrs. Crowle could not hold for their own benefit. Why? Because they were affected by the trusts of the sixth viscount's will. It is said that they paid the money themselves; and so they did, because they attempted to set up an independent title for themselves; but it was decided by Mr. Justice Pearson that they could not hold the reversion for their own benefit. The reversion was acquired for the benefit of those interested under the sixth viscount's will; but Mr. Beeton and Mrs. Crowle, having paid the purchase-money, were entitled to be repaid, and unquestionably they had a lien for the amount upon the reversion, which was held by Mr. Justice Pearson upon the facts to be part of the testator's estate. The result, therefore, is that, although there has been some compromise, the details of which are immaterial, Mr. Beeton and Mrs. Crowle were entitled to be paid, and have been paid, through the medium of that compromise, the £2,300 which was paid as purchase-money. It comes exactly to the same thing as if there had been a trust in the sixth viscount's will for the purchase of the reversion, and so the duty attaches.

In re TAYLOR.

WHITBY v. HIGHTON. (a.)

Will—Codicil—Confirmation of will—Married woman—Power of appointment—Intestacy—After-acquired property.

A married woman who had a power of appointment over certain property under her marriage settlement, by her will, dated in 1883, in exercise of the power, and "all other powers enabling her in this behalf," appointed, gave, and bequeathed all the property comprised in the settlement, and over which she had any power of appointment, to certain persons. She subsequently, on the death of her husband, became entitled to certain real estate and personal estate, and made a codicil to her will, devising certain real estate, described as having come from her late husband, but without confirming her will.

Held, that the will was confined to the settlement property, and there was an intestacy as to the subsequently-acquired personal estate.

Mrs. J. C. Taylor had, under her marriage settlement, dated in 1867, a power of appointment over £15,000 worth of securities, and was entitled to jewels and furniture for her separate use.

On the 20th of October, 1883, Mrs. J. C. Taylor made a will, in which, after briefly reciting that she had a power of appointment under her settlement, she proceeded as follows:—"Now I do by this my will, in exercise and execution of the power or authority given or reserved to me by my said marriage settlement, and of all other powers, if any, enabling me in this behalf, appoint, give, and bequeath all the property of whatever nature comprised in the said settlement and over which I have any power of appointment or disposition by will," to trustees "upon trust to pay" an annuity of £2 a week to her brother, and, subject thereto, "upon trust to pay to my husband the income of the whole of the said trust property (except of that portion the income of which he shall be entitled to under the provisions of the said settlement) during his life, and to permit him to retain possession of any portion of the trust property not yielding income during his life"; and at his death the testatrix made various dispositions amongst her relations, dividing the trust fund into moieties, to one of which moieties certain charities ultimately became entitled.

In August, 1885, Robert Taylor, the husband of the said J. C. Taylor, died, and by his death Mrs. J. C. Taylor became entitled to certain real estate and to personal estate of the value of £7,500.

On the 14th of December, 1885, Mrs. J. C. Taylor made a codicil, which, so far as is material, was as follows:—"Codicil to my will.—Certain property having become mine by the will of my late husband, to wit" [the testatrix here specified certain real estate only] "I do give the whole of the aforesaid houses and lands to my brother for his sole use and benefit."

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at Law.

On the 27th of January, 1886, the testatrix died.

On the 17th of May, 1887, an originating summons under order 55 was taken out by one of the beneficiaries and next of kin for the opinion and determination by the court of several questions arising in the administration of the testatrix's estate, but the only question argued and calling for a report was whether the effect of the will and codicil was to pass the after-acquired property, both real and personal, or whether only the property included in the settlement and the specifically-mentioned realty passed, in which case there would be an intestacy as to the £7,500 acquired from the husband.

Sir A. Watson replied.

Chitty, J.—If a married woman, having power to dispose by will of certain property, duly makes a will as a married woman, and then, at the death of her husband, afterwards by codicil confirms that will, the will is, after all, though confirmed, only a will disposing of the particular articles mentioned and contained in the will. If, however, a married woman makes a will in a form which I will state as being the simplest form that I can think of to give rise to the question—namely, "I hereby appoint and give all property of whatever nature that at the time of my death I shall be capable of disposing of by will," and afterwards becomes discovert, and then makes a codicil confirming that will, it appears to me to be pretty plain (though it is not necessary to decide it) that that would be a will which would operate on all the property which at her death she was capable of disposing of—in other words, it would operate as a will of an unmarried woman.

The question that I have to decide is, in my opinion, simply a question of construction. The point is whether the will which this lady made when she was covert applies to any other property than the property which is comprised in her marriage settlement. [His lordship stated the settlement shortly, and continued:—] Now, she made her will during the coverture in these terms. She recites very shortly the settlement, and she says that by it certain bank, gas, and other shares comprised in the schedule, along with certain moneys, furniture, and other property therein specified, were effectually vested in certain trustees upon certain trusts "in favour of me and my said husband and our children, if any, and, subject thereto, in trust for such person or persons, and for such purposes as I, notwithstanding coverture, shall by my will, or any codicil thereto, appoint, and in default of such appointment upon the other trusts in the same settlement expressed." That being the short recital in the will of the settlement, though not perfectly accurate, but sufficient for the purpose, she goes on to make this disposition. [His lordship then stated the will, and continued:—] Now the question is whether the words "all the property of whatever nature comprised in the said settlement, and over which I have any power," &c., are confined to the property comprised in the settlement, or ought to be extended, upon the true construction of the words used, to all the property as to which at the time of her death she should have any power of disposal. The words are not "or over which," but "and over which."

Now the court has no right to alter a testator's language, and to substitute "or" for "and," unless it has such a context as justifies the court in coming to the conclusion that "and" was written for "or," and there must be a sufficiently strong context to enable the court to alter any word found in a will, or it may be in some cases two constructions are open, and it may be that, having regard to the rest of the will and the nature of the disposition and other matters proper to be considered, the court can find sufficient reason for changing the word. The late Master of the Rolls used to put it in this way. He said, "Alter words only where you find one word written in mistake for another"; and a favourite example of his was this: If a man having a black horse, which he was in the habit of riding, should say, "I give the black cow which I am in the habit of riding," it is plain that is a mistake. It is plain that "cow" would be written for "horse," and there would not be the slightest difficulty in changing that word. That was a good illustration of his to show the limit of the rule as to altering words upon which he generally, indeed I believe always, acted. Now take a gift "of all my lands in Middlesex, and the title deeds of which will be found in a certain box," it is quite plain that the essential part of the description in such a gift are the words "lands in Middlesex," and the additional words that are thrown in would not be held to be any part of the description itself, but something which the testator considers to be convenient to state in his will with reference to the property. There are many cases in the books with regard to parcels of real estate which are founded on this principle. The expression "and which" is rather peculiar to conveyancers, and I think in this will the words "and over which" are not intended to be any part of the description of the widow's property. I think it would not be right to interpose any words in this will by which I might get over, on behalf of the respondents, a difficulty which stands in the way. I think it would not be right to read it thus: "All the property of whatsoever nature, first, which is comprised in the will, and, secondly, over which I have a power of appointment." I think that would be inserting in this will unjustifiably words which the testatrix has not used. I think that the essential leading part of the description is, "All the property of whatsoever nature comprised in the said settlement," and that these words "and over which" are mere words of innocent addition, not enlarging the property which it is intended to dispose of by will. They are words, according to the construction which I adopt, unquestionably of surplusage, but that appears to me not to be an objection to the construction which I put upon them. I think it really reads thus: "The property comprised in the settlement, and I have over that property a power of appointment or disposition by will."

Then it was said, if I adopt this construction I should not give effect to the words "give and bequeath"; but after what I have stated with regard to the contents of the settlement, it is obvious, with regard to the jewels, "give and bequeath" was not an inappropriate term, and there is nothing in the use of those words in the will which enables me to say judicially that they show an intention that she should comprise in her will property which was not included in the settlement.

Some observations were made with reference to a description of the property which occurs in another part of the will. The term used is "said trust property." Very little light is thrown on the construction of the will by the use of that term, because she appointed whatever she has appointed by the earlier part of the will to certain persons as trustees, and begins by saying "Upon trust to pay £2 a month out of the income." Therefore "the said trust property" in the rest of the will may be ascribed to all the property which is included in the will of which she is declaring the trusts

But I have looked at these words and the disposition that is made by the will under the trusts of the will, and examined them with some care, and the result is this, that they afford no argument favourable to those who say that the intention was to embrace all the property which she could at the time of her death dispose of, whether covert or discovert, and they add, if anything, some slight additional force to, and somewhat strengthens, the conclusion I have arrived at upon reading the operative words themselves, because the trusts will be found appropriate to the property comprised in the settlement.

After this first trust to pay the annuity to her brother, she goes on:—"And, subject thereto, upon trust to pay to my husband the income of the whole of the said trust property excepting that portion the income of which he shall be entitled to under the provisions of the settlement"—words which aptly refer to the life interest which he had in the moiety of the main fund comprised in the settlement during his life. She goes on:—"and permit him to retain possession of any portion of the said trust property not yielding income during his life." Those words, again, are apt words to refer to the jewels and the furniture, in which he had, as is apparent from what I have already said, no life interest whatever.

This examination of the trusts declared strengthens, but I think in a very slight degree, the conclusion that I have come to upon the operative part of the will itself.

Then I come to the codicil, and I will assume in favour of the respondents for whom Mr. Whitehorne appears that the words "codicil to my will" were sufficient to confirm the will, and I think that would be the right construction. The codicil, except by those words "codicil to my will," does not confirm the will in any way. The bequest in the codicil runs thus:—"Certain property having become mine by the will of my late husband, the Rev. Robert Taylor, to wit." And she describes particularly a house and buildings and so forth, and she makes by this codicil a disposition of that property and that property only.

The result, therefore, is this, to my mind, that the codicil has confirmed the will as it stood and does not in any way alter the construction of the will, and that, so far as relates to any property that was within the ambit of the will, this codicil operates as a confirmation—it does not enlarge the scope of the will so as to make the will include any other property than that which, according to its true construction, is comprised in it. The confirmation, I think, is sufficient to get over any difficulty that might have arisen with regard, say, to the furniture. There is an intention shown that the furniture should pass by the will, but the power of disposition which she had by the will was, as I have shown, a contingent power, and that power failed by reason of her having survived her husband, and in that way under the trusts of the settlement the furniture became hers, but I think to this extent the codicil has set up the gift of the will, it has set up the disposition of the furniture and made that which, if she had not confirmed her will, would only have been an execution of a power, now a gift, and in that way I give effect to the words "give and bequeath." And, so far as is necessary, I make a similar observation with regard to the jewels, which do not, as I have already said, stand exactly in the same position as the furniture. There was no contest raised before me in regard to the jewels and furniture, but I have mentioned these points because they were made use of for the purpose of argument in regard to the true construction and the true effect of the lady's dispositions. I therefore declare that the lady died intestate as to so much of the personal estate as is not comprised in the settlement.

In re Worswick. Robson v. Worswick. (a.)

A coal mine was leased by the trustees of a charity to W., with a provision that a belt of coal should be left by the lessee, at the boundaries of the mine, of sufficient thickness to keep out the water. An adjoining mine was also leased by the trustees, with a similar provision, to a company which worked another adjoining mine belonging to an adjoining owner. The mines in the occupation of the company were damaged by flooding alleged to have resulted from the improper working by W. of the mine leased to him, which caused the water to flow into that part of the company's mines not leased to them by the trustees, and thence into the mine which was leased to them by the trustees.

W. died, and an action was brought by the company against his executors for damages for injury to the company as lessees, by the flooding of the mines in their occupation, but the action was compromised on payment of compensation. On behalf of the executors shorthand writer's notes of the proceedings were taken. An action was afterwards brought for the administration of W.'s estate, the executors being defendants; and the trustees of the charity put in a claim for damages for injury to them as owners of the mine leased to the company by the flooding of the mine.

Held, that the trustees were entitled to the production of the shorthand writer's notes taken on behalf of the executors in the former action.

Adjourned summons.

The chaplain and poor of Wyggeston's Hospital being possessed of the minerals underlying the Manor of Swannington, in the county of Leicester, by an indenture dated the 31st of December, 1852, demised a mine under that manor to William Worswick, since deceased, for a term of thirty-five years from the 29th of September, 1852; and it was provided in the lease that a belt of coal should be left by the lessee at the boundaries of the mine of sufficient extent and thickness to keep out the water.

The chaplain and poor of the Wyggeston's Hospital also, by leases, dated respectively the 9th of January, 1871, and the 22nd of June, 1875, demised another mine under that manor, and adjoining the mine leased to William Worswick, to the Snibston Colliery Co. for the term of forty years from the 25th of March, 1869. The Snibston Colliery Co. also worked an adjoining mine leased from the owners of property adjoining that of the chaplain and poor of the Wyggeston's Hospital.

The Snibston Colliery Co.'s mines became damaged by flooding, alleged to have resulted from the improper working by William Worswick of the mine leased to him, which caused the water to flow into that part of the Snibston Colliery Co.'s mines which was not leased to them by the chaplain and poor of the Wyggeston's Hospital, whence it found its way into that part of the mines which was leased to them by the chaplain and poor of the Wyggeston's Hospital.

The action was brought in 1882 for the administration of the estate of William Worswick, who died in 1871, his executors being the defendants.

In 1884 the Snibston Colliery Co. brought an action against the executors of William Worswick to recover damages for injury caused to them, as tenants, by the flooding of the mines in their occupation. The action came on for trial before Pearson, J., on the 15th, 16th,

(a.) Reported by J. Trustram, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

17th, 18th, and 22nd of February, 1886, and shorthand notes of the proceedings were taken by the defendants. The action was subsequently compromised, the defendants agreeing to pay to the plaintiffs £2,000 at once, and also an annual sum of £200 for twenty-five years from the 25th of March, 1885.

The chaplain and poor of the Wyggeston's Hospital carried in a claim in the administration action for damages for injury caused to them as landlords by the flooding of their mine leased to the Snibston Colliery Co., through the alleged improper working by William Worswick of the mines in his occupation, and in support of their claim, after an affidavit as to documents had been made by the defendants, administered interrogatories, asking, among other things in reference to the action by the Snibston Colliery Co., "Did not the defendants or some or one and which of them cause to be taken shorthand writer's notes of the evidence in the said action?"

The defendants replied that they had already made an affidavit of documents and submitted that they ought not to be required to answer the interrogatory as to the shorthand writer's notes.

The present summons was taken out by the chaplain and poor of the Wyggeston's Hospital, and the question was raised whether or not the shorthand writer's notes were privileged from production.

Higgins, Q.C., and Nalder, for the summons.—The shorthand writer's notes taken on behalf of the defendants are liable to production.

They referred to Nicholl v. Jones, 13 W. R. 451, 2 H. & M. 588; Rawstone v. Preston Corporation, 33 W. R. 795, 30 Ch. D. 116.

Everitt, Q.C., and Butcher, for the defendants.—The shorthand writer's notes taken on behalf of the defendants in the action against them by the Snibston Colliery Co. are privileged: Pearce v. Foster, 33 W. R. 919, 15 Q. B. D. 114.

North, J.—Then the question is whether the shorthand writer's notes are privileged from production. I think they are liable to production. It seems to me that there is nothing privileged or confidential in any such notes. In the case of Nicholl v. Jones Wood, V.C., ordered them to be produced. Then, again, in Rawstone v. Preston Corporation, which is the latest case on the subject, Kay, J., held that they were not privileged and must be produced. In another case, Nordon v. Defries, 30 W. R. 612, 8 Q. B. D. 508; I, myself, in chambers, made an order for the inspection of certain shorthand notes, but on appeal to a divisional court the judges took a different view and held that the shorthand notes were protected from inspection on new grounds. In giving judgment Mathew, J., says:—"We are therefore disposed to give credit to the suggestion that the notes were intended to form materials for the guidance of the plaintiff and his counsel in the prosecution of the present action, and we think that the affidavit of the plaintiff is sufficient to enable us to act upon this view. In accordance, therefore, with the principles laid down in Southwark Water Co. v. Quick, 26 W. R. 328, 3 Q. B. D. 315; Anderson v. Bank of Columbia, 24 W. R. 624, 2 Ch. D. 644; and McCorquodale v. Bell, 24 W. R. 399, 1 C. P. D. 471, we are of opinion that the shorthand notes are protected from inspection and that the appeal must be allowed." In that case Nicholl v. Jones was cited. The question here is whether shorthand notes are privileged at all. That is not the point upon which the judges decided in that case. I shall follow the case of Rawstone v. Preston Corporation. If the solicitor had taken shorthand notes like a shorthand writer, or if counsel had taken such notes they would not be privileged. Under the circumstances I make an order that the defendants produce the shorthand notes. There may be a further question whether the documents referred to in the shorthand notes are liable to production.

Copyright — Infringement — Dramatization of novel — Multiplying copies — Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), ss. 2, 3.

Although the mere dramatization of a novel and the representation of the play upon the stage are not infringements of the copyright of the novel, yet the making copies (although not in print) of a play in which numerous passages from the novel have been inserted is "multiplying copies" of the novel within section 2 of the Copyright Act, and is consequently an infringement of the copyright.

This was an action brought by the proprietors of the copyright in a novel called "Little Lord Fauntleroy" for an injunction to restrain the defendant from infringing their copyright.

The defendant had dramatized the novel, and caused his play to be performed on the stage. The play was also called "Little Lord Fauntleroy."

The plaintiffs did not complain of the dramatization of the novel and the representation of the play upon the stage.

The alleged infringement was that for the purpose of producing the play the defendant had made four copies of the play either in manuscript or by the aid of a type-writer. One of these copies had been deposited with the Lord Chamberlain; the other three remained in the possession of the defendant or the persons employed by him in representing the piece.

Very considerable passages in the play had been abstracted almost verbatim from the novel. Thus in the first act about one-fourth of the lines had been taken from the novel, and some of the passages so extracted were prominent and striking parts of the dialogue.

It was stated at the bar that the defendant claimed the right to make such further copies of the play as might be necessary to enable him to give further representations of his piece in London and elsewhere.

Hastings, Q.C., and E. F. Studd, for the plaintiffs, after pointing out the passages which had been extracted verbatim from the novel, contended that the burden was on the defendant to show that there was an infringement within sections 2 and 3 of the Copyright Act, 1842. They argued that, although the defendant might be entitled to dramatize, yet he was not entitled to make copies.

They cited Coleman v. Wathen, 5 T. R. 245; Murray v. Elliston, 5 B. & A. 657; Reade v. Conquest (No. 1), 9 W. R. 435, 9 C. B. N. S. 755; Reade v. Lacy, 7 W. R. 531, 1 J. & H. 524; Reade v. Conquest (No. 2), 10 W. R. 271, 11 C. B. N. S. 479; Tinsley v. Lacy, 11 W. R. 876, 1 H. & M. 749; Novello v. Sudlow, 12 C. B. 177; Ager v. Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., 26 Ch. D. 637, 32 W. R. Dig. 49.

Buckley, Q.C., and Lewis Coward, for the defendant, argued that dramatization did not mean merely representing on the stage.—It meant, in the first place, producing a play in writing; and as sending a copy to the Lord Chamberlain was a condition precedent to acting, one copy, at least, must be produced. The question was, had the production of the copies interfered with the sale of the novel: Scott v. Stanford, 15 W. R. 757, L. R. 3 Eq. 718.

They also cited Bell v. Whitehead, 3 Jur. 68; Whittingham v. Wooler, 2 Swan. 428.

Hastings, Q.C., in reply, cited Chatterton v. Cave, 26 W. R. 498, 3 App. Cas. 483; Hole v. Bradbury, 28 W. R. 39, 12 Ch. D. 886.

Stirling, J., after stating the facts, proceeded:—I have now to decide whether the plaintiffs are entitled to complain of what the defendant has done and intends to do; and, if so, to what relief they are entitled. It was not disputed that the plaintiffs' title depends on statute. There have been three principal Acts of Parliament on the subject of copyright. By the earliest (8 Anne, c. 19) there was conferred on authors the sole right and liberty of printing and reprinting. In the second (54 Geo. 3, c. 156) copyright is styled "the sole liberty of printing." The Act now in force (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45) defines (section 2) copyright to be "the sole and exclusive liberty of printing or otherwise multiplying copies of any subject to which the said word is herein applied." And by section 3 it is enacted that "the copyright in every book which shall after the passing of this Act be published in the lifetime of its author shall . . . be the property of such author and his assigns." By section 2 the word "book" is to be construed to mean and include "every volume, part, or division of a volume." Notwithstanding the language of the Act, not every verbatim reprint of part of a book is an infringement of copyright. In the words of Lord Hatherley in Chatterton v. Cave, "Books are published with an expectation, if not a desire, that they will be criticized in reviews, and, if deemed valuable, that parts of them will be used as affording illustrations by way of quotation or the like, and if the quantity taken be neither substantial nor material, if, as it has been expressed by some judges, 'a fair use' only be made of the publication, no wrong is done and no action can be brought." In Tinsley v. Lacy the question arose whether it was a fair use of a novel to print and publish a drama founded on it. In that case it was proved that a portion of the drama, including the most striking incidents and much of the actual language, had been taken bodily from the novel. And it was in evidence that the profit on the publication of the play had been almost inappreciable. Nevertheless, a perpetual injunction was granted against the printing and publishing of the play without any preliminary inquiry as to damages. In giving judgment Lord Hatherley (then Vice-Chancellor) says: "Although it is open to any actor or declaimer to recite a poem or other work written by another as publicly as he pleases, it could scarcely be said that he would be at liberty on the occasion of his recitations or performance to distribute copies of the work for sale among the audience, nor could it be any excuse to say that the copies were intended merely to assist the audience, who desired, while listening to the recitation, to have a copy of the words in their hands." In Novello v. Sudlow it was decided that the printing or multiplying copies of a piece of music, not for sale, but for gratuitous distribution among the members of a musical society, was a violation of the right of property vested in the owner of the copyright in the piece. It must therefore follow that the gratuitous distribution among the audience of copies of a poem or other work which an actor or declaimer thought fit to recite in public would be an infringement of the copyright therein. This being so, I am unable to see that the multiplication of an indefinite number of copies of a play (which, if printed and published, would be an infringement of copyright) for the purpose of enabling that play to be publicly represented can be otherwise than an infringement. It is said, however, that anyone has a right to dramatize a novel—that is, not merely to conceive, but to write, dramas, and to do everything necessary for that purpose, including the making of a copy for the Lord Chamberlain. In my opinion this is a fallacious mode of stating the right. The statute confers on the author of a book and his assigns "the sole and exclusive liberty of printing or otherwise multiplying copies" of the book. By implication every person other than the author and his assigns is prohibited from printing or otherwise multiplying copies of the book. But this is the only restriction imposed on the public, and, subject to it, every person is free to make such use of the book as he pleases. So long, therefore, as he does not print or otherwise multiply copies of the novel, any person may dramatize it, and may cause his drama to be publicly represented. But if, for the purpose of dramatization, he prints or otherwise multiplies copies of the book he violates the rights of the author no less than if the copies were made for gratuitous distribution. The authorities appear to me to be consistent with this view. In the early cases, Coleman v. Wathen, and Murray v. Elliston, the point raised in the present action could hardly have arisen, for they were decided at a time when the statutes in force conferred only an exclusive right of printing. It is unlikely that any copies (other than manuscripts) were used for the purpose of the representation of the plays which were the subject of these actions; and such manuscript copies would not have been infringements of the author's rights. The case most relied upon for the defendant was Reade v. Conquest (No. 1). It was decided on a demurrer to a count of the declaration which alleged that the defendant without the consent of the plaintiff dramatized the plaintiff's book, and publicly represented and performed or caused to be represented and performed as a drama the said book. The declaration does not allege that the defendant printed or otherwise multiplied copies of the book. In the course of the argument the defendant's counsel says (see p. 764):—"It is not suggested that the defendant multiplied copies of the plaintiff's book. The complaint is that the defendant has dramatized the story and caused it to be represented at the theatre." In giving judgment Williams, J., says, "The right claimed by the plaintiff was two-fold. First, he contended that his statutable right was infringed by the act of the defendant. It was held, however, in the case of Coleman v. Wathen, that representing a public dramatic piece of the plaintiff's upon the stage was not a publication within the meaning of the 8 Anne, c. 19, so as to subject the defendant to the penalty imposed by the statute, and the 2nd section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, defining 'copyright' to mean 'the sole and exclusive liberty of printing or otherwise multiplying copies of any subject to which the said word is herein applied' seems to furnish a complete answer to the plaintiff's claim under the statute." That case, therefore, seems to me to have been decided on the ground that the plaintiff's statutory right of multiplying copies of his book was not infringed. In the present case I am of opinion that if the defendant had caused his play to be printed and published there would have been as substantial an infringement of the plaintiffs' rights as occurred in Tinsley v. Lacy. For the reasons already given I think that what has been done, and is intended to be done, by the defendant constitutes an infringement of the plaintiffs' legal rights no less than if the defendant had printed and published his play; and, notwithstanding the smallness of the damage, I consider myself bound by the authority of Tinsley v. Lacy to grant a perpetual injunction to restrain the defendant from printing or otherwise multiplying copies of his play, containing any passages copied, taken, or colourably altered from the plaintiffs' book, so as to infringe the plaintiffs' copyright in the novel or tale entitled "Little Lord Fauntleroy." The plaintiffs further insist on an order directing the delivery up for cancellation of the existing copies of the play; and they rely on the decision in Hole v. Bradbury. In that case, however, as I understand the facts, the whole of the work complained of was an infringement of the plaintiffs' rights. In the present case, however, upon an examination of the play, I have come to the conclusion that it may not be impossible for the defendant to sever the passages which he has extracted from the novel, from the rest of his work; and if he desires it I will give him an opportunity of doing so. He must, however, first, state upon oath what copies of the work exist; secondly, extract from those copies which are in his possession or power, and deliver up to the plaintiffs for cancellation, all passages copied, taken, or colourably imitated from the plaintiffs' book; thirdly, produce to the plaintiffs, if required by them, for examination the copies after the pirated passages have been extracted, and there must be liberty for the plaintiffs to apply for a further order if they are dissatisfied with the result. I introduce these last words purposely because, as was pointed out in the course of the arguments, there is a possible mode by which, without infringing the plaintiffs' copyright, the defendant may be able to make copies of the play. The costs of the action must be paid by the defendant.

Petition.

This was a petition in an administration action in which no decree had been made.

The testator, John William Carr, died on the 14th of January, 1880, and under his will his daughter, Elizabeth Jane Tonge, one of the petitioners, was now entitled to one-fourth share of the income of his residuary personal estate. Upon her marriage in April, 1881, Mrs. Tonge had assigned her share under the will to the trustees of her marriage settlement upon the trusts thereby declared. All the income of the residuary personal estate, including Mrs. Tonge's share, had (under an order of the court) been, and from time to time was to be, paid into court by a receiver appointed in the action.

The petition asked (inter alia) that the daughter's share of the income so paid in should from time to time be paid out to the two trustees of her marriage settlement, "or either of them," upon the trusts thereof—following the form in Seton on Decrees (4th ed.), p. 88, Section 4, No. 2. A lease contained a covenant by the lessee with the lessor not to carry on upon the demised premises, besides certain trades specifically mentioned, "any other noisome, obnoxious, or offensive trade or business, nor suffer any act or thing which shall or may be or grow to the annoyance, nuisance, grievance, or damage of the lessor or the inhabitants of the neighbouring or adjacent houses." Held, that the user of the premises as a hospital was an infringement of the covenant.

Trial of action.

In this action the plaintiffs, Messrs. Elliott & Fry, claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from using certain premises, No. 6, Gloucester-terrace, Hyde Brompton, London, as a hospital and surgical appliance department for the treatment of diseases of the throat, nose, ear, skin, and eye, fistula, and other deformities and diseases of the human frame.

By an indenture dated the 16th of April, 1868, made by the predecessor in title of the plaintiff, Tod-Heatly, the premises were demised to one James Drake from Midsummer, 1826, for a term of ninety-nine years. The lease contained a covenant by the lessee for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, with the lessor, her heirs, and assigns, that he, his executors, administrators, or assigns, or any or either of them, should not at any time during the term "use, exercise, or carry on, or permit, or suffer any other person or persons whomsoever to inhabit, dwell in, use, or occupy the" premises, or any part thereof, who shall use or exercise therein or thereupon the trades or business of a tallow-chandler, or melter of tallow, soap-boiler, slaughterman, distiller, brewer, lampblack maker, or ammoniac manufacturer, or any other noisome, obnoxious, or offensive trade or business without the express consent of the said lessor, her heirs, or assigns in writing, nor do, or wittingly or willingly suffer to be done, any act, matter, or thing in, upon, or about the said demised premises, or any part thereof, which shall or may be or grow to the annoyance, nuisance, grievance, or damage of the lessor, her heirs, or assigns, or the inhabitants of the neighbouring or adjacent houses.

The plaintiffs were lessees and occupiers of the adjacent houses, Nos. 7 and 8, Gloucester-terrace.

The defendant was in occupation of No. 6, Gloucester-terrace, by virtue of an underlease, dated shortly before the commencement of the action, and commenced to use the house as a hospital under the name of "The Queen's Jubilee Hospital," for the treatment of the diseases above mentioned.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought an action to restrain the defendant from (inter alia) using the said premises for the purposes above stated, in contravention of the covenant in the lease. The construction of the covenant is the only point in the case calling for a report.

Barber, Q.C., Cock, Q.C., and Farwell, for the defendant.—This is not a "legal nuisance." If the business is not one of those specially excepted, it cannot come within the covenant. The effect of holding that a hospital is prohibited would be to strike out all words prohibiting the special businesses and make the covenant a general one in restraint of trade. The plaintiffs might as well say, "We object to a tailor's shop." A tailor's business is no more excepted than ours, and yet no one imagines that tailoring would be restrained under this covenant. There is no material inconvenience: Walter v. Selfe, 4 De G. & Sm. 315, 322.

KEKEWICH, J.—This case depends upon the construction of a covenant in a lease, and is covered by authority. The first part of the covenant prohibits the exercise of certain specified trades, and that means that it only extends to the actual ones mentioned. But the clause in the lease goes on:—[His lordship read the rest of the covenant above set out.] This shows that reference is intended to be made to trades other than those prohibited by name; as if the first part were written "other noisome, obnoxious, or offensive trade or other business." "Nuisance" means "legal nuisance," Harrison v. Good, and not merely what we mean in common parlance by "annoyance." As to the meaning of this latter word see Walter v. Selfe. In my opinion this is a nuisance, and therefore a legal nuisance. In Bramwell v. Lacy the words of the covenant were very like these, and were as follows:—"That he, the said William Reynolds, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall not exercise or carry on, or suffer to be exercised or carried on, upon any part of the said premises, any trade, business, or dealing whatsoever, or anything of the nature thereof, without the consent in writing of the said Richard Roy, his executors, administrators, or assigns, or be party to or suffer any act or thing which may be or grow to the annoyance, damage, injury, prejudice, or inconvenience of the neighbouring premises"; and it was held that carrying on a hospital was a "business" and therefore a breach of the covenant.

This case is not distinguishable from Bramwell v. Lacy, so that the plaintiffs are entitled to the injunction they ask, but it is not to come into operation for six months.

Injunction granted.

CAPEL & CO. v. SIM'S COMPOSITION CO. (a.)

Company—Fraudulent prospectus—Misrepresentation—Omission to state parol contract—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 38.

Before the issue of the prospectus of the S. Co., the defendant S. verbally agreed with one E. that, out of £21,000 represented in the prospectus to be the cash portion of the purchase-money, E. should receive £6,000 as promoter. This agreement did not appear on the prospectus. The plaintiff T. stated that, if he had known of the agreement, he would not have recommended the shares in the company to the plaintiffs C. & Co.

Held, first, that this was such a misrepresentation as to entitle the plaintiffs to relief; and, secondly, that the agreement, though not in writing, was within section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and that its non-disclosure in the prospectus rendered such prospectus fraudulent.

Held, therefore, on both grounds, that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment.

The law as to misrepresentation by companies and their officers discussed.

This was an action by James Capel & Co. and the Foreign, American, and General Investments Trust Co. for a declaration that the plaintiffs were induced to apply for and accept an allotment of 1,000 shares in the defendant company by the fraud and misrepresentation of the defendants (viz., the company and Appleton, Burnside, and Sim, who were directors thereof). The plaintiffs also claimed rescission of their contract to take shares and rectification of the register of members by striking out their names, and repayment of the amount paid on the shares with interest and damages. A few months prior to March, 1886, the company was registered under the Companies Acts, the object of its formation being to take over, as a going concern, the business carried on for the manufacture and supply of Sim's Protective and Anti-Fouling Compositions for coating ships' bottoms. The defendant, Sim, was the inventor and proprietor of these compositions. In March, 1886, a prospectus was issued inviting applications for shares. This circular contained certain statements which the plaintiffs alleged to be untrue. Of these, the principal paragraphs relied on by the plaintiffs were as follow:—"Average net profits for the last five years equal to a dividend of more than fourteen per cent. upon the capital proposed to be called up." "These compositions have for the last twelve years undergone long and exhaustive trials on ships of the Royal Navy, and are now extensively used in her Majesty's service. A list of ships in the Navy to which they have been applied accompanies this prospectus." "Many of the leading private shipbuilders and others are using the compositions, and it is intended to largely develop this branch of the business." "The profits for the past five years, as certified . . . show an amount which would yield an average dividend of more than fourteen per cent. upon the share capital proposed to be called up."

The case, when part heard, stood over to allow the plaintiffs to amend their statement of claim, which they did by inserting the following paragraph:—

"Before the issue of the said prospectus an agreement had been, to the knowledge of the defendants Appleton and Burnside, made between defendant Sim and Henry Russell Evans, party to the agreements referred to in the prospectus, that said Evans should receive, out of the £21,000 represented in the prospectus to be the cash portion of the purchase-money, £6,000 for his services as promoter. In the said agreement the defendant Sim and the said Henry Russell Evans were described as vendors, and the facts that Evans was the promoter of the company and was to receive that sum for his services were purposely concealed by the defendants, the directors. If defendant (Burnside) did not know the said facts, he made or authorized the statement as to the purchase-money in the prospectus recklessly, without caring to ascertain whether it was true or untrue. If plaintiffs had known the facts so concealed, they would not have taken or applied for the said shares or any of them. They only discovered the said concealed facts on cross-examination of defendants at the trial. They submit that, so far as regards the relief sought against the directors, the said concealed agreement was a contract within section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867."

(a.) Reported by C. H. F. CHRISTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In answer to this the company replied that the whole and real agreement between Sim, Evans, and the company was set forth in the agreements referred to in the prospectus; that the fact that Evans was a promoter was well known to the plaintiffs before the close of the pleadings; that there had been no concealment of facts; that, except as appeared from the agreements, Evans was not, to the company's knowledge, a promoter, and that the facts alleged to have been concealed were immaterial and irrelevant. The defendant Sim's reply to the amendment was that the agreements mentioned in the prospectus disclosed the fact that Evans was to receive £6,000 out of the £21,000, which was the only material fact with regard to the company or to any person intending to become a shareholder therein that existed in any arrangement made between Evans and Sim; that such agreements constituted the final agreement between Evans and Sim as to the payments to be received by the former, and were the only agreements or contracts required to be set out in the prospectus; that the fact that Evans was a promoter and that the £6,000 was to be paid to him for his services as promoter was not purposely or at all concealed by the directors or any of them; that it was known to the plaintiffs before they applied for shares that Evans was a promoter; that the plaintiffs did not first discover the alleged concealed facts on the cross-examination, but were aware of them when they applied for shares; that the plaintiffs were not induced to apply or influenced in applying for shares by the non-disclosure of the alleged concealed facts; that the alleged concealed agreement was not a contract within section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867; and that, if it were such a contract, it was sufficiently specified in the prospectus.

April 16.—Kekewich, J.—The representations with regard to which this action is brought were really made to Mr. Trotter, who was Capel & Co., and he was the agent of the Foreign, American, and General Trust Co., of which he was the broker and a director. They must succeed through him or not at all. The plaintiffs complain, irrespective of statutory fraud, of representations by the prospectus and representations by Appleton. A plaintiff in an action of this kind is entitled to succeed if he can put his hand on a positive and material untruth, in reasonably plain language, of such a character that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it must have influenced the contract in the sense of having induced the plaintiff to do that in belief of what was false which, if he had known the truth, he would have refrained from doing. If he cannot do this he may succeed by showing that he was misled by statements proved to be inconsistent with the truth, couched in language capable of more than one interpretation; but, as regards any such statements, he is not entitled to say, "This must have been the meaning, and this is false." He must prove that he so understood it and relied on it as having that meaning. And his oath is not sufficient; it must be a reasonable understanding. And in considering what is reasonable regard must be had to the particular person, his knowledge and means of knowledge of the matter in hand, and also his general experience and other circumstances. This statement of the law is based on Smith v. Chadwick, 32 W. R. 687, 9 App. Cas. 187. Here is a plaintiff who stands alone in this fertile field of litigation. He is an eminent stockbroker, living with and by companies; and I must read the prospectus with his experienced eye, remembering that he regarded this particular company as of a transitory character. The statement (above set out) as to average net profits must be read in connection with another statement in the prospectus:—"The profits for the past five years, as certified by Messrs. Good, Daniels, & Co., chartered accountants, and by Mr. Stephen Darley, show an amount which would yield an average dividend of more than fourteen per cent. upon the share capital proposed to be called up." The certificate was produced, and agreed with the statement, and no doubt the profits were made. The untruth must be in the words "capital proposed to be called up." That was not stated. It is difficult to infer what was meant by that expression. But manifestly the capital was more than £36,000, because that was the purchase-money. How much more? That includes the plant, stock, and everything of that kind, but not preliminary expenses so far as the statement of the prospectus goes. Why am I to add more? The plaintiff added £4,000; it was little more than a guess, the result of his experience, and not far wrong. That was what was contemplated to be paid up in the first instance. The profits were nearly enough for that, and would have been enough to pay fourteen per cent. on a slightly smaller sum. He asked no question, and relied on his own experience. How could he allege deceit? He omitted intentionally to take into consideration for this purpose the difference between £40,000 and £15,000 because he did not consider that ought to be taken into consideration with reference to the intended dividend, an important matter for consideration at the moment. I therefore hold that this alleged misrepresentation is not made out. [His lordship, after dealing with the charge of misrepresentation by the statement as to the trials and use of the composition by the Navy, and by private shipbuilders and engineers, and deciding in the defendants' favour on that and certain other points, continued:—] The main statement complained of is this, "The consideration to be paid for the entire property and business plant, stock, &c., is £21,000 in cash and £15,000 in shares." Examine it first alone—that is, not without reference to documents, but without reference to the rest of the prospectus. It means, and means plainly, that there was a purchase of the property and business plant, stock, &c., and the purchase-money was £36,000, payable £21,000 in cash and £15,000 in shares. The necessary conclusion—that is, a conclusion which must, of course, be drawn by a man of ordinary intelligence—is, that these sums were to be paid to the person from whom the purchase was made; in other words, to the vendors of the thing purchased. And looking, as of course a man of ordinary intelligence would and must, at the statements in the prospectus of the contracts entered into by the company, there he finds that the person to whom the money is to be paid—that is, the vendors—are Sim and Evans, grouped as parties of the one part in each of the contracts there mentioned. Again, the conclusion is inevitable that the £36,000 was to be paid to them as vendors. That is a positive statement, and it is positively untrue. It is, in plain English, false. The purchase-money was, in truth, £30,000, payable £15,000 in cash and £15,000 in shares. Sim was the only vendor, and the extra £6,000 was promoter's money—that is, money to be paid to Evans, who had an interest in the property, for floating the company. It whatever way and by whatever means he thought best. The plaintiff has sworn that he trusted this plain statement as true, and that if he had known how untrue it was—had known the real facts—nothing could have induced him to recommend the investment to the trust company. The difference between purchase-money payable to a vendor and promotion-money paid to a promoter, in no sense a vendor, is too obvious to require explanation, as is also the influence which the distinction, if disclosed, would make on the mind of a man of business. But it is said that something is generally thrown into a bargain for the purchase of a business on behalf of a company to cover the expenses incident to formation, and Mr. Trotter, a man of large experience in such matters, admitted that this is frequently done. I am not prepared to say that where the vendor undertakes to bear the preliminary expenses there may not fairly be added to the purchase-money for that purpose a moderate sum beyond what would otherwise be paid to him as the cost price of what he sells, but I am equally unprepared to say what would be a moderate sum, or to say more than that it must be fixed in each case according to the special circumstances, and honesty must be the guide as well as the best policy. There is no question about a moderate sum here. The proportion borne by the promotion-money to the purchase-money is far too large, and, moreover, there is not a little of evidence to displace the inference that £6,000 was far more than could have been required for legitimate purposes connected with the formation of the company. The conclusions at which I have arrived on this part of the case are in harmony with the judgment of Bacon, V.C., in Bagnall v. Carlton, 26 W. R. 243, 6 Ch. D. 371, supported by the Court of Appeal, and of that of Sir G. Jessel, M.R., in Emma Silver Mining Co. v. Grant, 11 Ch. D. 918, 27 W. R. 48. But it is said that there are passages in the prospectus indicating the real truth, and which at least put the plaintiff on inquiry respecting the terms of the purchase agreements, especially remembering that he was a man of business. This is so, and if the passages in question are critically examined, without reference to those on which I have already commented, they might support the desired conclusion. Sim is referred to as having established the business, and as being the vendor, whose age and failing health are the only reasons for the sale to a company. I think that if the plaintiff had noticed those phrases, as he apparently did not, he might well have said, "Sim is, no doubt, the principal vendor, and the composition is called by his name, and if there is some inaccuracy in referring to him alone, it is yet consistent with the other gentleman spoken of as vendor, having some interest." Consider, however, what would have happened if he had exercised extreme caution and had followed up the inquiry suggested by the passages in question. The doctrine of equity is that a man put on inquiry has notice of what the inquiry, if prosecuted with reasonable diligence, would have disclosed, and not that he would have ascertained anything which would not have been thus disclosed. The plaintiff might, of course, have made inquiries of Sim or others, but the natural and proper course was to look at the agreements to which reference was made; and if he had done this he would have found that Sim and Evans are not merely called vendors, but are throughout the agreements treated as vendors, and that there is not the slightest indication that they are not both in the same manner, though in different proportions, interested in the property contracted to be sold to the company. This compels me to hold that there has been stated, in the face of the prospectus and in the documents referred to, a positive and material untruth, and that the defendant company, Sim, Appleton, & Burnside, are all responsible for it. I give no reasons for attaching that responsibility, for it was not attempted to be denied. There is a point made by the plaintiffs by amendment in connection with this part of the case which it is convenient to dispose of here. They say that the evidence disclosed a contract within the operation of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, which ought, therefore, to have been specified, but is not specified, in the prospectus, and that such prospectus must consequently be deemed fraudulent on the part of the defendants, who issued the same. The first objection taken to this claim is that there is no contract in writing, and that without writing it is impossible to specify the dates and names of parties. On this I need say no more than that if authority to the contrary is not found in Arkwright v. Newbold, 28 W. R. 828, 29 W. R. 455, 17 Ch. D. 301, which is cited for it, I entertain no doubt that a parol contract is covered by the statute. I see no reason for so restricting its operation as to invite wholesale evasion. The question there is whether the actual contract is within the meaning of the statute. I do not propose to define what contracts are and what are not within it. The language presents considerable difficulty, as is evidenced by the litigation which it has occasioned and the varied, though, I think, substantially consistent constructions which have been placed on it by judicial decisions. To my mind there is no serious difficulty in applying the language to this case. What is the contract which it is said ought to have been specified in the prospectus? This, that out of the money nominally payable as purchase-money for the business, £6,000 should be paid to Evans, not as purchase-money, but for his services as promoter, or that the purchase-money should be £30,000 and that in addition £6,000 should be payable to Evans as promoter. Take it as you will, it is a contract made between two promoters, Sim and Evans, relating to the affairs of the company, and, as I have already held, one of which any person proposing to subscribe for shares ought to have been informed, in order that he might exercise a reasonable judgment touching the position and prospects of the company. Gover's case, 23 W. R. 608, 24 Ib. 125, L. R. 20 Eq. 114, 1 Ch. D. 182, and Twycross v. Grant, 25 W. R. 586, 701, 2 C. P. D. 469, are authorities, if authorities be needed, that such a contract at least is within the operation of the statute. The effect of this conclusion I will consider later on. I pass to the consideration of an entirely different question—namely, whether the defendant Appleton made the representations charged against him in paragraph 5 of the statement of claim. This is a question affecting the defendant Appleton only of the directors. [His lordship then compared the evidence of the plaintiff and Appleton, and decided in favour of that of the plaintiff whenever it conflicted with Appleton's, and continued:—] It is objected that Trotter made no inquiries of the company or of Sim. Trotter might, however, have made inquiries of the company or of Sim (not that he would have ascertained anything as far as I can see if he had), but was he under any obligation to make them? Clearly not. According to English law a man is entitled to accept and act on statements of fact of a person presumably competent to make them, and to make that person responsible for their truth. He is under no obligation to doubt their accuracy or to test it by inquiry elsewhere. Law, in this instance as in many others, is consistent with honest dealing between man and man. I hold, therefore, that the defendant Appleton made false representations to the plaintiff, William Trotter, as agent for the plaintiff company, which induced the latter to enter into the contract to take shares in the defendant company, and to pay, therefore, the sum actually paid by them—viz., £1,000, less the allowed rebate. I have already said in making these representations he was not authorized either by Sim or by Burnside. I further hold that he had no authority from the defendant company. There is no proof of any such authority, and I cannot presume it: see Barnett, Hoares, & Co. v. South London Tramways Co., 35 W. R. 640, 18 Q. B. D. 815. I hold that the prospectus contained false statements of a material character, which induced the plaintiff company to take shares and pay money. It was the prospectus of the company, and the company must be liable in its corporate character for that document, issued in its name, soliciting applications for shares. The defendants Sim, Appleton, and Burnside are likewise responsible for it as having been issued with their authority. I hold that there was a concealment of a contract which ought to have been specified in the prospectus, and that such concealment is, according to the statute, fraudulent as against the defendants, Sim, Appleton, and Burnside. The statute does not make it fraudulent as against the company, and I think that the other defendants were not the agents of the company for this purpose in the sense of having been authorized to omit to specify the contract in question. The company being clearly liable for the prospectus, it is practically immaterial to consider whether they are liable for the false representations of Appleton, but the point having been argued, and being one of some importance, the plaintiffs are entitled to my opinion on it. I entertain no doubt on the point. The company have received, retained, and employed the plaintiffs' money which would not have been paid had the truth been told or had the real contract been specified. They cannot be heard in a court of equity to say that they are not liable to restore money thus obtained. Relief against them might, perhaps, be supported on other grounds also, but it is enough, and to my mind more satisfactory, to rest it on this general principle of equity, for the application of which to such a case the Western Bank of Scotland v. Addie, L. R. 1 Sc. & D. App. 145 (see p. 158), 15 W. R. H. L. Dig. 14, is ample authority. The liability of the other defendants depends on this—that they have personally, or through the prospectus, made false representations which induced the plaintiffs to enter into a contract to take shares and pay money for what really was and has proved to be worthless. The plaintiffs must, of course, give up the shares as taken, and, indeed, that is part of the relief which they ask in seeking rescission, but there is no question to my mind about the value of the shares, or about the measure of damages. The defendants are bound to make good their representations in the only way now possible—that is, to put the plaintiff in the position which he would have occupied if the representations had not been made. Observe, however, that the same result would follow the application of the principle for measuring damages laid down to the jury in Twycross v. Grant by Lord Coleridge, whose direction was upheld by the Court of Common Pleas and the Court of Appeal. It is objected that a claim as against the company for rescission and a claim against the other defendants for damages are not properly included in one action; that the plaintiffs ought first to elect to affirm or disaffirm the contract, and having pursued the remedy which such election gives them as regards the company, then, if need be, to attack the directors. I think the objection fails to notice that the form of action is an election to rescind the contract, but apart from that and apart from the observation that if such an objection were allowed to prevail it would contradict the modern practice, which prevents as far as possible circuity of action, I find abundant authority in support of the plaintiffs' claim as framed. Sir George Jessel stated, in Emma Silver Mining Co. v. Grant, that such an objection is untenable, and Fry, J., obviously thought the same, though the circumstances of the case made it unnecessary for him to decide the point, in Cargill v. Bower, 26 W. R. 716, 10 Ch. D. 502. In Henderson v. Lacon, 16 W. R. 328, L. R. 5 Eq. 249, the point was fully discussed and relief was not only asked, but granted, against the company and directors concurrently under circumstances substantially similar to those which I am now considering.

I propose to declare that the plaintiff company were induced to take the shares held by them by means of false representations in the prospectus, as also by false representations made to the plaintiff Trotter by the defendant Appleton, and by means of the omission to specify in the prospectus the real contract with Evans, which according to the statute ought to have been specified therein. I propose also to declare that the plaintiff company are entitled as against the defendant company to have their name removed from the register of shareholders, and that must be ordered accordingly. There will further be a declaration that the defendants are severally liable to repay to the plaintiff company the actual amount paid by them, with interest calculated from the day of payment to the defendant company, and there must be an order on them to do so within, say, a month from the date of this judgment. At what rate ought interest to be paid? I have long thought that this question deserves general reconsideration with special reference to the fact that all the courts are now part of one High Court of Justice, and that there is an anomaly in a different rate of interest prevailing as a general rule in the two divisions. The reduction of the rate of interest obtainable on what are styled trust securities is another reason for reconsideration, operating, perhaps, in a different direction. It is not for me, now at least, to consider the question thus generally. Having regard to the circumstances of this case, I see no reason why interest should not be payable at what I may term a mercantile rate usually allowed by juries, and fix it at five per cent. There remains the question of costs. The plaintiffs have succeeded and are entitled to their costs of action. But they have not succeeded on all points raised, and their success is in great measure due to the new points first raised by amendment after the commencement of the trial. On the other hand, it is to be borne in mind that the omission to raise these new points at an earlier date was in great the fault of the plaintiffs; and, further, though I have held some statements in the prospectus not to be fraudulent so as to entitle the plaintiffs to relief, yet there is one passage about which I have been compelled to speak strongly, and which of itself, in my judgment, warrants the entire result. I think that, except as I am about to mention, the defendants must severally be ordered to pay the costs of the action. The trial was postponed at the last moment, when court, counsel, and parties were all ready, by reason of the illness of the plaintiff Trotter, who was an indispensable witness. The delay was inevitable, and it was due merely to misfortune; but I cannot properly make the costs thus occasioned costs in the action; nay, more, I think that the costs of the day must be paid by the plaintiffs.

HOLMES v. BRIERLEY. (a.)

Ratification—Breach of promise to marry—Evidence of new promise—Infants' Relief Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 62), s. 2.

The defendant, as a minor, promised to marry the plaintiff. After the defendant came of age the plaintiff offered to release the defendant from his engagement to her. The defendant said that "he was very much hurt at such a proposal, and that he was ready to marry her then, if she thought they were old enough." The plaintiff said "she thought they had better wait till they were older."

Held, that there was no evidence in such a conversation of any new promise by the defendant after he came of age, but only of a ratification of his original promise made when he was under age; and that, in view of section 2 of the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, the evidence to go to a jury of a "new promise" after the majority of the defendant must be something more than language which is not inconsistent with a mere ratification of the original promise to marry made by him as an infant.

Ditcham v. Worral, 29 W. R. 59, 5 C. P. D. 410, distinguished.

Motion for judgment to be entered for the defendant, or for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.

The action was one for a breach of promise to marry. The defendant, when a minor, promised to marry the plaintiff. Subsequently to his attaining his majority the plaintiff offered to release him from his former engagement, but the defendant reiterated his willingness to marry her at once. The action was based on the terms of the conversation upon this occasion as set out in the judgment. The trial was heard before Grantham, J., and a jury, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff, damages £100. The defendant now moved for a new trial on the ground that the judge had not directed the jury to find whether there was a new promise to marry or only a ratification of the promise made by the defendant as a minor, or for judgment on the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury of any new promise.

J. Walton (Gully, Q.C., with him), for the defendant.—An action will not lie upon a mere ratification of a promise by a minor under section 2 of the Infants' Relief Act, 1874. The judge assumed that the plaintiff had released the defendant, and that the defendant had accepted the release and made a fresh offer. He ought to have left it to the jury to say whether there was reasonable evidence of a new promise or only a ratification of the original one. There is no new consideration which goes to show evidence of a new promise as in Northcote v. Doughty, 4 C. P. D. 385, 28 W. R. 106; Ditcham v. Worral, 29 W. R. 59, 5 C. P. D. 410; Pillison v. Hayter, 19 W. R. 130, L. R. 6 C. P. 38.

Addison, Q.C., for the plaintiff.—Evidence of a renewal of a promise to marry was evidence to go to a jury of a new promise: Northcote v. Doughty, at p. 390.

Walton replied.

HUDDLESTON, B.—This is a motion, firstly, for a new trial, and, secondly, in the alternative, for judgment to be entered. The application for a new trial is on the ground that there was misdirection, or rather non-direction, by the judge on the question as to whether there was only a ratification by the defendant of his promise to marry the plaintiff, made when he was a minor, or whether there was a new promise made by him after he attained his majority. The judge assumed that the plaintiff had released the defendant. He used words in his summing up to that effect. If so, there was no difficulty in assuming that anything which took place subsequently was evidence of a new promise. We have to consider whether there was reasonable evidence of a new promise to go to a jury. In our opinion the judgment of the learned judge was not directed to the question whether there was a new promise or only a ratification of the original one, upon which by the Act of Parliament (37 & 38 Vict. c. 62) no action would lie. The wholesome words of Lindley, L.J., in Ditcham v. Worral afford the proper guidance for summing up on such a point. "In every case which arises under the Act care must be taken not to deprive persons of the protection intended to be afforded them by it. Where the intention of the parties is obscure, where the so-called new promise is made soon after twenty-one, where it is, in consequence of an influence against which it is necessary to guard, in all such cases a jury ought to be warned not lightly to infer a new promise as distinguished from a ratification." We have no doubt that the defendant is properly entitled to a new trial upon this point. But we are further asked to enter judgment for him on the ground that there was no evidence of anything but ratification, and consequently nothing upon which an action could be founded. Since the decision in Coxhead v. Mullis, 27 W. R. 136, 3 C. P. D. 439, the Infants' Relief Act of 1874 has been held to apply to actions of breach of promise to marry. It may be questionable whether such a promise comes under the head of section 1, but it clearly comes within the words of section 2: "No action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any ratification made after full age of any promise or contract made during infancy, whether there shall or shall not be any new consideration for such promise or ratification after full age."

I am not at all inclined to disagree with the decision in Coxhead v. Mullis, even if we did not hold ourselves bound by it, as we do. Was there, then, any reasonable evidence at all to leave to a jury in this case of a promise to marry by the defendant after he came of age? What are the facts? for this is, after all, rather more a question of fact than of law. There was clearly an engagement between the parties when the defendant was a minor in April, 1886. In September he attained his majority. In October the plaintiff's father had to compound with his creditors. That altered the position of the parties in regard to marriage. The plaintiff says that she told the defendant what had occurred, and that "if he wished to break it (i.e., the engagement) off, he could." He was much hurt, and said that he "was ready to marry her then if she thought they were old enough." She replied that she "thought they were too young, and had better wait." That, practically, is the whole of the conversation which is admitted between the parties. Taken together, what does it substantially come to? If the conversation had been a statement by her to this effect—"I find there is a difference now in our positions, and I release you," and the defendant had replied, "I accept the release, but I now make you a new promise to marry under these new circumstances," it would have been a different matter. But here the defendant did not accept her offer to release him. He proposed to carry out the engagement still in existence. There was no evidence of any new promise at all—at most it was but a ratification of his original intention. Even if it did amount to a new promise, it was one to marry her at that moment. This the plaintiff declined. Taken at the highest, it was a mere suggestion, accepted only conditionally on the parties growing older. But substantially it can only be considered a readiness to carry out the original engagement. That is a ratification, and a ratification of a promise made by the defendant as a minor, and so not one upon which an action could be founded.

The cases cited are certainly distinguishable. In Northcote v. Doughty the defendant had promised to marry the plaintiff conditionally on his obtaining his parents' consent. On coming of age he renewed his promise, but this time unconditionally. Lopes, J., left it to the jury to say whether that amounted to a new and absolute promise, or a ratification only of the former conditional promise. There was evidence of a new promise free from the conditions of the former one. Ditcham v. Worral, again, is clearly distinguishable. I may say that as to that case, personally I should agree with the view of the Chief Justice, but he was overruled by the majority of the court, consisting of my brothers Lindley and Denman; but we should, in any case, be bound by the majority in that case. It is, however, clearly distinguishable, as Mr. Walton pointed out, There a new element had been introduced. There was a new promise to marry on a particular day. There is no new element introduced here. The defendant would be properly entitled to a new trial upon the question whether this was a new promise or a ratification only of the original promise; but in my judgment, as there was really no evidence of any new promise which could reasonably be left to a jury, he is entitled to our judgment now. There must be a verdict and judgment entered for the defendant.

Charles, J.—I agree. As to the second point, since the decision in Coxhead v. Mullis a contract to marry must be held to come within the provisions of the Infants' Relief Act, 1874. There is no question that the present contract, the original promise made while the defendant was a minor, comes within section 2 of that Act. Was there, then, any evidence proper to be submitted to a jury of a fresh promise to marry by the defendant after he came of age? or was the evidence so equally consistent with a mere ratification as with a new promise that the case ought to have been withdrawn from a jury? The evidence must be read altogether as the plaintiff's account of the material interview. That evidence was clearly inconsistent with any other construction than that there was an expression of willingness by the defendant to carry out the engagement already made by him as a minor. That engagement was, in fact, one insufficient in law upon which to bring an action. There was no evidence of a fresh promise to submit to a jury.

In Northcote v. Doughty there was evidence of a fresh promise, different in character from the promise made during infancy. The second promise was absolute; the first was conditional on the defendant's parents' consent.

In Ditcham v. Worral I should have been much disposed to agree with the view expressed by the Chief Justice, but there the case stands decided by a majority of the court otherwise. But it is distinguishable from this case. There was a new term agreed upon in that case between the parties—namely, a particular day for the marriage. There is no new element introduced here. Upon the general question, if the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, is to be worth anything, and is to be given any effect in this class of contract, we must act upon the principle that to make out a fresh promise there must be evidence of something more than ratification—evidence amounting directly or indirectly to an intention to agree to making a new promise, and it is not enough to give evidence of language which is not inconsistent with a mere ratification of the original promise.

There must be judgment for the defendant.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) May 14.

Downe v. Fletcher and Wife. (a.)

Husband and wife—Wife's separate estate—Judgment under R. S. C., 1883, ord. 14—Evidence of separate estate—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 14, 15, 19.

In an application to sign final judgment under order 14 against a married woman for debts contracted before marriage, it is not necessary to prove, as a condition of obtaining judgment, that she is at the time possessed of separate estate.

Such judgment, however, should be signed in the form settled by the Court of Appeal in Scott v. Morley, ante, p. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120.*

Application for judgment under order 14.

Action by a dressmaker against a husband and wife to recover £168 4s. 6d. for dresses supplied to the latter in 1879, two years before her marriage, which took place in 1881. The husband had leave to defend unconditionally, and the wife, by affidavit, denied her indebtedness in the sum claimed, and stated that the charge made was extravagant and excessive.

There was no evidence that she possessed any separate estate.

The master refused to allow the plaintiff to sign final judgment under order 14 against the wife, and on application being then made to the judge at chambers, the matter was referred by him to the court.

Morten, for the plaintiff.—There is no real defence to the claim against the wife, and the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against her in the form given in Burrell v. Tanner, 32 W. R. 827, 13 Q. B. D. 691. The lady was a feme sole when the debt was contracted. It is unnecessary as a condition of judgment to give evidence of separate estate. The only effect of her marriage is that the judgment cannot be enforced against her personally without showing that she has separate estate. There is no authority to show that a woman must have separate estate at the time that judgment is obtained, but only that execution cannot be issued except against such separate estate.

M'Call, for the defendant.—The remarks of Cotton, L.J., in Ex parte Jones, In re Grissell, 12 Ch. D., at page 490, 27 W. R. Dig. 16, show that such an application as this could not succeed. Judgment can only be obtained against separate estate, and it is not alleged that the defendant has any. The plaintiff is bound to prove that she has separate estate capable of being reached at the time of the judgment: Pike v. Fitzgibbon, 29 W. R. 551, 17 Ch. D. 454. The form of judgment settled by the court in Scott v. Morley, 20 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120, shows that the separate estate intended to be attached must be referred to in the judgment. The marriage took place before the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. If the Act is retrospective, which is not admitted, section

* The form of the judgment as settled in Scott v. Morley is as follows:—"It is adjudged that the plaintiff do recover £—— and costs (to be taxed) against the defendant (the married woman), and the costs to be payable out of her separate property hereinafter mentioned, and not otherwise. And it is ordered that execution hereon be limited to the separate property of the defendant (the married woman), subject to any restriction against anticipation, which by reason of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the property shall be liable to attachment notwithstanding such restriction."

and 15 virtually re-enact the provisions of the Acts of 1870 and 1874. [Mathew, J.—If the wife acquires separate property after the judgment, may not judgment be recovered against her?] No; for there can be no judgment except as against her separate estate.

Morten in reply.—Scott v. Morley decides quite a different point; but in that case an order was made in the form in which the plaintiff now asks for judgment.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—It appears to me that the plaintiff is entitled to an order for judgment in the form in which it is pointed out in Scott v. Morley such a judgment ought to be; that is, judgment only against the wife and against such separate estate as she now has or may hereafter have. The plaintiff will thus be restrained from executing judgment, except as against such separate estate.

Mathew, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only question referred to us by the judge in chambers is whether final judgment can be signed against the wife when there is no evidence that she has separate estate. The Act of 1882 protects the husband, but does not affect the position of a married woman. It limits the liability to her separate estate. There is, however, no ground for saying that it is necessary for the plaintiff to show that actually, at the time of judgment, she is possessed of separate estate.

Appeal allowed.

Reg. v. Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies. (a.)

Mandamus—Alternative remedy—Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies—Filing of contract—Insufficiency of stamp—Servant of Crown—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), ss. 18, 19.

The Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies having refused to file a contract under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, on the ground that the Stamp Act, 1870, had not been complied with,

Held, that, whether or not the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies was an officer to whom a writ of mandamus might be sent, the appropriate remedy for the party aggrieved by such refusal was the procedure provided by sections 18 and 19 of the Stamp Act, 1870, and therefore a writ of mandamus ought not to be granted.

Rule nisi for a mandamus to the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, commanding him to register a contract under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867.

On the 31st of December, 1887, a limited company was duly constituted under the Companies Acts for the purpose of buying the business of Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, & Co., a firm of publishers, and on the 2nd of January, 1888, a contract for the transfer of the business was executed by the vendors and the company. The company, being desirous of having the contract filed in pursuance of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, presented it for that purpose to the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies. The registrar refused to file the contract, on the ground that it was insufficiently stamped. The company then required the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, under section 18 of the Stamp Act, 1870, to express their opinion on the question with what amount of stamp duty the contract was chargeable. The commissioners were of opinion that it was insufficiently stamped, and that it required an ad valorem stamp.

A fresh contract was then executed, dated the 27th of January, by which it was agreed that the company should allot to the vendors a certain number of shares, and that the vendors should accept such shares in part satisfaction of the price. To this contract a schedule was annexed containing the terms of the first contract. The new contract was stamped with a ten shilling stamp and presented to the registrar to be filed. The registrar refused to file this contract until he had seen the first contract properly stamped.

The company applied for and obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus to compel the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies to file the contract of the 27th of January.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and R. S. Wright, for the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, showed cause.—First, the registrar is a servant of the Crown, and the court will not issue a mandamus to a servant of the Crown to compel him to exercise his discretion: Reg. v. Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, 20 W. R. 336, L. R. 7 Q. B. 387. Secondly, the remedy by mandamus is ousted by reason of the existence of another remedy—viz., by appealing from the decision of the commissioners under section 19 of the Stamp Act. That is an efficient remedy; and therefore mandamus ought not to go: Reg. v. Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, Queen Dowager's Annuity, 16 Q. B. 357, see per Lord Campbell, p. 361.

Sir H. James, Q.C., and Macaskie, for the company.—Mandamus will lie to a servant of the Crown where there is a statutory duty and a subject is deprived of his legal right: Reg. v. Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, Queen Dowager's Annuity; Rex v. Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, 4 A. & E. 286. Secondly, sections 18 and 19 of the Stamp Act were not framed for the benefit or convenience of the Crown, but for the convenience of the subject. Here the remedy afforded by those sections is not so convenient to us as the remedy by mandamus; and mandamus is only ousted "where there is a remedy equally convenient, beneficial, and effectual": In re Barlow, 30 L. J. Q. B. 271, 10 W. R. C. L. Dig. 17.

Field, J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. I do not say whether the registrar is an officer to whom a mandamus may go. I base my judgment on the second ground of objection—viz., that in this case a mandamus ought not to go. When the Commissioners of Inland Revenue decided that the deed required an ad valorem stamp, it was competent to the applicants to appeal from that decision to this court under section 19 of the Stamp Act, 1870; and I cannot conceive a more convenient or effectual remedy than that given by that section, especially as the court can in that case assess the stamp duty. But they did not appeal; they executed a fresh deed; and on the registrar refusing to file it without seeing the first deed properly stamped, they come here for a mandamus. The question is whether we ought to grant this prerogative writ of mandamus. It is a matter which is in our discretion; and limits have been laid down as to how far we ought to exercise our discretion. Lord Campbell thought that the writ ought to be refused if there was another efficient remedy. Other judges say "where there is a remedy equally convenient, beneficial, and effectual." To my mind the writ of mandamus is a most inconvenient remedy; while under sections 18 and 19 of the Stamp Act the matter might be decided promptly and conveniently; and I think this latter remedy is also equally beneficial with the remedy by mandamus, and more efficient, for the whole question is whether the deed is properly stamped or not. Therefore I think the case comes within the rule which ousts the remedy by mandamus.

Wills, J.—I am of the same opinion, though I am inclined to think there would be no objection to our sending a mandamus to the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies in a proper case, and therefore my judgment must be on the other ground. I think it would not be right to infringe the rule that a mandamus is not to be granted where there is an efficient alternative remedy.

Rule discharged.

Reg. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue. (a.)

Intoxicating liquors—Place of public entertainment—Right to excise licence—Mandamus—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), ss. 3, 72, 74—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 39, s. 7.

The proprietor of a place of public entertainment is not entitled to an excise licence unless he has previously obtained a justices' licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors. The statute 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 39, s. 7, has been impliedly repealed as to places of public entertainment by the Licensing Act, 1872.

Rule nisi for a mandamus to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to grant an excise licence to the applicant, the proprietor of the Empire Theatre.

The building in question was not a theatre established by letters patent, nor licensed as a theatre by the Lord Chamberlain or justices, the proprietor, however, held a music and dancing licence.

The Commissioners of the Inland Revenue had refused to grant an excise licence until the proprietor had obtained a justices' licence.

Sir C. Russell, Q.C., and Forrest Fulton, in support of the rule.—The statute 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 39, s. 7, which authorizes the grant by the commissioners, of a liquor licence to the proprietor of a place of public entertainment, has not been repealed expressly or otherwise. The Statute Law Revision Act of 1874 repeals a number of sections, but leaves untouched section 7 of the above Act. The statute of 1872, in section 72, protects the rights of proprietors of theatres under the older Act, and with theatres clearly must be read places of public entertainment such as this. Secondly, a mandamus will lie to the commissioners (Reg. v. Salford, 21 L. J. M. C. 223), for this is merely a ministerial Act.

Sir Edward Clarke, S.G. (R. S. Wright with him), for the commissioners, waived the question, for the purposes of the present case only, as to whether a mandamus could be issued against them as being servants of the Crown. [Wills, J., referred to Reg. v. Commissioners of Stamps, 9 Q. B. 637, and Reg. v. Postmaster-General, 26 W. R. 322, 3 Q. B. D. 429.] There is a great distinction between theatres and places of public entertainment. The justices could not license this building as a theatre. The Act of 1872 was intended to consolidate the law as to licensing, and the preamble is quite definite on the point. [He was stopped.]

Field, J.—This motion must be refused and the order discharged. The applicant is in occupation of an edifice called the Empire Theatre, which is not a theatre established under letters patent, nor licensed by the Lord Chamberlain nor by the justices of the peace, but is a place of public entertainment licensed by the justices under 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, for music and dancing. It was conceded by the Commissioners for the Inland Revenue that, for the purpose of obtaining an authoritative decision, the question whether there is jurisdiction in this court to issue a mandamus to them as the servants of the Crown should be waived for this occasion only.

It was admitted that under the Acts passed up to 1835 such an application for a licence ought to have been granted, but the commissioners contend that an alteration was made by the Act of 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), which justifies their present action. It is necessary to consider the legislation up to the time of that Act. The Act of 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61) enacted that no licence for the sale of exciseable liquors on premises should be granted except upon the production of a justices' licence. The statute further defines what exciseable liquors are, and imposes certain penalties. In 1830 the Legislature selected three kinds of exciseable liquors, beer, ale, and porter, and authorized the sale of them on premises the subject of the particular licence, and made the right to such a licence general. In 1834 the sale of such an unrestricted right of sale became obvious, and by the statute 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, a condition was introduced that no such excise licence should be granted without the production of a certificate of good character to be obtained in a certain manner. In the next year the statute 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 39, authorized the commissioners to grant licences for the sale of beer, spirits, and wines in a licensed theatre or place of public entertainment without the certificate required in the case of an ale or beerhouse.

Then came the Act of 1872, which was intended to codify the law to a large extent. The preamble runs "Whereas it is expedient to amend the law for the sale by retail of intoxicating liquors and the regulation of public-houses and other places in which intoxicating liquors are sold," &c. That shows that the Act was intended to strike at all places, without exception, where intoxicating liquors were sold. By section 74 "intoxicating liquors" mean all exciseable liquors, and the word "licence" is also defined. By section 72 a saving clause is introduced protecting the rights of proprietors of theatres. But this present application is not made by the proprietor of a theatre, but by the occupier of a place of public entertainment licensed by justices. Therefore the applicant is not within the saving clause.

It has been said that we should understand the words of the statute in the popular sense, but there is a distinction clearly drawn between the expression "theatre" and "place of public entertainment" in the statute of William IV. It has been said, also, that the Act of 1872 declares the intention to give to the proprietors of places of public entertainment the right to obtain licences to sell beer, &c., in them, and that this enactment has not been expressly repealed by the Act of 1872. But if the Acts are inconsistent there is an implied repeal. If there had been no new provisions as to the control and management of licensed places and as to the obtaining of licences in the later Act they might, perhaps, have stood together. But it is evident that there are such new provisions, and the later Act is expressly declared to be aimed at all places where intoxicating liquors are sold. The rule must be discharged.

Wills, J.—I am of the same opinion. The statute 5 & 6 Will. 4 enabled the proprietor of a theatre or place of public entertainment to get an excise licence without the formalities imposed by the statute of the previous year. The Act of 1872 says that no person shall sell intoxicating liquors without getting a licence so to do from the justices. The saving clause is as specific as the rest of the Act, and the applicant is not within it.

Q. B. Div. (Huddleston, B., and Manisty, J.) Feb. 7.

Wennhak v. Morgan and Wife. (a.)

Libel—Communication of libel by husband to wife—Publication—Servant's character—Testimonial.

The disclosure of a libel by a husband to his wife is not a publication of the same. A servant has the property in a testimonial given to him by a former employer, as distinguished from a letter testifying to his character sent by a former employer to a new would-be employer. If the former testimonial be damaged by the new employer, the servant may recover substantial and not merely nominal damages.

This was a motion for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.

The plaintiff, a manservant, having a good character in writing, from a lady who had gone abroad, entered the service of the defendant, who took him on the faith of the above testimonial. Afterwards the plaintiff gave notice that he should quit the service. Shortly after this the defendant dismissed him summarily on a charge of misconduct—i.e., of having stayed out of the house all night without leave. The plaintiff asked for a return of his testimonial, which was delivered to him by the wife of the defendant. The reason of his discharge was found written on the testimonial.

The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant and his wife for libel—i.e., the words written on the testimonial—and for malicious damage to the property of the plaintiff—i.e., the testimonial.

Mathew, J., who tried the case, held that there was no publication of the libel, and as to the damage to the testimonial, that a shilling was enough for damages.

Hopkins, for the plaintiff.—The defendant published the libel by showing it to his wife. Although in law a husband and wife are one, save for purposes of the Married Women's Property Act, an action will lie for defaming a man to his wife, and vice versâ. In Wenman v. Ash, 1 W. R. 452, 13 C. B. 836, Maule, J., said:—"In the eye of the law, no doubt, man and wife are for many purposes one, but that is a strong figurative expression, and cannot be so dealt with as that all the consequences must follow which would result from its being literally true. For many purposes they are essentially distinct and different persons, amongst others for the purpose of having the honour and feelings of the husband assailed and injured by acts done or communications made to the wife." With regard to the damage to the testimonial, it was the property of the plaintiff, and being indorsed with disparaging remarks it became valueless, and he is entitled thereon to more than nominal damages.

R. V. Williams, for the defendants.—There is no case in which it has ever been held that an action would lie for a defamatory statement made by a man to his wife: Toogood v. Spyring, 1 Cr. M. & R. 181; Taylor v. Hawkins, 16 Q. B. 308, are in point. The learned judge assumed that the testimonial belonged to the plaintiff, and probably directed the one shilling for damages on the ground that the tort was technical, but not actual.

Huddleston, B.—In this case there are two questions for our consideration—first, whether the uttering of a libel by a husband to a wife is a publication; and, secondly, whether the learned judge should have taken upon himself the issue as to the amount of damages due to the plaintiff. With regard to the first point I believe that this is the first occasion on which it has been alleged that the uttering or passing of a libel by a libeller to his wife is a publication. According to the common law principle husband and wife are one. Further, the uttering of a libel to the party libelled is, for the purposes of an action, no libel. Lastly, if a libel be uttered on a privileged occasion to a husband in the presence of his wife the privilege is not lost by her presence. In the American case Trumbull v. Gibbons, 3 City Hall Recorder, 97, the facts were as follows:—Gibbons wrote defamatory matter of Trumbull, and had fifty copies printed in pamphlet form in Massachusetts. Forty-five copies he retained and five copies he sent to his wife in New Jersey, indorsing four of them with the names of certain persons acquaintances of the wife, but without any instructions to his wife as to how she should dispose of the copies so sent to her. The wife delivered two of the copies in New Jersey to the persons whose names were indorsed, and the others she delivered in New Jersey to Trumbull, who exhibited them to various persons. On Trumbull suing Gibbons in New York for libel it was contended for the defendant (1) that there was no publication by defendant (2) or no publication within the State. The second point was overruled, and as to the first it was held that the delivery of the manuscript to be printed was a publication. Although a delivery to a wife in confidence would not be a publication, yet in the case then before the court the wife acted as the agent of her husband, and her delivery of the pamphlets amounted to a publication by the defendants. Now according to a well recognised principle husband and wife are in the same position, and therefore in cases apart from the Married Women's Property Act I hold that the uttering of a libel by a husband to his wife is no publication. The decision of the learned judge was right on this point. The next question is more difficult—viz., how far the judge at the trial was right in assuming the duties of a jury with respect to damages. It is contended on the one hand that the document which was defaced was not the property of the plaintiff, and that the act done to it was neither malicious nor mischievous, but was done bonâ fide.

At the trial the learned judge held that the testimonial handed over by the plaintiff to the defendant, was and remained the property of the plaintiff. That is, I think, a very debateable question. It may be argued that it was a question for the jury, looking at all the circumstances, whether the plaintiff, when he handed over the testimonial to the defendant, did not do so with the intention of passing the property in it. There is a difference between a letter written to a would-be employer in answer to an inquiry about a servant's character, and a general testimonial of good character. The latter, I should think, would be intended to be used as a voucher on future occasions, and there might well have been a question for the jury whether the handing over of the testimonial was a mere deposit of it or a parting with it. But as it happened the learned judge decided that point in favour of the plaintiff. The learned judge also took upon himself to decide the amount of damages. Now this was a matter for the jury and not for him. He seems to have thought that the only measure of damage was the expense that the plaintiff would be put to in obtaining a renewal of the testimonial. Yet even so would not that expense be more than a shilling? There would be the expense in finding out where the lady was. But it was open to the jury to find that the indorsement was malicious, and in such event they might have given heavy damages. The other issues must be sent down and be re-tried by a jury.

On January 30, 1888, an order for alimony pendente lite, and on February 1, 1888, an order for permanent alimony, was made in the Probate and Divorce Division. The sum of £130 being due under these orders, a judgment summons in respect thereof was issued by the wife.

Held, that a receiving order in lieu of a committal could not be made by the court against the husband under section 103, sub-section (5), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, but that the wife was entitled to come to the court under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and that an order directing payment by monthly instalments of £10 should be made.

This case came before the court in the form of a judgment summons issued by Mrs. Otway against her husband in respect of £130 arrears of alimony.

On November 30, 1887, a decree for a judicial separation was granted in the Probate and Divorce Division. On January 30, 1888, an order for alimony pendente lite, at the rate of 25s. a week from the date of the service of the citation to the date of the decree, was obtained, and on February 1, 1888, an order for permanent alimony was made, at the rate of £2 2s. per week from the date of the final decree.

The sum of £130 being due from the husband in respect of these orders, a judgment summons was issued by Mrs. Otway, and on March 24, 1888, a receiving order in lieu of a committal under section 103, sub-section (5), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was made by Cave, J., against the debtor, but an application on his behalf for leave to have the case reheard and argued on the question whether, under the circumstances, a receiving order could be made, was subsequently allowed.

Sidney Woolf, for the debtor.—No doubt, after the decision in Ex parte Linton, In re Linton, 33 W. R. 714, 15 Q. B. D. 239, these are orders (or the order for permanent alimony is an order) enforceable under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, the sums being debts due in pursuance of orders of a competent court. But to enable the court to make a receiving order under section 103, sub-section (5), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the application under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, must be by a "judgment creditor" against a judgment debtor. These orders are not judgments, and cannot be enforced like judgments.

He also referred to Ex parte Fryer, In re Fryer, 34 W. R. 766, 17 Q. B. D. 718; Bailey v. Bailey, 32 W. R. 856, 13 Q. B. D. 855.

B. Abrahams (solicitor), appeared for Mrs. Otway.

Cave, J.—In the case of Ex parte Fryer it was held that the words "judgment creditor" in section 103, sub-section (5), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, must be construed strictly, and, therefore, that a receiving order in lieu of a committal cannot be made under that section on the application of every person who is entitled to apply to the court under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869. In Bailey v. Bailey it was held that an order to sign final judgment under ord. 14, r. 1, will not be made where the action is for arrears of alimony pendente lite payable under an order of the Probate and Divorce Division. That case shows that a wife in such case cannot be said to be a judgment creditor in the strict sense, and the same reasoning is applicable in the case of permanent alimony. It follows, therefore, that Mrs. Otway is not a judgment creditor, and cannot have a receiving order. But she is entitled to come to this court under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869. The receiving order must be reversed, and, instead of it, I will make an order upon the debtor for payment of the amount due by monthly instalments of £10.

Order accordingly.

Bankruptcy — Appointment of trustee — Objection of Board of Trade—Difficulty of acting with impartiality—Notification to court—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 21.

On October 1, 1887, a deed of assignment was executed by the debtor for the benefit of his creditors, under which a trustee was appointed, who dealt with the estate. On December 10, 1887, a bankruptcy petition was presented against the debtor, the act of bankruptcy alleged being execution of the said deed, and the debtor was adjudicated bankrupt. On February 11, 1888, the trustee under the deed was appointed by the creditors the trustee in the bankruptcy, but the appointment was objected to by the Board of Trade, on the ground that his connection with the bankrupt's estate made it "difficult for him to act with impartiality in the interest of the creditors generally."

Held, that the objection was right, and must be sustained.

Notification to the court by the Board of Trade of their objection to the appointment of a trustee, under section 21 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

On the 10th of December, 1887, a petition was presented against the debtor Martin in the Cardiff County Court on which a receiving order was made, the act of bankruptcy alleged being the execution by the said debtor on the 1st of October, 1887, of a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors, under which one John Jenkins was appointed trustee.

Shortly after the making of the receiving order the was written by the official receiver to Jenkins, the trustee under the said deed, requiring him to render an account showing his dealings with the debtor's estate, and to remit any balance he might have in hand. To this letter a reply was received enclosing an account purporting to show the amounts received and paid by him under the said assignment, and a cheque for £48, the amount of the balance admittedly due from him to the estate.

On the 21st of January, 1888, the debtor was adjudged bankrupt, and on the 11th of February, 1888, the first meeting of the creditors was held at which the said John Jenkins was by a special resolution appointed trustee in the bankruptcy, the appointment being duly reported to the Board of Trade.

On the 16th of February, 1888, the official receiver wrote to Jenkins a letter applying for the repayment by him of a sum of £10 1s. 8d. debited against the estate in the account of the receipts and disbursements under the deed of assignment, incurred in opposing the bankruptcy petition, and certain other correspondence subsequently passed between the parties in which the official receiver applied in effect for further accounts of the dealings with the estate, and was answered by Jenkins that he had furnished accounts of all his transactions with the estate which he was advised he was legally liable to render.

Under these circumstances the Board of Trade objected to the appointment of Jenkins as trustee in the bankruptcy, on the ground that his connection with the bankrupt's estate rendered it "difficult for him to act with impartiality in the interest of the creditors generally," it being alleged (1) that he had dealt with the estate of the bankrupt with notice of the act of bankruptcy on which adjudication was made; (2) that he was accountable to the trustee in the bankruptcy in respect of such dealings; (3) that he had in his hands moneys forming part of the property of the bankrupt which he had failed to pay over, and that the question in respect thereof could only be ascertained by an investigation instituted by some other independent trustee.

At the request of the creditors the objection was now notified to the High Court under section 21, sub-section (3), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, in order that the court might decide on its validity.

Sir Edward Clarke, S.G., and Muir Mackenzie, for the Board of Trade.—A very troublesome duty is imposed on the Board of Trade in any case where they are compelled to interfere with the choice of the creditors, but the court will not reverse the objection unless it is quite clear there is no ground for the suggestions made. Where in a case of this kind there are circumstances from which it might be inferred that the trustee cannot act with impartiality, the Board of Trade have a discretion, and this court will not go fully into the particular facts which have led the board to come to the conclusion to which they have. Here it is clearly difficult for the person appointed to act with impartiality. There is a dispute as to moneys received, and the questions in dispute would have to be decided as between the trustee in the bankruptcy and the assignee under the deed In this case they are the same person.

Herbert Reed, for the trustee.—The objection of the Board of Trade really amounts to this, that any person who may be a trustee under a creditors' deed, and who may be supposed to be an accounting party, cannot possibly be appointed trustee in the bankruptcy. There is not the slightest imputation on Mr. Jenkins as being a person improper to be trustee, and there is not the slightest suggestion that, if it is shown that he ought to pay over the sums in dispute, he will not do so. The utmost in dispute appears to be £10 1s. 8d., and in any case there is plenty of machinery to enforce payment, even if it were refused.

Cave, J.—This is a question which arises under section 21 of the Act which enables the Board of Trade to make objection to the appointment of trustees, and which enacts that, if requested by a majority in value of the creditors, they are to notify the objection to the High Court, and that thereupon the High Court may decide upon its validity. Now, in the first instance, I take it that that requires the High Court to enter into an investigation, not only of the objection itself, but of the grounds on which the objection rests, and that, if the objection is not one which is authorized to be taken by the Act, the High Court must disallow the objection. Also that, if the objection is one which is authorized to be taken by the Act, but is one which is not founded upon any valid ground or upon any facts that can reasonably be held to support it, there also the High Court must hold the objection invalid, and give judgment accordingly. That being the jurisdiction, in my judgment, vested in the High Court, the question is, how it ought to exercise it in this case. Sub-section (2) of section 21 requires that the Board of Trade shall certify that the appointment of the trustee "has been duly made, unless they object to the appointment on the ground that it has not been made in good faith by a majority in value of the creditors voting, or that the person appointed is not fit to act as trustee, or that his connection with, or relation to, the bankrupt or his estate, or any particular creditor, makes it difficult for him to act with impartiality in the interest of the creditors generally."

Now the objection which is taken here is the third of these objections—namely, that the connection of this trustee with, or his relation to, the bankrupt or his estate makes it difficult for him to act with impartiality in the interests of the creditors generally. The connection of the trustee with the bankrupt or his estate which is objected to in this case is that Mr. Jenkins was appointed, on the 1st of October, 1887, the assignee of the estate of the debtor under a deed by which the estate was to be divided amongst the creditors. Undoubtedly that was an act of bankruptcy and might be treated as such by any dissentient creditor, and therefore it has been laid down that it was the duty of every person to treat it as an act of bankruptcy and not to act upon it in any way or shape until at least the statutory period had arrived after which it could not be impugned as being such an act of bankruptcy. Unfortunately in this case the trustee did not adopt that course, but in several instances he acted as if no act of bankruptcy had been committed, and consequently, by so acting, he has raised divers questions between himself and the estate which will have to be decided. The question I have to decide is, whether by so doing he has made it difficult for himself to act with impartiality in the matter.

It is always difficult, as it seems to me, for a man to decide between his duty and his interests — that is acknowledged upon all hands. Take one instance. With regard to courts of justice, no judge, however high or however low, however important or however unimportant the case he may be called upon to decide, is permitted to act in deciding the matter if he has any pecuniary interest, however small, in the result of his judgment. What is the case with reference to Mr. Jenkins? Has he made it difficult to act with impartiality? To my mind he has clearly done so, because he has put himself in the position in which he will have to decide between his own interests and the claims of the creditors. It is no answer to say that machinery exists by which, if he goes wrong, he may be forced back into the right road. The object of the statute is to avoid any such mischief in the outset, and to enable the Board of Trade to object to the appointment where the circumstances make it difficult for him to act with impartiality. Now here we have a very strong proof, as it seems to me, of this difficulty, because certainly in more than one instance, as far as I am able to judge at present, the contests between the interests and the duty of the trustee have prevented him from acting with impartiality.

I have not to decide whether the sums of money which he claims to retain against the estate are rightly retained by him or not, but certainly upon such an application as this, where he has retained sums of money and has decided these questions in his own favour and against the estate, one would have expected that the most ample explanation would have been forthcoming, in order to show that if it was difficult for him to act with impartiality he had at all events surmounted that difficulty in cases which had already come before him. I cannot, however, find that he has done so. There is a sum of £10 which he says, at the request of the debtor, he paid to his solicitors as the costs of opposing the petition. Now that sum appears to have been paid after the act of bankruptcy had been committed, and in order to enable the debtor to oppose the petitioning creditor, the petition being founded upon the execution of that very deed. Undoubtedly it was his duty, being aware of the act of bankruptcy, to refuse to deal with any money in his hands belonging to the bankrupt until it appeared whether or not the money still continued to remain the money of the bankrupt, because when that deed was executed there was an act of bankruptcy, and the money might turn out to be the money of the trustee and not the money of the bankrupt. Whether he acted rightly or not in this particular instance, as I have said, it is not for me to decide on this particular application. All I can say is that, having to decide between himself and the estate, he has not satisfied me on this occasion that he acted with impartiality. So also I come to the same conclusion in respect of the two sums amounting to £11 5s. which Mr. Jenkins appears to have applied in payment of the costs of an investigation which had been made by his firm. Moreover, although it was his duty, as I have said, to wait until the expiration of the statutory period before dealing with an estate, his title to which might turn out to be invalid, he nevertheless proceeded to deal with that estate, and he incurred costs of putting up a portion of the property for sale. Those questions will have to be dealt with at some time or other. His interest will lead him to decide in favour of paying those expenses to himself. His duty to the creditors ought to draw him in the other direction. Consequently there again there will be a conflict between his interests and his duty, the very thing which it is contemplated by this section ought not to happen, and the possibility of the happening of which is a thoroughly good ground for the interference of the Board of Trade.

I say nothing about another question which may possibly also arise in time, and that is the temptation he will be under from time to time of showing by the result that it would have been better for the creditors if the deed of October 1 had been allowed to stand, and that a larger dividend would have been realized under that deed than under the bankruptcy. Upon the grounds which I have stated I think the objection made by the Board of Trade has been fully borne out in this inquiry, and, consequently, that it must be sustained.

Objection sustained.

Bankruptcy—Husband and wife not trading jointly or in partnership—Joint petition—Separate receiving orders—Practice—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 8.

On February 11, 1888, a receiving order was made against a husband and wife upon their joint petition, but the official receiver having discovered that they had not traded jointly or in partnership, the petition was subsequently amended to that effect, and a separate receiving order was made against each of the debtors. Objection was taken by the Board of Trade to the two receiving orders being made upon a joint petition, it being shown that the husband had no assets, and had acted only as manager in the wife's business.

Held, that the official receiver had locus standi to apply to the court to rescind the receiving order against the husband, and that, under the circumstances, it was the duty of the court to rescind the order.

Special case stated by his Honour Judge Chalmers from the county court at Birmingham pursuant to section 97 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

On February 11, 1888, a receiving order was made against John Bond and Claire, his wife, upon a joint petition presented by the two, and on February 14 the receiving order was duly advertised. On February 22 it was discovered by the official receiver that the petitioners were a man and his wife, but that they had not traded jointly or in partnership, and thereupon, on February 23, the petition was amended to that effect, and the joint receiving order was set aside, and a separate receiving order was made against each of the debtors and also separate adjudications.

The Board of Trade, however, objected to the two receiving orders being made upon a joint petition where there was no joint trading and no partnership, and on March 15 an application was made by the official receiver to the county court that the receiving order and adjudication against John Bond should be rescinded.

A special case was stated for the opinion of the High Court, the questions submitted being (1) whether the official receiver, either as official receiver or as trustee, had any locus standi to apply to have an adjudication or a receiving order rescinded under the above circumstances; (2) whether the court had any power to rescind a receiving order and adjudication, and dismiss the petition against an admittedly insolvent debtor, and, if so, whether in the present case the receiving order and adjudication ought to be rescinded and the petition dismissed, or what other order ought to be made.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver, stated the case, and showed that there were no joint assets and no joint liabilities, and that the husband, John Bond, had no assets at all, but had acted as manager of certain brickworks carried on by the wife.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that the application of the official receiver to rescind the receiving order and adjudication against John Bond should be granted.

The questions which presented themselves to the learned judge as questions of importance were two. First, whether the official receiver, either as official receiver or as trustee, had any locus standi to apply to have the adjudication or receiving order rescinded under the circumstances. Now I am of opinion that the official receiver, whether as official receiver or as trustee, in either capacity had a locus standi to apply to court. As an official receiver, and an officer, therefore, of the Board of Trade, representing the Board of Trade and having a duty to make known to the court all matters that come to his knowledge relating to the bankruptcy, I think that it was his duty to bring before the court the fact that separate receiving orders had been obtained wrongly on a joint petition, and that in that way as the learned registrar yesterday pointed out to me, the revenue had been deprived of a fee of £5, which would have had to have been paid if, as ought to have been done, there had been separate petitions instead of a joint petition. I am also of opinion that the official receiver had a locus standi as trustee as well, because, as trustee, he represents the interest of the creditors in the estate of the wife, and, as representing their interests, it is his duty to see that the assets of that estate were not applied wrongly in paying the expenses of the bankruptcy of the husband John. Inasmuch as there was a joint petition there was a danger that the assets might be applied in payment of the expenses of the husband's bankruptcy, and under those circumstances, in my judgment, the trustee was not bound to wait until any order of the kind had actually been made, but it was his duty to apply at once to the court in order that proper steps might be taken at the outset to prevent those expenses being incurred at all.

Now the second point upon which the learned judge desires my opinion is whether there is power to rescind a receiving order having regard to the language of section 8 of the Act. Section 8 of the Act is in these terms:—"A debtor's petition shall allege that the debtor is unable to pay his debts, and the presentation thereof shall be deemed an act of bankruptcy without the previous filing by the debtor of any declaration of inability to pay his debts, and the court shall thereupon make a receiving order." Now, with regard to that, undoubtedly it is the imperative duty of the court to make a receiving order where the petition is a proper petition, but where the petition is, as it is in this case, an abuse of the process of the court by joining two debtors who ought not to be joined, it thereby tends to deprive the revenue of a fee which ought to be paid, and it has for its object the payment of the expenses of a debtor with no assets out of the assets of a debtor who has assets. Under those circumstances I am clearly of opinion that the court had power to refuse to make the receiving order, and when the receiving order was wrongfully made to rescind it. In point of fact the registrar here did rescind the joint receiving order and made a separate receiving order against each of the debtors. I think that he ought to have done was this. He should have rescinded the joint receiving order and made a separate receiving order against the wife, and a separate adjudication against the wife, and with regard to John Bond he ought to have directed the petition to be amended by striking out John Bond's name and all reference to him as an insolvent debtor, and to have turned the petition into what it really was, a petition on behalf of the wife alone, out of whose pocket the whole of the costs of the petition up to that time had been paid. By that means there would have been a perfectly good receiving order and adjudication against the wife, and Bond would have been left to take such steps as he might have been advised to take—to file his own separate petition if he thought fit to do so, but to do it out of his own assets and not out of the assets of his wife's estate.

I therefore answer the questions put to the court—that the official receiver had a locus standi; and that the court had power to rescind the receiving order and adjudication against John Bond; and that it was the duty of the court to do so and amend the petition in the way I have pointed out.

Reg. v. Buckmaster. (a.)

Larceny by a trick—"Welshing."

The prosecutor deposited money with the prisoner, who appeared to be a "bookmaker," at a race meeting, to abide the event of a race. While the race was being run the prisoner left.

Held, that there was evidence to go to the jury of larceny at common law.

At the general quarter sessions for the county of Berks Walter Buckmaster had been tried upon an indictment which charged that he did, on the 9th of June, 1887, feloniously steal, take, and carry away certain money of the moneys of John Rymer.

It was proved that the prisoner and another man during the Ascot race meeting were the only persons standing upon a platform or stand made to represent "Safes," or iron safe chests. The words "Griffiths, the safe man," were printed upon it. The stand was outside the course on a spot on Ascot Heath, where carriages were placed and was not within any betting inclosure or ring.

The prisoner, with a book in his hand, was calling out "two to one against the field." Just before a race was about to be run, Rymer went up to him and asked, "What price Bird of Freedom?" to which he replied, "Seven to one to win." Rymer then deposited five shillings with Buckmaster, who told him that if the horse won he (Rymer) would win thirty-five shillings and get his own five shillings back. He also deposited another five shillings with Buckmaster, who told him that he would have fifteen shillings back including his own five shillings if the horse was first or second. The man who was with Buckmaster, and was acting with him, received the money, and the latter, with whom all the conversation took place, appeared to take down the bet in his book and gave Rymer a card with the words "Griffiths Safe Man" upon it.

While the race was being run the prisoner and the other man were seen by one of the witnesses to walk quietly away. They were followed for about twenty yards, and on the witness at once returning, the stand had gone.

The horse "Bird of Freedom" won the race, and thereupon Rymer went back to the place where the stand had been, and found that the prisoner and the other man had gone. He waited there for half an hour and then left. Much later in the afternoon Rymer saw the prisoner on another part of Ascot Heath and said, "I want £2 15s. from you." The prisoner said he knew nothing about it. Upon being told by Rymer that he would be detained, he admitted the bet, and said he had not the money, but that he was only the clerk and could take the prosecutor to the man who had it. He was then taken into custody, and upon him were found card tickets with the words "Griffiths the safe man" upon them.

It was elicited from Rymer in cross-examination that he would have been satisfied if he did not receive back the same particular coins he had deposited.

At the trial it was submitted that Rymer having parted voluntarily with the money there was no evidence of larceny, nor of any taking by prisoner, but the chairman declined to withdraw the case from the jury. No evidence at all was called on the part of the prisoner.

A verdict of guilty was returned, and the question for the opinion of this court was whether there was any evidence to be left to the jury.

Keith Frith, for the prisoner.—There was no evidence of larceny to go to the jury. Larceny as bailee is out of the question; so also larceny at common law, inasmuch as the prosecutor intended to part with the property in the specific coins deposited. The offence is, therefore, not larceny by a trick, but if anything it is obtaining money by false pretences: Powell v. Hoyland, 6 Ex. 67, per Parke, B. Had the horse won the prisoner would have been entitled to retain the money, and it is impossible that his guilt or innocence should depend upon the result of the race.

No counsel appeared for the prosecution.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—I am of opinion that this conviction should be affirmed.

The only question left for us by the case is whether there was any evidence of larceny. I think there was abundant evidence to go to the jury.

It was argued that the prosecutor intended to part with the property as well as the possession of the money, and that the offence, therefore, if any, was false pretences or nothing.

To this contention there are two answers—first, that there was no evidence of anything in the nature of a contract or consent which would be essential to pass the property from the prosecutor to the prisoner; this can only be effected by the assent of the two minds (per Wood, B., in Oliver's case, cited in R. v. Walsh, 2 Leach C. C. 1072), and, therefore, even if the prosecutor had any intention to part with the property, I do not think that it did in fact pass, because the intention of the prisoner was not to contract but to steal. But, secondly, I think that the true view is that the property in the money was not intended by the prosecutor to pass to the prisoner. The case of R. v. Robson, R. & R. 413, is very similar to the present one. The prosecutor in that case was induced to deposit money on the event of a bet, and the question left to the jury was whether, at the time the money was received by the prisoners, there was not a plan between them to keep it under the false colour of winning a bet. The jury so found, and it was held in this court that the conviction was right because the prosecutor had parted with the possession only. The taking was felonious because the property was obtained by fraud, and in the present case I think the same principles are applicable.

Pollock, B., Manisty, Hawkins, and Smith, JJ., concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

Divorce.

Turner (otherwise Thompson) v. Thompson. (a.)

Divorce — Impotency — Nullity — English marriage — Husband foreigner—Jurisdiction of foreign court.

A woman—a British subject domiciled in England—was here married to an American citizen, and the parties soon after went to the United States with the intention of making their permanent home there. The wife obtained a decree in one of the United States courts dissolving the marriage on the ground of her husband's impotency. After the dissolution she came to live in England, and, in consequence of doubts as to whether that decree was binding here, she filed a petition in this court to have the marriage declared null and void.

Held, that the American court had jurisdiction; that, by its decree, the marriage was absolutely and totally dissolved; and that, therefore, no marriage existed upon which this court could pronounce any decision.

Hearing of a petition for a declaration of nullity of marriage.

The petitioner, Georgina Turner, was a British subject domiciled in England, and on November 7, 1882, she went through the form of marriage with the respondent, Charles Peter Thompson, a citizen of the United States, and domiciled there. In 1873 they went to the United States, where they remained. The respondent, who was an officer in the Marine service of that country, was from time to time absent from his wife on professional duties, but they met and cohabited together from time to time during the intervals of his service. In February of 1879 the petitioner presented a petition to the Supreme Court of Columbia praying for a dissolution of the marriage on the ground of her husband's impotency; the form of decree in the United States being a dissolution of marriage, and not, as in this country, a declaration that it is null and void. In April, 1879, the court pronounced a decree dissolving the marriage. The petitioner then returned to this country, where she has ever since resided. Being desirous of marrying again, she was advised that there were doubts as to the validity in this country of the decree of the American court, and she accordingly in September, 1886, presented a petition to this court praying for a declaration that her marriage was null and void.

The case was undefended, and came before Butt, J., who raised the question whether there was anything on which the court could proceed, and whether the court had jurisdiction in the sense that if the marriage was absolutely dissolved by the decree of the United States court, then there would exist no marriage upon which this court could be called to pronounce an opinion, and the learned judge directed that the papers should be forwarded to the Queen's Proctor, in accordance with the provisions to that effect contained in 23 & 24 Vict. c. 144, ss. 5, 7, and 36 Vict. c. 31, in order that the question might be argued.

The case came on before Hannen, P., and after a discussion as to whether the statutes cited entitled the Queen's Proctor to intervene, it was arranged that the case should be argued on a demurrer to the petition to be filed by the Attorney-General.

This demurrer having been filed,

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 24.—Hannen, P., after stating the facts, said:—I am of opinion that this case is one in which this court has no jurisdiction in this sense, that the marriage has been totally and absolutely dissolved by the decree of the court of the United States, and therefore there is now no marriage between the parties which can be dissolved or declared null and void by this court. Though the marriage took place in England, it must undoubtedly, according to the decision in Harvey v. Farnie, which went up to the House of Lords, be taken to be primâ facie an American marriage, because the husband was domiciled in the United States, and primâ facie the courts of the place of domicile have jurisdiction in the matter. If the parties had remained in England then Niboyet v. Niboyet is an authority for saying that, under some circumstances, the courts of this country would have had jurisdiction. But, as a matter of fact, these parties, after the solemnization of the marriage went to the United States and there took up their permanent abode, and I am of opinion that the petitioner acquired a complete domicile in the United States. I know it is argued on her behalf that this is not so. It is said that she was originally a British subject; that as by the law of England the matter in dispute between herself and her husband would have been disposed of by a declaration that the marriage was null, she was therefore entitled to treat it as null and void from the beginning; and that consequently she never lost her English domicile, but by the law of England has remained a British subject. The fallacy which underlies that argument appears to me to be evident from this:—A woman when she marries a man, not only by construction of law but as a matter of fact, acquires the domicile of her husband if she lives with him in the country of his domicile. Here the petitioner not only married an American citizen, but after the marriage went with him to the United States with the intention of taking up her permanent abode with him in the country of his domicile. It is to be remembered that the marriage before it was annulled was, by the law of England, not absolutely void, but only voidable at the instance of the injured party. The petitioner might, had she thought fit, have enjoyed all the advantages of a wife, save that of marital intercourse. The marriage having been entered into in 1872, it was not until 1879 she instituted proceedings to have it set aside.

I am of opinion that at the time of the institution of that suit—which is the turning point of the case—the domicile of the petitioner was, in fact and law, in the United States, and that therefore the court of the United States had jurisdiction to annul the marriage. On this ground I dismiss the petition.

Petition dismissed.

"The Orwell." (a.)

Practice—Action under Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93)—Writ of inquiry before sheriff.

In an action to recover for loss of life under Lord Campbell's Act, retained in the Admiralty Division under section 11 of the Judicature Act, 1875, the court—there having been default in pleading—pronounced interlocutory judgment, and ordered the damages proceeded for to be assessed on a writ of inquiry directed to the sheriff of Middlesex.

This was an action instituted on behalf of Mary Ann Hughes and four of her children against the owners of the vessel Orwell to recover compensation under Lord Campbell's Act in respect of the death of her husband in consequence of a collision between The Orwell and the schooner Margaret Lewis.

The owners of The Orwell appeared in the action, but The Orwell having on the 7th of December been found solely to blame for the collision in an action of damage in rem instituted against her in this court, no application was made to transfer the present action to the Queen's Bench Division, and no defence was delivered therein.

The plaintiffs afterwards, on the 14th of March last, took out a summons returnable before the registrar calling upon the defendants to show cause why the plaintiffs should not be at liberty to enter up interlocutory judgment for damages to be assessed, and why such damages should not be assessed on a writ of inquiry directed to the sheriff of Middlesex.

March 16.—The summons was now referred to the judge, and by him adjourned into court.

Barnes, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.—The provisions of Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93) require that the damages in actions under that Act should be assessed by a jury, but, even if the court has a discretion, it ought to exercise it in sending this case to the sheriff for assessment of the damages: The Bernina, 35 W. R. 314, 12 P. D. 58; Rules of the Supreme Court, ord. 27, r. 4.

Raikes, for the defendants, contrâ, referred to The Gertrude, ante, pp. 191, 616, 12 P. D. 204, and the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 514, as showing that the court, in its discretion, ought to refer the question of damages to the registrar and merchants in the ordinary way.

The President.—I am of opinion that this application should be granted. It was established by The Bernina, that actions under Lord Campbell's Act were not within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, but they have been brought within the jurisdiction of this division, because now any action may be begun in any division of the High Court, though if it is not part of the business assigned to that division it may be transferred to a more appropriate division. Here an action under Lord Campbell's Act has been begun in this division and the defendants have not asked that it should be transferred to the Queen's Bench Division. Therefore, on the above principle, I am entitled to entertain this application. How, then, am I to deal with this application? My decision in The Gertrude has been pressed upon me. There I held that if the parties agreed to come into this division it must be assumed that they agreed to have the action tried according to the law and practice administered in this division. If I found that in practice this assumption was wrong, I should certainly refuse to allow the transfer of actions to this division, or should transfer them if brought here. But in The Gertrude there was solely a question of damages to be decided, and the registrar was not fettered by any Act of Parliament. Here, however, I am not left free; I am exercising the jurisdiction arising under Lord Campbell's Act. In that Act it is said that the damages are to be assessed by a jury, which is also to apportion them. Neither is there in this case any assent on the part of all parties to the case being decided according to the special practice of this division; and I am therefore bound to send the case to a jury unless there is such consent. Reference has also been made to section 514 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, but it is sufficient to say that what has been done in regard to cases under that section has been done under the special provisions of that Act. I therefore give interlocutory judgment as prayed, and I direct that the damages shall be assessed by a jury.

"THE PARISIAN." (a.)

Practice—Registrar and merchants—Receipt of evidence—Cross-examination of deponents—Ord. 37, r. 2.

*Affidavits brought into the Admiralty Registry in support of claims filed there are, by the practice of the court, receivable in evidence, notwithstanding that orders made for the cross-examination of the deponents have not been complied with. At the same time the weight in evidence to be attached to affidavits uncross-examined to is for the registrar, who, in his discretion, may require the deponents to be examined either in the registry or under a commission abroad, and if no examination of the deponents takes place, refuse to find in favour of the claim, on the ground that the evidence in support of it does not satisfy him that it is valid.

This was an action of damage instituted on behalf of the owner of the French vessel La Marie against the steamship Parisian.

The owners of The Parisian admitted their liability for fifty per cent. of the damage proceeded for, and an order was made referring the assessment of damages to the Liverpool district registrar, assisted by merchants. Thereupon the plaintiff filed their claim in the district registry at Liverpool, and himself made an affidavit in support thereof. On this affidavit being filed the defendants gave notice to the plaintiff to attend in the district registry for cross-examination, and obtained an order from the district registrar directing the plaintiff to attend for cross-examination at the reference. The plaintiff did not attend at the commencement of the reference, and it was then stated on his behalf that he resided in France, and that if his cross-examination was still desired it would be more convenient to him for a commission to issue to take his evidence abroad. The district registrar was of opinion that it would be more satisfactory that the plaintiff should attend for cross-examination in this country, but referred the matter to the judge, stating the above facts, and desiring directions—first, as to whether the affidavit of the plaintiff ought to be used at the reference as he had failed to appear; secondly, if he were to be cross-examined, whether he should attend before the district registrar for the purpose, or be allowed to give his evidence abroad under a commission.

* See La Trinidad v. Browne, ante, p. 138.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Charles Hall Q.C., and Stubbs, on behalf of the plaintiff, referred to ord. 37, r. 2, allowing the evidence in references in admiralty actions to be given by affidavit, and contended that although the district registrar was entitled to say what evidence he required, the proper and most convenient course, if further evidence was required, was for a commission to issue under which the plaintiff could be examined in France.

J. Walton, for the defendants, referred to ord. 38, r. 28, and Concha v. Concha, 35 W. R. 477, 11 App. Cas. 541, as showing the general intention of the Rules of the Supreme Court, that evidence given on affidavit should be subject to cross-examination.

BUTT, J.—I think the proper course in this case is for the district registrar to receive the affidavit of the plaintiff; but I also think he is perfectly within his rights if he refuses to give the statements in it any weight unless and until the plaintiff has been cross-examined either here or abroad. It may be doubtful whether the Supreme Court Rules give the registrar power to order the cross-examination of a deponent who resides abroad; but it is quite open to him under the practice now in force to say "I am not satisfied with the affidavit, and desire to have the oral evidence of the party making the affidavit." The course the district registrar may adopt on this point is, in my opinion, entirely in his discretion.

The next question is this, supposing the district registrar in his discretion requires that the deponent should be orally examined, before the district registrar can attach any weight to the affidavit, and the party on whose behalf the affidavit has been made wishes to further support his case by the deponent being so orally examined, how is the examination of the deponent to take place? Is the examination to be under a commission abroad or on the production of the deponent in this country? This is, again, a question very much for the discretion of the district registrar. In my opinion there is a material difference between a case where the person whose examination is in question is a party to the action, and a case where he is not a party to the action. If a deponent who is not a party to the suit is resident abroad it would, probably, be impossible to enforce his attendance here. It is quite a different thing where the deponent is a party to the action, who has it entirely within his power to come or to stay away. There is another question which I think should be taken into consideration by the district registrar—namely, the question of convenience and expense; for, whilst it may be unreasonable to require the attendance of a man resident in Brazil, it may be right to compel the attendance of a party resident in France. Here the plaintiff is the person who has made the affidavit. He resides at Granville in France, and there is no evidence that he is really ill. In the absence of such evidence I think the district registrar might in his discretion say, "I shall hold my hand and give no decision in favour of the plaintiff's claim until he comes and submits himself to cross-examination." If he is really too ill to come to this country within a reasonable time there is no reason why a commission should not issue for the purpose of his being cross-examined abroad; but if he is not too ill it is more convenient that he should come over here. The discretion is in the district registrar.

I may add that my decision does not, I think, conflict with the opinion of the Court of Appeal in Concha v. Concha, more especially as the House of Lords regarded the matter as one of discretion.

Practice—Solicitor and client costs—Jurisdiction to order in equitable matters—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 23—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 1.

The Court of Chancery formerly had, and the High Court in matters of equitable jurisdiction now has, a general discretionary power to award costs as between solicitor and client.

Decision of Kay, J., affirmed.

Appeal from Kay, J.

The action was one relating to the custody and possession of a small trust fund of £162 2s. 3d., collected at the parish church of St. Luke's, New Kentish Town, by means of offertory and alms collections for the purpose of building a parish-room to be used as a Sunday-school.

The plaintiffs were the vicar and churchwardens of the parish, and the defendants were the treasurers of a building committee that had been appointed to carry out this object. The fund in question was in the custody of the defendants, and the plaintiffs claimed to have the fund transferred to them, alleging that the fund had been handed to the defendants by the plaintiffs upon certain conditions only, which had not been, and could not be now, fulfilled, and that the plaintiffs were now the proper persons entitled to the custody of the fund. The defendants denied that the fund had been transferred to them in the manner alleged by the plaintiffs, and claimed to be the proper persons entitled to its custody.

Kay, J., dismissed the action, and being of opinion that the litigation was most unjustifiable, and that the fund should be protected to the utmost, he ordered that the plaintiffs should pay the costs of the defendants as between solicitor and client.

The plaintiffs appealed from that part of the order which directed them to pay the defendants' costs as between solicitor and client.

Swinfen Eady (Renshaw, Q.C., with him), for the appellants.—The judge had no jurisdiction to order the plaintiffs to pay the defendants' costs taxed as between solicitor and client. Though the defendants are trustees of this money, the plaintiffs are not their cestui que trusts. The old Court of Chancery had only jurisdiction to order costs to be paid as between solicitor and client (1) where charges of fraud or scandal were made and not proved; (2) where a public officer was made defendant in respect of his official capacity: Edenborough v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 2 Russ. 93; (3) where a trustee is defendant in a suit unsuccessfully instituted against him by cestui que trusts. The present case does not come under any of these heads. The Judicature Act has not enlarged the jurisdiction of the Chancery Division as to costs: ord. 65, r. 1; In re Mills' Estate, 35 W. R. 65, 34 Ch. D. 24; Annual Practice, 1887-8, p. 751. Costs as between solicitor and client cannot be given by way of damages: Cockburn v. Edwards, 30 W. R. 446, 18 Ch. D. 449.

He also referred to Turner v. Collins, 20 W. R. 385, L. R. 12 Eq. 438, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 329, 19 W. R. Ch. Dig. 83; Poole v. Pass, 1 Beav. 600; Attorney-General v. Compton, 1 Y. & C. R. 86, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 22. [COTTON, L.J., referred to Dungey v. Angove, 2 Ves. jun. 304, 313.]

Marten, Q.C., and S. W. Worthington, for the respondents, the defendants.—The plaintiffs claimed as cestui que trusts of this money on the footing of a resulting trust. [COTTON, L.J.—But Kay, J., has decided that they are not cestui que trusts, and that is not appealed from.] If they claim to be cestui que trusts that is sufficient to give jurisdiction as to costs. [COTTON, L.J.—The early cases as to scandal may throw some light on the matter as to jurisdiction: Ex parte Thorpe, 1 Ves. jun. 394.] Mordue v. Palmer fully recognizes the general jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery to order costs to be paid as between solicitor and client, and Edenborough v. Archbishop of Canterbury is distinctly in our favour, as is also Neaves v. Spooner, ante, p. 257.

Swinfen Eady replied.

On the conclusion of the argument the junior counsel on each side undertook to look into the early cases on the subject and submit them to the court.

The following additional cases were accordingly subsequently cited: Jones v. Coxeter, 2 Atk. 400; Burford (Bailiffs of) v. Lenthall, 2 Atk. 551; Cartwright v. Hateley, 1 Ves. jun. 292; Ex parte Simpson, 15 Ves. 476; Currie v. Pye, 17 Ves. 462; Dunlop v. Hubbard, 19 Ves. 205; Attorney-General v. Haberdashers' Co., 4 Bro. Cur. adv. vult.

June 12.—The judgment of the court (COTTON, FRY, and LOPES, L.JJ.) was delivered by

FRY, L.J.—In this case the plaintiffs sought to recover from the defendants a small sum of money held on trust for certain parochial purposes. The plaintiffs failed, and Kay, J., dismissed the action, with costs to be paid by the plaintiffs as between solicitor and client, on the ground that the fund ought to be preserved intact and unimpaired by the plaintiffs' wrongful claim, and that this would not be the case if the defendants were to receive the difference between costs on the two scales out of the fund, which, as trustees, they would be entitled to if not paid by the plaintiffs. The only question raised is whether Kay, J., had any jurisdiction to make this order. The suit, relating to the custody and possession of a trust fund, is clearly one which would have been proper and peculiar to the Court of Chancery when that court existed, and the question therefore is whether that court had jurisdiction to make such an order in such a case. The jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor in costs was essentially different to that at common law. "The giving of costs in equity," said Lord Hardwicke in Jones v. Coxeter, "is entirely discretionary, and is not at all conformable to the rule of law." "Courts of equity," said the same great judge in another case, "have in all cases done it"—i.e., dealt with costs—"not from any authority"—i.e., as we understand, from any statutory or delegated authority—"but from conscience and arbitrio boni viri, as to the satisfaction on one side or other on account of vexation": Bailiffs and Corporation of Burford v. Lenthall. An examination of the older general orders of the court made, not under any statutory authority, but from the general and inherent authority of the Lord Chancellor, will show that the court exercised a most wise discretion, not only as to the circumstances under which costs were to be awarded, but apparently as to the measure and fulness of the costs. The general orders will be found to use very varied language expressing different measures of estimation. We have references not only to costs and ordinary costs (Ord. 17th November, 1635, "Saunders," p. 180), but to full costs (Ord. 22nd August, 1654, ibid., p. 262); full costs and charges in travel, attendance, and otherwise (ibid., p. 265); "good costs" (Ord. 14th January, 1617—8, p. 291, 17th November, 1635, p. 183); "very good costs" (Ord. 17th November, 1631, p. 66, 25th November, 1658, p. 280); "utmost costs to be assessed by the court" (Ord. 29th January, 1618—9, p. 116); "uttermost cost and charge to be assessed by the court" (Ord. April, 1596, p. 69); "double costs" (Ord. 17th November, 1635, p. 182); "treble costs and quadruple costs" (Ord. 29th January, 1618—9, p. 117). It would be useless to attempt to ascertain the precise value of the expressions used, but they are inconsistent with any notion that the court was confined to one measure of costs. The same control over the amount of costs is shown by the language frequent in such orders, which asserts the full discretion of the court in this matter. "Such costs as the court shall think reasonable" (Ord. 29th October, 1683, p. 359) and "such costs as their lordships shall think fit to inflict" (Ord. 29th October, 1692, p. 397) are instances of numerous like expressions. Again, the makers of these orders exercised a right to fix arbitrarily the amount of costs to be paid in particular cases; that in 1669 (Ord. 12th February, 1669—70, p. 335) 10s. was fixed as the costs to be paid for every frivolous exception to a master's report, which sum in 1689 (Ord. 17th January, 1689—90, p. 387) was increased to 20s., and many similar instances may be found. Lastly, in the particular case now before us of the failure of the plaintiff, we find the orders of August 22, 1654 (p. 265), providing that the plaintiff should pay the defendant "his full costs upon a bill of costs to be allowed by the six clerks, or any two of them; and in case the court upon the hearing shall find the suit to have been vexatious, the court shall give additional costs against a plaintiff, to be pronounced by the court at the hearing, besides the said costs to be taxed upon the bill." The jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in the matter of costs has been supposed by an eminent writer on the subject—Mr. Beames—to be derived from the recently-repealed statute, 17 Rich. 2, c. 6, which enacts that "forasmuch as people be compelled to come before the King's Council or in Chancery by writs grounded upon untrue suggestions, that the Chancellor for the time being, presently after such suggestions be duly found and proved untrue, shall have power to ordain and award damages, according to his discretion, to him which is so troubled unduly as afore is said." It may be that costs are included under the word damages. But it will be observed, as has, indeed, been long ago pointed out by Coke (4 Inst. 83) that the jurisdiction thus given only arose after proof of the untruth of the allegations, and, therefore, could be exercised only on or after the hearing of the cause. It cannot, therefore, be the foundation of the jurisdiction to award costs in all stages of the suit, and for the insufficiency as well as the untruth of the matters alleged. The records of the Court of Chancery during the last century show that in numerous cases it has exercised the right of giving costs between attorney and client, or, to use the more recent language of the cases, between solicitor and client. Such costs were awarded in the cases of Attorney-General v. Haberdashers' Co. and Currie v. Pye to an heir at law made a party to a suit relative to a charity; in Ex parte Thorp to creditors of a bankrupt who, as petitioner, applied in bankruptcy to set aside a commission fraudulently sued out to clear the bankrupt from his debts; in Dungey v. Angove to a landlord made defendant by a tenant to a bill of interpleader, which had been brought by the tenant in collusion with a stranger; in Ex parte Simpson and numerous other cases on the ground of scandal; in Edenborough v. Archbishop of Canterbury to the Attorney-General, and also to the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London, where the plaintiff sought to restrain the induction of a particular person; in Palmer v. Walesby against the next friend to a person in whose name a bill had been filed by this next friend falsely alleging him to be of unsound mind.

In none of the cases which we have consulted has the court stated any limitation of its jurisdiction to award costs as between solicitor and client, though various circumstances have been stated as influencing the discretion of the court—in some cases to vindicate the honour and justice of the court, and in Palmer v. Walesby on the ground of the right of the applicant to indemnity, the reason alleged by Kay, J., for awarding them in the present case. The general jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in this respect is stated with great clearness by the Lords Justices in Mordue v. Palmer. In the course of a chancery suit a reference was made to arbitration, which ordered that the costs should be in the determination of the arbitrator. He awarded them as between solicitor and client, and the Court of Appeal held that as the reference was in chancery the arbitrator had power so to do. "The Common Law Courts," said Mellish, L.J., "have no power to give costs as between solicitor and client, and therefore, when there is a reference, the arbitrator cannot give any other than costs between party and party. But it is otherwise with courts of equity; and I therefore think that when a reference as to costs is made by a court of equity, the court gives the arbitrator jurisdiction to award costs as between solicitor and client if he shall think fit." It was argued that in Cockburn v. Edwards a different view was taken by the Court of Appeal, but the point then only rose indirectly, and the point does not appear to have been argued. If, therefore, there is any discrepancy between this case and Mordue v. Palmer, we think that the decision in the latter case must prevail, not only as more express, but as being in accordance with the earlier authorities. From this consideration of the earlier authorities we conclude that there was inherent in the Court of Chancery at the time of its abolition a general and discretionary power to award costs as between solicitor and client to a successful party, and when the justice of the case might so require, and that Kay, J., therefore had jurisdiction to make the order which he pronounced, and consequently that this appeal fails. As the nature of the suit was one of equitable jurisdiction, the question whether the judges of the High Court have any power to award costs as between solicitor and client in matters of common law jurisdiction does not arise, and on it we express no opinion.

Reg. v. St. Mary, Islington, 15 Q. B. D. 95, 34 W. R. Dig. 135, overruled.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division upon a special case stated under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, on appeal against an order of removal whereby it was adjudged that the last legal settlement of Eliza George, a pauper, and her children was in the parish of Fordington, in the appellant union.

The pauper, Eliza George, was born on the 9th of February, 1851, in the parish of Fordington, in the appellant union, being the legitimate daughter of Stephen and Susan Balster.

On the 9th of February, 1867, when the pauper attained the age of sixteen years, her father was alive and had acquired a settlement in the parish of Plumstead, in the Plumstead Union, by renting and occupying a tenement, and paying all rates and taxes for the same.

In September, 1878, the pauper was married to James George, a ship's fireman and native of Africa, who never had any legal settlement. There were five children issue of the marriage, the eldest of whom was seven years of age. In January, 1887, the pauper was deserted by her husband, and she and her children became chargeable to the respondent union.

The question for the court was whether the order, adjudging the settlement of the pauper and her children to be in the parish of Fordington in the appellant union, was rightly made.

The Divisional Court (Mathew and A. L. Smith, JJ.) quashed the order. The respondents appealed.

Besanquet, Q.C., and F. Mead, for the respondents, the present appellants.—The pauper, being over sixteen, is not within the exception in section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, which abolishes derivative settlements except in the case of a wife from her husband, "and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age." That only applies to a child who at the time of removal is under sixteen. That appears from the language of Brett, M.R., and Cotton, L.J., in Reg. v. Bridgnorth, 31 W. R. 938, 11 Q. B. D. 314. The words, "and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another," apply to a child which is removed under the age of sixteen and settled at that time, and being so settled it is to retain that settlement after sixteen until it acquires another. The clause does not apply when the person whose removal is in question is over sixteen. That is the decision in Reg. v. St. Mary, Islington, 15 Q. B. D. 95, which was affirmed in the Court of Appeal, 15 Q. B. D. 339, 34 W. R. Dig. 135. No doubt the Highworth Union v. Westbury-on-Severn Union, ante, p. 422, 20 Q. B. D. 597, is inconsistent with this view, but the former decision ought to be followed. The pauper, therefore, is not within the exception, and does not take her father's settlement, her settlement being in the parish in which she was born. The order of the justices was, therefore, right.

They also referred to Croydon Union v. Reigate Union, 35 W. R. 824, 19 Q. B. D. 385; Reg. v. Marylebone, 13 Q. B. D. 15, 32 W. R. Dig. 144; Rex v. Bleasby, 3 B. & Ald. 377.

Bowen Rowlands, Q.C., and R. Cunningham Glen, for the appellants, the present respondents, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—There is always a difficulty in expressing oneself so as to prevent any possibility of one's language being used in a subsequent case in a sense that is not intended. The language one uses must be read with reference to the subject-matter under discussion, and so, without retracting anything that I have previously said when regarded in that light, I will now state the conclusion at which I have arrived.

We have to deal with the question of the removal of a woman over the age of sixteen. The fact that she is a mother makes no difference. Indeed the question would in this case be just the same if she were a man. She is a married woman, but her husband has never had a settlement of his own. Therefore, though she is a wife, she is the wife of a man who has never had a settlement. We have to apply to her case the provisions of section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876. That section abolishes derivative settlements "except in the case of a wife from her husband"—the husband here has no settlement for the pauper to take, and so she is not within that exception—"and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age"—this is not the case of a child under sixteen—"and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another." In my opinion the true construction of that section is that no one can derive a settlement except in the two cases mentioned. A wife may derive a settlement from her husband, but not from her husband's father, as was pointed out in Reg. v. Bridgnorth. A child under sixteen shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, and that is the only settlement a child under sixteen can take, every other settlement being excluded. That deals with the case of a child under sixteen. The last clause goes on to deal with a child after sixteen, "and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another." It is obvious that this deals with the case of a person who is over sixteen when the moment of adjudication arrives. When the child reaches the age of sixteen it has the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, and it is to retain that settlement until it—that is, the person over sixteen—shall acquire another. The suggestion that a child under sixteen can acquire a settlement for itself is negatived by the former part of the section, which says that such child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother. In this case the settlement of the pauper's father was in the parish of Plumstead. When the question of the pauper's removal arose she had not acquired another settlement. While under sixteen she took the settlement of her father, and, as she had not acquired another since she was sixteen, she retained that settlement.

In arriving at this decision I do not break from anything I have said before. The only case to the contrary is Reg. v. St. Mary, Islington. The Bridgnorth case is, I protest, not to the contrary. Certain observations in that case have been treated as if they were applicable to the whole section. We were dealing there with the section item by item, and the language used with reference to each item must be confined to that item, and must not be extended in a way that was never intended. No doubt the Islington case is contrary to our present decision, and that case was affirmed in the Court of Appeal. But the Court of Appeal affirmed the decision because it was stated and not denied that the case was the same as the Bridgnorth case. It was upon that erroneous assumption that the decision was affirmed. But even if it be said that we affirmed the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, still we have the later case of the Highworth Union v. Westbury Union contrary to it, and we must adopt one and reject the other. If, then, we did come to a wrong decision in the Islington case, we must now adopt the Highworth case. I am about to Practice—Married woman—Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Writ of sequestration—Form of—Discovery in aid of execution—Jurisdiction of Divorce Division—Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), ss. 35, 52—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 42, r. 33; ord. 43, r. 6; ord. 68, r. 1.

HYDE v. HYDE. (a.)

It is the proper practice in the Divorce Division now, as it was in the Divorce Court formerly, to issue writs of sequestration in general form against "the estate and effects" of a married woman, without any express limitation in the writ to property of the married woman not subject to a restraint on anticipation; but nevertheless the writ can only operate on property of the married woman not subject to a restraint on anticipation.

Scott v. Morley, ante, p. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120, distinguished.

In a suit in the Divorce Division for dissolution of marriage, an order was made on the wife to deliver up the children to the custody of the husband, and not to withdraw them from the jurisdiction of the court. The wife, who at the date of the order had been residing with her sister and brother-in-law, evaded service of the order and did not comply with it.

Butt, J., on the application of the husband, made an order directing the wife's sister and the brother-in-law to attend before the court for the purpose of being examined as to their knowledge of the whereabouts of the wife and children.

Held, that a judge of the Divorce Division had no jurisdiction to make such an order.

Appeal from Butt, J.

A decree nisi for dissolution of the marriage between Mr. and Mrs. Hyde had been made on the petition of the husband, and on December 21, 1887, an order was made that the wife should, within one week, deliver up the children of the marriage to the husband.

On May 29, 1888, the wife having failed to comply with the order of December 21, on the application of the husband an order was made for committal of the wife for contempt, and that a writ of sequestration should issue against all the estate and effects of the wife, and, further, that the mother, the sister (Mrs. Felgate), and brother-in-law of the wife should attend before the court to be examined as to their knowledge of the whereabouts of the wife and children.

It appeared from the uncontradicted evidence of the person who was employed to serve the order of December 21 on the wife, that on going to the last known address of the wife, he was informed by the wife's sister that the wife was not at home, but was expected to return, and that he left a copy of the order with the sister, and on going there again shortly afterwards he was informed that the wife had gone to America. Being unable to effect service on the wife, that he sent the order in a registered letter to the residence of the wife's sister; and that the letter was received and never returned.

The marriage between Mr. and Mrs. Hyde took place in October, 1881, and under the marriage settlement Mrs. Hyde was tenant for life of certain real and personal estate for her separate use without power of anticipation.

The wife appealed from the order of May 29.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Lewis Coward (Philpotts with them), for the appellant.—First, no attachment ought to have been issued without personal service of the order of December 21, and there is no sufficient evidence to show that the wife evaded personal service. Allen v. Allen, 33 W. R. 826, 10 P. D. 187, is, therefore, distinguishable. Secondly, the writ of sequestration ought to have been expressly limited to separate property of the wife not subject to the restraint on anticipation, following the form of judgment in Scott v. Morley, ante, p. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120; Miller v. Miller, 18 W. R. 585, L. R. 2 P. & D., at p. 55. The court has no jurisdiction, either directly or indirectly, to make an order affecting property of a married woman subject to a restraint on anticipation: In re Glanville, Ellis v. Johnson, 34 W. R. 309, 31 Ch. D. 532; Claydon v. Finch, L. R. 15 Eq. 266, 21 W. R. Dig. 146. Thirdly, there was no jurisdiction to order the wife's relatives to attend for examination: In re Spence, 2 Ph. 247, at p. 253.

English Harrison, for the trustees of the wife's marriage settlement.

Inderwick, Q.C., and R. H. Pritchard, for the husband, the respondent, were only called on as to the second and third points.—In Miller v. Miller the writ of sequestration was general in form, and also in Allen v. Allen; and Symonds v. Symonds, L. R. 2 P. & D. 447, 21 W. R. Dig. 93. On the third point, s. 35* of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, give the Divorce Court power to make orders as to the custody of the children, and section 52† gives that court power to enforce its orders in the same manner as the Court of Chancery could do. The Court of Chancery would have had jurisdiction to make this order for examination of these persons. [FRY, L.J.—Even if the infants were not wards of court?] Yes: Rosenberg v. Lindo, 48 L. T. N. S. 478, 31 W. R. Dig. 92.

They also referred to the Chancery Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 86), s. 39.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—Except in the case of wards of court, the Court of Chancery could not have made this order for examination. Rosenberg v. Lindo was a case of wards of court. As to limiting the writ of sequestration to property not restrained from anticipation, he referred to Birch v. Birch, 8 P. D. 163, 31 W. R. Dig. 153; Willcock v. Terrell, 3 Ex. D. 323, 27 W. Cur. adv. vult.

June 6.—COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Butt, J., ordering a sequestration to issue against the present appellant. The first point taken by the appellant is that, as the original order was not personally served, it would be wrong therefore to issue sequestration. In my opinion that objection cannot prevail. No doubt the general rule is that sequestration will not be ordered when there has not been personal service of the order in respect of the non-compliance with which sequestration is sought, but there are exceptions to that rule, and if the court is shown that the party knows of the order—as, for instance, if the party was in court when the order was made, or otherwise knew of the order—that is an exception to the general rule. What is the evidence here? [The Lord Justice went through the evidence, and continued:—] In my opinion the proper conclusion to be drawn from the evidence is, that Mrs. Felgate was in communication with Mrs. Hyde, and that Mrs. Hyde kept out of the way in order to evade service, and therefore that the order appealed from was in this respect right, and followed the principle laid down in Allen v. Allen.

The second objection was that the writ of sequestration was too general in its form. It was said that in the case of Miller v. Miller the order directing the issue of the writ of sequestration was confined to the separate estate of the married woman. Now the registrar has obtained the order and writ of sequestration in that case, and they are both found to be general in form, as in the present case, and the registrar also informs us that the practice in the Divorce Division is to issue the writ of sequestration in that general form. The question, of course, as to what property of the married woman the writ will operate upon, though not now necessary to be decided, would arise hereafter, and as the point has been argued, and is important, I think it well to express my opinion upon it. In my opinion, with regard to what could be sequestered as against a married woman—and I give no opinion as to what would be the case if there were evidence before the court that the married woman had no property except what she was restrained from anticipating, as here we have evidence that there are some arrears of income which has already become due—it would be wrong, as to future income restrained from anticipation, to direct the sequestrator to take possession, or to hold that he could be put in possession, of such: the doctrine of equity being that a married woman can neither anticipate such income herself, nor act so as to enable any other person to receive it by way of anticipation, that doctrine having even been applied in the case of a fraud committed by the married woman. I am of opinion, therefore, that the court has no right or power to order the sequestrator to take possession of income which the married woman is restrained from anticipating.

The third point taken as to the order appealed from is an important one also—viz., as to that part of the order requiring the attendance of these persons—the appellant's mother, sister, and brother-in-law—to be examined. The ground on which that part of the order seems to have been made is ord. 42, r. 33, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883. But these rules do not apply to the Divorce Division. It was said on behalf of the present respondent that under section 52 of the Divorce Act, 1857, orders made by the old Divorce Court were to be enforced and put in execution in the same or the like manner as orders of the old Court of Chancery were enforced and put in execution. In my opinion the effect of that section is to provide that the mode adopted by the old Court of Chancery as to the enforcement and execution of its orders was to be followed when that differed from that pursued in the old common law courts. Now, no doubt the old Court of Chancery in the case of its own wards, and with reference to matters affecting them, had power to make such orders and to enforce them in this particular way. But the Court of Chancery had no such power as this in cases not affecting wards of court. Section 35 of the Act of 1857 does not enable the Divorce Court to make the infants wards of court, and therefore the Divorce Court cannot be said to be following the practice of the Court of Chancery in enforcing its orders in this particular way, as that practice referred only to wards of court.

* Section 35 of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), so far as material, enacts:—"In any suit, &c. . . . for obtaining a judicial separation . . . the court may . . . . make such provision as it may deem just and proper with respect to the custody, maintenance, and education of the children, the marriage of whose parents is the subject of such suit, . . . and may, if it shall think fit, direct proper proceedings to be taken for placing such children under the protection of the Court of Chancery."

† Section 52:—"All decrees and orders made by the court in any suit, &c., . . . instituted under this act shall be enforced and put in execution in the same or like manner as the judgments, orders, and decrees of the High Court of Chancery may now be enforced and put in execution."

It was said that the order was only enforcing the order made on a matter in issue before the court—viz., the custody of the children. But that contention will not hold. There was no issue before the court with reference to which these persons could be summoned as witnesses. The issue as to the custody of the children has been already determined. I think, therefore, that this part of the order cannot stand.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. On the first point, as to want of personal service, the inference I draw from the evidence as a conclusion of fact is, that the appellant knows perfectly well what the order was, and has been evading service of the order. Then as to the general form of sequestration. The fact that a general form has always been the one adopted since 1857 in the Court of Probate and Divorce formerly, and now in the Probate Division—and such is the knowledge of the registrar—inclines one to the opinion that the general form is the right one. I need not enumerate categorically the cases referred to, but will only mention Miller v. Miller, decided in 1870. There there had been, no doubt, an application for a writ of sequestration against the separate estate of the respondent, a married woman, and Lord Penzance directed a writ of sequestration to issue, but said, "It may be necessary hereafter to decide what property will be subject to the writ." We have seen the actual writ of sequestration issued in Miller v. Miller, and it is a writ general in form, and, therefore, it seems to me that the Judge Ordinary there determined that the writ should issue in the first instance in general form.

Then as to the property it is to affect. I agree that it is not right that future income subject to a restraint on anticipation should be subjected to the effect of the writ. I think the case of In re Glanville shows that, and that to hold the contrary would have the effect of doing indirectly what the court cannot do directly—viz., to allow a married woman to prejudice her right to the income by doing an act which will have the effect of anticipating it.

On the other point I think Mr. Cozens-Hardy's contention must prevail. Ord. 68, r. 1, shows that the orders and rules made under the Judicature Acts do not apply to divorce and other matrimonial causes. Is there any jurisdiction under the Act of 1857 to make this order? [The Lord Justice read section 52 of the Act of 1857, and continued:—] Was the examining persons not parties to the cause any possible mode in 1857 of putting in execution a judgment of the Court of Chancery? It seems not, except under two possible contingencies, the first of which was the case of wards of court, and the second was for the purpose of obtaining evidence with reference to matters in issue in a pending litigation. Neither of these contingencies are applicable here; and the Court of Chancery had no power to exercise a general right of discovery in aid of execution.

FRY, L.J.—Three points have been put forward against this order. First, that it was bad because there had been no personal service, and that there was no evidence that the present appellant evaded service. I cannot agree in that view, as I think there is evidence that the appellant evaded service.

Then it was said that the form of the writ to issue execution was too wide, and that it ought to have been confined, as in Scott v. Morley, to the separate property of the married woman not subject to any restraint against anticipation. That was a judgment for damages obtained against a married woman under the provisions of section 2, sub-section (1), of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. But in regard to sequestration that statute says nothing at all, and decides nothing at all, and therefore we are not bound by what was said in that case as to that statute. Then I do not think it was the course of the old Court of Chancery or of the Divorce Court to limit the writ of sequestration in anticipation of questions that might arise. The writ ran in general terms, and the case of Fenton v. Lowther, 1 Cox, at p. 315, shows that, though the writ was in that wide form, the salary of an equerry to one of the Royal Family did not come within the grasp and operation of the writ. The only point on which I differ from the order made by the judge below is as to that part of the order directing these persons to attend for examination. I cannot find any jurisdiction authorizing that. Section 35 of the Act of 1857 was relied on, giving the Divorce Court power to make orders with respect to the custody, &c., of the children, but that was only as between the parties to the litigation. Then it was said to be authorized by section 52, but I know of no case to show that the Court of Chancery had power to summon persons to make discovery in aid of execution. Even if the Court of Chancery had such power, this part of the order is not for the purpose of enabling the court to enforce any order made, but to enable the court to consider whether it should make some other order.

Appeal dismissed.

HANCOCK v. BERREY. (a.)

Mortgage—Release by parol—Handing over mortgage deed—Absence of consideration.

Two brothers were, subject to their mother's life interest, entitled to a fund in equal moieties. One of them mortgaged his share to his father, who died, having appointed the other brother his executor and residuary legatee. He, on the death of his mother, wrote to his brother, the mortgagor, that, in accordance with her wish that he should hand over to him the mortgage deed, he gave himself the satisfaction of fulfilling her desire, and he inclosed the deed accordingly. Afterwards he insisted on his rights under the mortgage.

Held, that the gift, being by parol and without consideration, was imperfect, although accompanied by delivery of the deed, and could not be enforced by the mortgagor.

By an indenture of the 25th of March, 1858, George

(a.) Reported by H. F. AMEDROZ, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Berrey assigned to his father, G. J. Berrey, all the share or interest to which he was then entitled in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy of or in the estate of the testator, C. Hancock, by way of mortgage for securing repayment to H. J. Berrey of £2,575 10s.

G. J. Berrey died in 1872, having by his will appointed his son, Charles Berrey, his executor and residuary legatee. The interest of George Berrey in the estate of C. Hancock remained reversionary until the 20th of October, 1887, when, on the death of his mother, it fell into possession. It was represented by a sum of £2,873 10s. 8d. Consols, to which George Berrey and his brother Charles Berrey were entitled in equal shares.

On the 30th of November, 1887, Charles Berrey wrote to his brother, George Berrey, as follows:—

"Dear George,—I have found a letter addressed by our good mother to me, in which she expresses a wish that I should hand over to you the deed of assignment by which you finally relinquished (in part consideration for large sums advanced) your share in the moneys bequeathed ultimately to ourselves equally by her father. I now give myself the satisfaction of fulfilling her desire, and herewith inclose deed accordingly. I may mention that, although, of course, I had no thought (till I read my mother's letter) of making you a present of what belonged to myself, particularly as you are so much better provided for than I am, it was contrary to my intention that the matter of the assignment was revived so soon. I may add that I had not seen the above-mentioned letter up to Thursday last, and that I procured the deed only yesterday, otherwise I should probably have acquainted you earlier with the last proof of your mother's love.—Yours,

"Charles E. Berrey."

George Berrey acknowledged the receipt of the deed and letter, and he retained possession of the deed.

Subsequently Charles Berrey refused to release his rights under the mortgage of the 25th of March, 1858, whereupon the trustee of the estate of C. Hancock took out this summons to have it determined who was entitled to the £1,436 15s. 4d., the share of George Berrey in the estate.

It appeared that George Berrey had never paid any interest on the £2,575 10s., nor given any acknowledgment in respect thereof, and he set up the Statute of Limitations as a bar to the claim under the mortgage. But the court held that, as the interest of George Berrey was reversionary, the right to enforce the mortgage arose only when it fell into possession: Hugill v. Wilkinson, ante, p. 633.

There remained the question as to the effect of the above letter of Charles Berrey, coupled with the return of the mortgage deed.

Hope, for the summons.

E. Ostler, Q.C., and S. Peel, for Charles Berrey, contended that as there was no consideration for his letter to George Berrey, it did not, either in law or equity, constitute a release of the mortgage debt.

They cited Antrobus v. Smith, 12 Ves. 39; Cross v. Sprigg, 6 Ha. 552, and In re Richardson, Shillito v. Hobson, 34 W. R. 286, 30 Ch. D. 396.

Marten, Q.C., and Horsley, for George Berrey.—The letter of Charles Berrey and his forwarding the mortgage deed amounts to a release of his rights as mortgagee, and to a direction to the trustee to hold the share in trust for George Berrey.

They cited Richards v. Syme, Barnard. Ch. Rep. 90, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 617; Flower v. Marten, 2 My. & Cr. 459; Taylor v. Manners, 14 W. R. 154, L. R. 1 Ch. 48; Freemans v. Williams, L. Hope referred to Byrn v. Godfrey, 4 Ves. 6.

Kay, J., after deciding the question of the Statute of Limitations, went on to say: Then a serious question arises as to the effect of Charles Berrey's letter. Now it is true that his desire in writing that letter was to carry out his mother's wish, but he received no consideration for so doing, and the question, therefore, is, whether, when a mortgagee without consideration hands over his mortgage deed to the mortgagor, intending to thereby release the debt due to him on the mortgage, that is a transaction upon which the mortgagor can insist, and whether it is a binding release on the mortgagee. The case would be very different if the release had been made by deed, for the deed would import consideration, but here the release was only by parol, and there is no authority showing that such a release can be enforced. Then does the handing over of the deed make any difference? In the case of In re Richardson, Shillito v. Hobson, where a mortgagee wishing to make a present of his mortgage to a third person did so by parol, and handed over his mortgage deed, but made no actual transfer, it was decided that this was not a completed gift, that the fact that the deed had been handed over made no difference, and that the person who had received the deed was bound to hand it back. How can the handing over the deed in this case have any greater effect than there? It was handed over merely by way of confirmation of the parol release. Is it a binding transaction, so that thereby the estate which was assigned by the mortgage deed, and by which the assignee was made cestui que trust of George Berry's share of the property, was transferred to the person to whom the deed was handed? The case would be very different if there were a vestige of consideration, but, as I have already said, there was none. It was an uncompleted gift of the property which belonged to the donor, and which he was minded to hand to the donee, but did so ineffectually by this letter, and by the delivery of the deed. The case, too, would have been altered if there had been any declaration of trust, or any act by Charles Berrey amounting to declaring himself to be trustee of the mortgage debt. Then he could not have recalled it. This distinction is pointed out in the case of Harding v. Harding, where executors had sent a statement of account to a residuary legatee, which he forwarded to his daughter, with this direction thereon, "I hereby instruct the trustees in power to pay to my daughter the balance shown in the above statement," which amounted to a direction to the trustees to hold that of which they were trustees for him for his daughter. There is nothing like that in this case. The letter is no direction to the trustees, nor does the donor declare himself to be trustee of the debt for his brother. There is merely an incomplete voluntary gift of his interest in the property, which I must hold to be ineffectual. The gift, therefore, cannot be supported. In In re Richardson it was urged that the deed could not be recovered back, but it was decided that it could, and I must hold the same in this case. The share of George Berrey must be paid to Charles Berrey, but I will not give him any costs.

JUPP v. BUCKWELL. (a.)

Husband and wife—Unity of person—Gift to husband and wife and third person—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 1, 5.

The rule that, under a gift by will to a husband and wife and a third person, the husband and wife take only one moiety between them, the third person taking the other moiety, is not affected by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and is still applicable to a gift under a will made since that Act came into operation. The effect of the Act is that the husband and wife each take one-fourth, the wife's share being her separate property.

The reasoning of Chitty, J., in In re March, Mander v. Harris, 31 W. R. 885, 24 Ch. D. 222, disapproved.

Adjourned summons.

The testator by his will dated the 17th of November, 1887, directed that the residue of his estate (which consisted of the proceeds of sale of realty and personalty) should be divided into five equal shares, "one share between my sister, Mary Buckwell, Daniel Buckwell, her husband, and Harriet Buckwell, her step-daughter, in equal parts." He died on the 25th of November, 1887, and the summons was taken out by the executor of his will to have it determined in what proportions the above share should be divided between the three legatees.

The marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Buckwell took place before the date when the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, came into operation.

Haycraft, for the executor.—The share is divisible into equal thirds and not moieties, and Mr. and Mrs. Buckwell are each entitled to a third. I rely on the judgment of Chitty, J., in In re March, Mander v. Harris, 31 W. R. 885, 24 Ch. D. 222, 32 W. R. 941, 27 Ch. D. 166, in reversing which the Court of Appeal went solely on the ground that the will there was made before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, came into operation, leaving untouched the question on a will after that date. The old rule of construction was based on the artificial rule of law that husband and wife were one person: see Paine v. Wagner, 12 Sim. 184, and Dias v. De Livera, 5 App. Cas. 123, 28 W. R. Dig. 34. The effect of the Married Women's Property Act, ss. 1 (1) and 5, is to abolish this rule of law, consequently the reason for the rule of construction ceases.

He also referred to Warrington v. Warrington, 2 Ha. 54, and Marchant v. Cragg, 31 Beav. 398. [KAY, J., referred to Butler v. Butler, 14 Q. B. D. 83, 33 W. R. Dig. 96, and Reid v. Reid, 34 W. R. 332, 31 Ch. D. 402.]

Haldinstein, for Harriet Buckwell.—The Married Women's Property Act is intended to affect only the mode of holding property by husband and wife, not its acquisition. The status of the wife is not thereby altered, and she has not become a feme sole for all purposes, as decided by Chitty, J., in In re Duke of Somerset, 35 W. R. 273, 34 Ch. D. 465, and Wennhak v. Morgan, ante, p. 697, 20 Q. B. D. 635. The effect of the bequest clearly is to make the share divisible in moieties. The case of Paine v. Wagner is of no authority: Gordon v. Whieldon, 11 Beav. 170, and Atcheson v. Atcheson, Ib. 485.

Haycraft replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 14.—KAY, J.—By the will of Stephen Jupp, dated the 17th of November, 1887, he bequeathed a fifth share of the proceeds of real and personal property "between my sister Mary Buckwell, Daniel Buckwell, her husband, and Harriet Buckwell, her step-daughter, in equal parts."

Unless this gift is affected by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, Mr. and Mrs. Buckwell would take one half, and Harriet, the step-daughter, the other half: Bricker v. Whatley, 1 Vern. 233; In re Wylde, 1 W. R. 9, 2 De G. M. & G. 724. In the last-mentioned case, Paine v. Wagner, which was relied on before me, was considered as not a binding authority.

Mr. and Mrs. Buckwell were married before the passing of the Act. Upon the operation of the statute, an interest of a husband and wife, held by entirety, was determined by the Court of Appeal in In re March to be, that the husband would be entitled to one-half of the joint share in his own right, and the wife to the other half for her separate use.

But it is argued here that as the will was made after the passing of the Married Woman's Property Act, 1882, the rule of construction under which husband and wife take as one person one share between them has been altered, and that they now take, under this will, not one-half between them—Harriet Buckwell, the step-daughter, taking the other half—but that each of the three, the husband, wife, and her step-daughter, takes one-third.

Apart from authority that would be an extraordinary effect of an Act of Parliament, the main purpose and effect of which is to give a married woman certain gifts as between her and her husband, because the effect of so holding would be that both husband and wife, instead of getting one-fourth each, would get one-third each of this gift, and Harriet Buckwell, the step-daughter, instead of getting one-half, would only get one-third; that is, the husband would have an increased share, not only as between him and his wife, but against third persons. If it had been the intention of the framers of the Act to alter this rule of construction, I should expect to find that intention expressed. But the Act does not refer to it in any way, and, so far as appears on the face of it, this would be a consequential and undesigned effect of its provisions.

The argument is that this consequence results from section 1, which provides that "a married woman shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, be capable of acquiring, holding, and disposing by will or otherwise of any real or personal property as her separate property, in the same manner as if she were a feme sole, without the intervention of any trustee." And, by section 5, "every woman married before the commencement of this Act shall be entitled to have and to hold and to dispose of in manner aforesaid as her separate property all real and personal property, her title to which . . . shall accrue after the commencement of this Act." These provisions seem to be intended to give her at law a right to any property acquired after the commencement of the Act (which was the 1st of January, 1883) equivalent to the separate use, which was a creature of equity. For the creation of that separate use a trust was required, and as a trust never fails for want of a trustee, where no other trustee was appointed it was held that the husband should be considered as trustee for the wife. This new interest is to be without any trust—a legal interest.

The reason why, if the joint estate was made to a husband and wife and to a third person, the husband and wife only took half, is thus expressed by Littleton, section 291; "The cause is for that the husband and wife are but one person in law, and are in like case as if an estate be made to two joint tenants, where the one hath by force of the jointure the one moiety in law, and the other the other moiety." Coke, commenting upon this (187b), quotes from Bracton, "Vir et uxor sunt quasi unica persona quia caro una et sanguis unus." Does the Act mean to alter this? Section 12 shows that it does not for all purposes, because it expressly preserves the inability of the wife to sue the husband in tort in certain cases. I cite, with entire approval, the language of Wills, J., in Butler v. Butler, "I take the Act to mean exactly what it says—no more and no less. It is said that it destroys the doctrine of the common law, by which there was what has been called a unity of person between husband and wife. Again I answer, I do not see why. It confers in certain specified cases new powers upon the wife, and in others new powers upon the husband, and gives them in certain specified cases new remedies against one another. But I see no reason for supposing that the Act does anything more than it professes to do, or either abrogates or infringes upon any existing principles or rules of law in cases to which its provisions do not apply." That expresses perfectly my opinion as to the mode in which an Act of this kind should be construed. The capacity of a married woman to take property is not altered as between her and the grantor. That was always complete. Whatever property, real or personal, was devised, bequeathed, conveyed, or assigned to a married woman, as between her and the grantor, passed absolutely. The Act only enlarges her capacity to take such property "as her separate property." That is, as I read it as between her and the grantor, she takes the same as before, but as between her and her husband, what she takes is "her separate property." That is my construction of the statute, independently of authority.

In the case of In re March Chitty, J., expressed an opinion that the Act has altered the status of a married woman for this purpose. After reading section 1, sub-section 1, he says, "It appears to me that this section enlarges the capacity of a married woman. Her capacity formerly was that she could not take property which went to her husband. There were, no doubt, exceptions made in equity with regard to her right to a settlement; but here her status is changed and she is made capable of acquiring personal property in the same manner as if she were a feme sole." And, after referring to other sections of the Act, his lordship says: "It appears to me that the Act makes such alterations in the relation of husband and wife that it severs that unity of person, and divides that compound person which the law formerly recognized, to such an extent as to render it wrong for the court to apply the old principle, which was founded on unity of person."

I cite this passage for the purpose of explaining the grounds on which I respectfully differ from this judgment. In my opinion, as I have said, the capacity of a married woman to take property is only altered as between herself and her husband. The true view seems to me to be that the wife had an unlimited capacity before the Act to acquire property, but that, upon its acquisition, the marital right of the husband gave him certain interests in it which the Act has interfered with. This seems to me to be the extent to which her status, if that be the right word, is intended to be altered. But for collateral purposes—that is, for any purpose in respect of property—except altering her right to property as between herself and her husband, I do not find in the Act any intimation of an intention to change her legal position. If that had been the intention, I should have expected to find in the Act an express provision to the effect, for example, that in all questions relating to property, the husband and wife should be considered, not only as between themselves, but also as between themselves and third persons, two separate individuals, and that the old law of unity of person should be abolished. The decision in In re March was overruled by the Court of Appeal, not on this ground, but because the will in that case was made before the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. The learned judges expressly declined to give any opinion what would be the effect, in this respect, of a will made after the Act. But Cotton, L.J., said this, in which I concur. "In my opinion the Act was not intended to alter any rights, except those of the husband and wife inter se."

In this state of authority I think I am bound to decide this case according to my own opinion. I therefore hold that Mary Buckwell and her husband each take one-fourth, and Harriet Buckwell one-half, Mary Buckwell's share being her separate property according to the Act.

STEWART v. FLETCHER. (a.)

Practice—Married woman—Restraint on anticipation—Payment of dividends on fund into court—Power of attorney—Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 40—Form of order.

A married woman restrained from anticipation may appoint an attorney to receive the growing payments, but only on her behalf and for her use.

Form of order directing payment of dividends to a married woman entitled for her separate use.

A sum of Consols was ordered to be transferred into court, and the dividends paid to a married lady who was entitled for life for her separate use and restrained from anticipation, with liberty to apply on her death. There was no gift over or attempted alienation. The proposed order as drawn by the registrar contained the following direction: "Pay upon production of evidence that she has not anticipated the dividends as they accrue during the life of M. Stewart on annuities carried over until further order." In the column under heading Payees, "M. Stewart, wife of J. S. Stewart, for her separate use." The lady was going to reside in India, and it was proposed that she should appoint an attorney to receive the dividends on her behalf.

H. Fellows now mentioned the matter to the court on the minutes, and took the objection that the order should be simply for payment of the dividends as they accrued due to the married woman for her separate use.

CHITTY, J.—The question is as to the form of order which should be used in directing payment of dividends to a married women, when the trust is for payment to her separate use without power of anticipation, and there is no gift over. It is quite plain that it should appear on the face of the order that she is restrained from anticipation, because such orders often come into the hands of third persons, and it might be, that if the order did not disclose the restraint, such persons might treat the married woman as having a full power of disposition. It is equally clear that in questions of this class the married woman herself has no power whatever to anticipate, and that any acts of hers are wholly without operation, for the case is not that of forfeiture or attempted alienation. It appears that the registrar's practice is to draw the order in such a form as to show all this. It is also necessary to produce evidence to the Paymaster-General before he will make payment. Some of the registrars draw the order in such a form that this evidence may be produced by persons other than the married woman herself. Here the lady is about to go abroad to India, and it appears that it is not the practice of the Paymaster-General to draw cheques for India, and the result therefore is, as she cannot receive the dividends herself, that if she is not able to give a power of attorney appointing somebody to receive the dividends for her, she will have from time to time to appoint some attorney after the dividends have fallen due—that is to say, when the restraint has ceased. If she has to do this on every occasion much expense and delay must necessarily arise. I may say here that in my opinion, since the passing of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 40, there is no reason why any married woman may not execute a power of attorney although her separate property may be subject to a restraint on anticipation, but of course she could not, by executing any such power, get rid of the restraint on anticipation. The order I shall in future make in such cases as the present (when there is a simple restraint on anticipation, and no gift over) will be as follows:—The said A. B. being restrained from anticipating such dividends, they are not to be paid to any attorney except upon an affidavit or statutory declaration of such attorney that he receives them on behalf of and for the use of the said A. B., and not of any other person to whom she has assigned or puported to assign them. There must therefore be an affidavit, but it need not be made by the lady herself, but by her attorney. Inasmuch as an affidavit must be always required on each occasion of payment certifying to the fact that the lady is alive, little or no additional expense can be occasioned by requiring the additional evidence, which of course may be embodied in one and the same affidavit.

Trust—Dissenters' chapel trust deed—"Protestant Dissenters of the Presbyterian or Independent denomination"—Presbyterian Church of England—Dissenters' Chapels Act, 1845 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 45), s. 2.

A chapel was conveyed in 1766 to trustees upon trust to permit the premises to be used as "a meeting-house for Protestant Dissenters of the Presbyterian or Independent denomination to worship in."

A series of ministers had been appointed and officiated in the chapel since that date, some of them being Presbyterians, others Independents; but since the year 1800, Independent ministers alone had been pastors of the congregation, the defendant A., who was appointed in 1864, being an Independent. In 1879 and 1880, at meetings of the chapel congregation, a majority of the members decided to apply for the admission of the congregation to fellowship with the Presbyterian Church of England, a body formed in 1876 by the union of certain religious bodies in England holding Presbyterian tenets, and the congregation was eventually so admitted. By the constitution of this body, any congregation admitted to its fellowship lost the power of absolute control over its own affairs in certain particulars. The plaintiff was a member of the congregation at the time of the application to the English Presbyterian Church, and objected to joining that Church, and brought this action, claiming that, the chapel having been used for more than twenty-five years for worship in accordance with Independent principles and usage, it could not now, under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 45, be used for worship in accordance with the usages of the Presbyterian Church.

Held, that the Dissenters' Chapels Act was available only as a defence against attempted alteration after a period of twenty-five years, and not as a means to compel the continuance of any particular religious usages.

But held, also, that the constitution of the Presbyterian Church of England was such that it would be contrary to the trusts of the deed of the chapel for it to be transferred to that Church, the deed contemplating the control of the chapel affairs by no other body than the congregation meeting there, and that on that ground, therefore, the plaintiff's claim must succeed.

Trial of action.

Emma Miles, by an indenture dated the 15th of February, 1766, granted a messuage situate at Tooting Graveney to trustees "upon trust that they, the said Emma Miles, S. Bayes, J. Fullager, J. Bond, and T. Pewtress, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the heirs and assigns of such survivor, shall and do at all times hereafter permit and suffer the same premises to be used and enjoyed as and for a meeting-house or place for Protestant Dissenters of the Presbyterian or Independent denomination to worship in as the same are now used, without receiving any rent or recompense for the same so long as the present or any future laws of Great Britain do and shall tolerate Protestant Dissenters from the present Established Church of England to worship God in the same meeting-house, or so long as there shall be any persons who shall frequent or use the said place for the purpose aforesaid. But in case, according to the laws of England or of Great Britain, it shall at any time cease to be lawful for Protestant Dissenters to meet in the said meeting-house to worship God, and the same shall for that or any other reason be shut up or not preached in for the space of twelve months, then upon trust" for the sole use and benefit of the said Emma Miles, her heirs and assigns for ever.

Various endowments were from time to time conferred on the chapel by deeds, in which the congregation in question was referred to as a "congregation of Presbyterian or Independent Dissenters," "Protestant Dissenters," and other similar terms, none materially differing from the first one mentioned. The ministers appointed to officiate at the chapel by the congregation, no other persons at all interfering in the election, had been, some of them Independents, others Presbyterian, but for about eighty years previous to the matters complained of in this action had been Independents.

In 1864 the defendant William Anderson became pastor of the chapel, and at that time, and subsequently, professed himself an Independent. At a meeting of the members of the congregation, held on the 10th of December, 1879, a majority of those present decided to apply to the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of England for admission to fellowship. This was at first refused by the Synod of that Church, but a second application, made in consequence of another meeting held on the 11th of January, 1880, was successful, and the congregation was admitted into fellowship with that Church, and became subject to its system of church government.

The nature and origin of this Church appear from the argument and judgment.

The plaintiff, G. P. Haskins, was, at the date of these meetings, a member of the chapel congregation, and objected to the applications for admission to the Presbyterian Church of England, and on the 15th of January, 1880, issued the writ in this action, claiming to have the trusts of the indenture of February 15, 1766, or such of them as could be then ascertained, and were valid and subsisting, carried into effect, under the direction of this court; a declaration that, according to the true construction of the deed, and in the events which had happened, or otherwise, pursuant to the provisions of the Act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 45, the meeting-house at Tooting Graveney was for the exclusive use of persons, members of the denomination, known as Independent or Congregationalist, to be used by such persons for the public worship of God according to the principles and usages of the Independent denomination; and an injunction restraining W. Anderson, or any person acting under his authority, or claiming as a minister of the Presbyterian Church of England, from using the meeting-house for public worship and from holding any meetings or celebrating public worship in accordance with the usages of the Presbyterian Church of England in the meeting-house and hereditaments.

(a.) Reported by J. W. Gerig, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It appeared from the Book of Order of the Presbyterian Church of England that the sanction of a presbytery is necessary to the appointment of a minister to any particular congregation, and that the appointment does not depend solely on the choice of the congregation.

By 7 & 8 Vict. c. 45, s. 2 (the Dissenters' Chapels Act), it is enacted "that so far as no particular religious doctrines or opinions, or mode of regulating worship, are on the face of the will, deed, or other instrument declaring the trusts of any meeting-house for the worship of God, dissenting, as aforesaid, either in express terms or by reference to some book or other document as containing such doctrines or opinions or mode of regulating worship, be required to be taught or observed or be forbidden to be taught or observed therein, the usage for twenty-five years immediately preceding any suit relating to such meeting-house of the congregation frequenting the same shall be conclusive evidence that such religious doctrines or opinions or mode of worship as have for such period been taught or observed in such meeting-house may properly be taught or observed in such meeting-house, and that the right of the congregation to hold such meeting-house and property shall not be called in question on account of the doctrines or opinions or mode of worship so taught or observed in such meeting-house."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Aspland, Q.C., and Lemon, for the plaintiff.—The real question to be decided is whether the English Presbyterian Church can claim to be the successor or representative of the Presbyterian denomination of the last century, referred to in the deed of trust. It is conceded by the defendants that for the last eighty years this chapel has been an Independent one—that is to say, that the congregation meeting in the chapel had complete control over all its affairs, including the appointment of a pastor. The character of the constitution of the Presbyterian Church of England, which was formed in 1876 by a union between various churches in England connected with the Established Church of Scotland and branches of the United Presbyterians and Free Churches of Scotland, is that each congregation, while retaining a certain amount of individual control over its own affairs, is subject also to presbyteries and synods. Previous to admission to the English Presbyterian Church, this chapel congregation was a self-governing body, it will now be subject to church courts, it will not be able to choose its own minister, as the presbytery practically does it. Even if the majority of the congregation may have decided to go over to the Presbyterian Church of England, they cannot carry over the property of the chapel: Attorney-General v. Pearson, 3 Mer. 352, see pp. 397 and 401. Again, the Independents have now acquired a statutory right under the Dissenters' Chapel Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 45, s. 2) to retain the chapel as a place for worship in accordance with Independent usages, such usages having been observed for twenty-five years there. There are "no particular religious doctrines or opinions, or mode of regulating worship" on the face of the deeds relating to this church required to be taught or observed, so as to take the case out of the Act. The name "Presbyterian" not amounting to a description of any particular doctrine: Attorney-General v. Hutton, 4 Drury 480; Attorney-General v. Bunce, L. R. 6 Eq. 563, 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 41. [KEKEWICH, J.—Presbyterianism is not the name of a doctrine, but of a mode of church government.] The decisions show that it does not even indicate a mode of church government. Even putting aside the statute, Scotch Presbyterians were not objects of the trust. Presbyterianism, in the sense understood by the defendants, did not exist at the date of the deed in question, or, in fact, at all during the last century: Attorney-General v. Shore, 11 Sim. 592. We propose to put in oral evidence of what was the meaning of the word "Presbyterian" as used in the last century. [Gainsford Bruce, Q.C., for the defendants, objected to reception of oral evidence, on the ground that the documents themselves alone could be looked to: Attorney-General v. Shore, 9 Cl. & Fin. 555, see p. 568. KEKEWICH, J., upheld this objection.] Presbyterians and Independents are really two sections of one body, which repudiated any confession of faith and control of individual congregations by any body external to the congregation. In 1691 a "Happy Union" was effected between the Presbyterians, so called, and the Congregationalists. The whole terms of this document are inconsistent with Presbyterianism, as understood by the defendants. The plaintiff was a member of this congregation at the time of the institution of this action, and the fact that he may have since that time ceased to be a member is irrelevant: Milligan v. Mitchell, 3 Myl. & Cr. 72, p. 84. [KEKEWICH, J.—A right to a seat would give a member such a right of property as would enable him to sue for administration of the trusts of the deed.]

Gainsford Bruce, Q.C., and Pownall, for the defendant Anderson.—The language of the deed shows that two separate denominations are meant; the words are, "For Protestant Dissenters of the Presbyterian or Independent Denomination." History shows that attempts were made, which failed, to bring the three denominations of Independents, Presbyterians, and Baptists into union, and they have continued to exist as separate bodies down to the present time: Attorney-General v. Clapham, 3 W. R. 158, 4 De G. M. & G. 591; Shore v. Wilson, 9 Cl. & Fin. 355; Attorney-General v. Wilson, 16 Simons, 210. The Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 45 only applies where "doctrine, opinion, or mode of worship" are in question, and hence is not applicable here, and, even if it were, can only be used as a shield to persons in possession, and not as a weapon of attack. User in a certain way for twenty-five years may justify a breach of trust, but the continuance of that user after that period is not made compulsory by the statute. The trust here is an alternative one, and a majority of the congregation could decide which mode of government was to prevail. The reason why there are few (if any) traces of a Presbyterian system in the last century is that the Dissenters, though tolerated, were virtually socially ostracized and persecuted, and, had they attempted to form any distinct system of church government, would have brought down on themselves the anger of the dominant church; hence they confined themselves to consolidating their position as citizens.

Levett, for trustees in whom the legal estate in the chapel was vested, submitted to act as the court should direct.

Sillem, for the representatives of a deceased trustee, took the same course.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—Even if the transfer to the English Presbyterian Church of the chapel and its endowments could have been validly made it was not properly carried out, as no proper meeting was ever convened. This action is virtually one to restrain a majority from depriving a minority of their share of the common property. The congregation have committed what may be termed an act of suicide, having lost their right of absolute control over their own affairs. The chapel has become absorbed in a body which could veto its retransfer for the purpose of congregational worship. Unanimity is necessary for the transfer of trust property of this description.

KEKEWICH, J.—The first question which arises is as to the construction of the trust of the deed of February 15, 1766. To construe it reference may be made to the circumstances of the time and to other deeds as illustrations. I think it clear that the trust is an alternative one for either of two denominations, and that it is a trust that would exclude Baptists, who, together with the Presbyterians and Independents, formed the mass of Protestant Dissenters. The second question which arises is whether, the chapel having been used for some eighty or one hundred years as an Independent chapel, the Dissenters' Chapels Act applies so as to prevent Presbyterians from exercising their worship there. I do not think the Act does apply in favour of the plaintiffs. The section is in these terms:—[His lordship read the section set out above.]

There is, however, no declaration in this deed, or by reference, as to the doctrine to be taught or preached; and Attorney-General v. Bunce is in favour of that proposition. The section does not make it necessary to continue the teaching of certain doctrines if they have been preached there, the Act is a shield against attack, not a weapon of attack. But, again, there has been no change in the doctrine taught or in the mode of public worship. The point whether the word "Presbyterian" connotes any particular doctrine is said to have been considered in the case of Attorney-General v. Bunce, but I think the case throws no light on it, and it is not necessary for me to decide it. There remains then the question whether this church has been properly attached to the Presbyterian Church in England. [After examining the evidence, his lordship arrived at the conclusion that the transfer had not been properly carried out.] If the Attorney-General were not a party to this action I might have avoided the other points, but now I must deal with them. I think it is almost involved in this deed that this church could not be attached to the Presbyterian Church of England. The law is clear that in matters of this kind a mere majority cannot prevail: Attorney-General v. Pearson, 3 Mer. 352. The conversion of the property of this church cannot be made without the consent of all the members of the congregation.

I do not propose to trace the history of Presbyterianism. That the Presbyterians, as a body, were strong and distinct originally, there is no doubt; but towards the middle of the eighteenth century Presbyterianism, as a separate form of dissent, disappeared; a few congregations lived on, becoming, in course of time, Socinians, Unitarians, some even joining the Established Church. Lately they have reappeared as a separate body, but their rules now are inconsistent with those that bound this congregation, and with those of the Presbyterians of the eighteenth century.

That being so, what was attempted here was contrary to the trust, and cannot be effected, and I shall therefore decide in the plaintiff's favour.

There will be a declaration that it was not competent to the meetings of the congregation held in December and January, 1879 and 1880, by their resolutions to subject the property to the control of the Presbyterian Church of England, and that the same ought to be enjoyed by the Protestant Dissenters of Protestant or Independent congregations worshipping therein, as if no such resolutions had been passed.

GRAY v. HOPPER. (a.)

Practice—County court—Power to remit action—Reduction of claim below £50 by judgment under order 14—County Court Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108), s. 26.

Where a claim indorsed on a writ originally exceeds £50, and after the issue of the writ is reduced below that sum by payment in obedience to a judgment under order 14 for a portion of the claim, the district registrar has jurisdiction under section 26 of the County Court Act, 1856, to order the action to be remitted to the county court.

Appeal from an order of Denman, J., in chambers, confirming the order of the district registrar of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

The action was originally brought to recover £66 11s. 3d., money alleged to have been received by the defendant as agent for the plaintiff. After the issue of the writ an application was made under order 14, and judgment given for £28 11s. 3d., the defendant having leave to defend as to the residue, which was thus reduced below £50. Execution was issued, and the £28 11s. 3d. paid. The district registrar thereupon ordered the action to be remitted to the county court at Newcastle-on-Tyne, pursuant to section 26 of the County Courts Act, 1856.

Tindal Atkinson, for the appellant.—The district registrar had no jurisdiction to remit the action to the county court. The payment reducing the amount below £50 must be a payment before action brought: Osborne v. Homburg, 24 W. R. 161, 1 Ex. D. 48: Foster v. Usherwood, 26 W. R. 91, 3 Ex. D. 1. These are decisions on section 7 of the County Court Act, 1867,* where precisely similar words are used, and it was held that as the words "payment and set-off" apply to payment and set-off before action brought, the words "or otherwise" must likewise apply to something before action.

Newson, for the respondent, was not called on.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This is clearly a case which can be remitted to the county court. It is an action of contract brought in the superior court. The claim originally exceeded £50, but since the issue of the writ has been reduced below £50 by a judgment under order 14. Under these circumstances I think the case comes clearly within the words of section 26 of the County Court Act of 1856, which gives jurisdiction "where in any action

* The County Court Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), s. 7, gives jurisdiction to remit to the county court, on application of the defendant within eight days from the day on which the writ shall have been served upon him, in any action of contract where "the claim indorsed on the writ does not exceed £50, or where such claim, although it originally exceeded £50, is reduced by payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise, to a sum not exceeding £50."

of contract brought in a superior court the claim indorsed on the writ, . . . though it originally exceeded £50, is reduced by payment into court, payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise, to a sum not exceeding £50," to remit the same to the county court. It is contended that similar words are used in section 7 of the County Court Act, 1867, and the decisions in Osborne v. Homburg and Foster v. Usherwood on the wording of that, section are relied on. There, however, the words "payment into court" are omitted, and the main object of the section was to limit to eight days from the issue of the writ the time in which the defendant might avail himself of his right to apply to have the action remitted. Thus the decisions are on a later Act, on different words, and for a different object, and it is noticeable that in Foster v. Usherwood all the Lords Justices drew attention to the distinction between the words of the two sections. It appears to me that the words "into court" in section 26 of the former Act contemplate the case of reduction of the claim subsequent to the commencement of the action.

This appeal, therefore, must be dismissed.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. The words "or otherwise" mean in a similar manner; that is, in a similar manner, amongst other things, to payment into court, and this clearly includes a reduction of the claim after action brought by judgment for a portion thereof under order 14.

Appeal dismissed.

HEWITSON v. FABRE. (a.)

Practice—Service of writ—Foreigner residing out of jurisdiction—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 11, r. 6; ord. 70, rr. 1, 2.

Service of a copy of a writ was made by leave, under a mistaken belief as to the state of facts, upon F., a foreigner residing out of British jurisdiction. F. took no steps to have the service set aside or to enter an appearance, and judgment was signed against him four months after the service of the writ.

Held, that a notice of the writ, and not any service of the writ, was compulsory upon a non-British subject not in British dominions, under ord. 11, r. 6; and that such a wrongful service was not an irregularity which could be dealt with under ord. 70, r. 1, nor was the defendant estopped, under ord. 70, r. 2, from taking steps to set aside the proceedings.

Appeal from the refusal of the master to set aside a judgment referred to the Divisional Court by Denman, J., sitting at chambers.

The defendant, a Frenchman recently stopping in England, but subsequently resident at Bordeaux, had been served at Bordeaux with a copy of a writ in a chancery action, under an order of Kekewich, J., giving leave for service out of the jurisdiction. He entered no appearance to the action, and judgment was signed. At that time the plaintiffs were not aware that defendant was not a British subject, but they now admitted this to be a fact. The defendant applied to the master to set aside the judgment on the ground that notice of the writ should have been given him under ord. 11, r. 6, and he now appealed against the refusal of the master to set aside the judgment.

Lynch, for the defendant.—There is no power to serve a writ on a foreigner resident out of British jurisdiction: Padley v. Camphausen, 27 W. R. 217, 10 Ch. D. 550; Field v. Bennett, 56 L. J. Q. B. 89, 35 W. R. Dig. 160.

H. D. Green, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.—The defendant took no steps to prevent judgment being signed against him between the 4th of December, 1887, when he was served with the copy of the writ, and the 14th of April, 1888, when judgment was signed. He ought to have applied under ord. 12, r. 30, to set aside the service. The service in lieu of notice has been a mere irregularity curable under ord. 70, r. 1, and the defendant has, under ord. 70, r. 2, lost his right to complain by his delay.

FIELD, J.—This is an appeal by the defendant to set aside a judgment signed against him. That judgment is said to have been warranted by a preceding service of a copy of the writ on the defendant when residing at Bordeaux, in France. The defendant denies that he is a British subject, and alleges that, he being a subject of the French Republic, such a service was not warranted by the law of England; that a notice only of the writ was warranted, but not a service of the writ. It is a matter of some importance. The object of the rule (ord. 11, r. 6) was to qualify the procedure under the old rule. The order was to provide primarily for the service of writs upon persons residing in Scotland or Ireland. It was found to be so intolerable to have writs running in those countries under different, and what may be termed foreign, jurisdictions. Greater sensitiveness is aroused in the case of any sort of interference in other foreign countries, such as was evidenced in the case of a member of the bar attempting to take a commission in the German Empire. That was considered a trespass on a foreign jurisdiction. It was for such reasons that an alteration was made. A special distinction was thereby made between serving a copy of a writ and serving a notice; and the notice was pointedly drawn in the present form to mark the distinction. Form No. 5, App. A., Pt. I., specifically points out that "when the defendant to be served is not a British subject, and is not in British dominions, notice of the writ, and not the writ itself, is to be served upon him." And the form of notice is given under No. 10. It is no doubt competent for a non-British subject to complain of a service on him of a British process when he is resident in his own country, and we ought to set aside the original order against him. Kekewich, J., was misled, however honestly on the part of the plaintiffs, because he thought the defendant was a British subject. It turned out that he was not. If that fact had been discovered before Kekewich, J., he must have held that there could not be a service of a copy of the writ, but only a notice of the writ being issued, which is not service. If the defendant had been a party to the order made in the hearing before the judge, no doubt he would be bound by it. But he comes forward now for the first time. The order was brought about by a misrepresentation of fact, however innocently made. I do not see why, because he did not come forward before, judgment should be issued against him. No letter was written to him or notice given, but an agent in Paris was instructed to take proceedings in the French courts. I do not know how much the defendant knew of all this.

At any rate, the judgment was clearly not warrantable in the chancery action under the new rule, and if the registrar signed such judgment, that was merely a ministerial act, and would make no difference if the judgment was originally unwarranted. Judgment on such a service must be set aside, and the order must, therefore, also be set aside for such substituted service. It is important that applicants ex parte should understand the responsibility entailed upon them. It constantly happens that statements made ex parte are subsequently not found to be warranted in fact.

The plaintiffs ought to have inquired specifically what was the exact nationality and position of the defendant, and more care should be taken in drawing up affidavits on ex parte applications.

WILLS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The jurisdiction as to the service and substituted service of writ or notice of writ must be exercised strictly according to the rules laid down. Ord. 11, r. 6, is perfectly clear and explicit. A foreigner living in a foreign country cannot be subject to service of a writ running in this country. But he can be dealt with in that foreign country by a notice, without being served by our process. If any step was taken against the defendant which did not put it in his power to set up the real state of facts as to his nationality and residence abroad, all proceedings thereupon would be wrong, ab initio. If he had appeared and voluntarily submitted himself to British jurisdiction it may be that he would be estopped from appealing to us now to set aside a judgment obtained after such submission. But nothing has been done here to alter his original position as a non-British subject resident abroad. Under such circumstances he may come to us at any time to set aside a judgment obtained on a wrongful service, on the ground that he ought never to have been brought before our courts at all. The order and judgment must be set aside.

Order and judgment set aside.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Pollock, B., and Hawkins, J.) } Nov. 28; April 25.

REG. v. ARCHBISHOP OF YORK. (a.)

Ecclesiastical law—Convocation—Authority of archbishop as president—Jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice—Election of proctors.

The President of Convocation having exercised his discretion on questions connected with the internal affairs thereof (as in the case of a disputed election of proctors to represent an archdeaconry at Convocation), the High Court of Justice has no jurisdiction to inquire into or interfere with such decision.

Rule nisi calling upon the Archbishop of York, as President of the Convocation of York, to show cause why a mandamus should not issue directing him to admit into Convocation the Rev. Canon Tristram as a proctor duly elected to represent the clergy of the Archdeaconry of Durham in the Lower House.

The facts were as follows:—On the 6th of July, 1886, the Archbishop of York, as Metropolitan of the province of York, issued, in accordance with the Queen's writ received by him, a mandate to the Bishop of Durham for the election of proctors for Convocation. Two proctors were to be elected to represent each archdeaconry. The result of a poll held for the purpose of electing two proctors to represent the Archdeaconry of Durham was —Canon Grey, 86; Canon Tristram, 66; the Rev. J. Bailey, 57. A special return having been made by the archdeacon of all three names, the Archbishop determined against Canon Tristram, who was second on the poll, on the ground that, although he was then a canon residentiary of Durham Cathedral, which is situated within the Archdeaconry of Durham, he was not beneficed within the archdeaconry.

The only question argued was whether the court had jurisdiction to interfere with the decision of the Archbishop.

The Archbishop of York in person, showed cause. —It is a well-established rule of law that this court will not interfere with matters ecclesiastical nor with the decisions of an ecclesiastical tribunal: Appleford's case, 1 Mod. Rep. 88. Under the jurisdiction conferred upon me as President of Convocation by the Queen's writ I have power to decide questions arising as to whether certain persons are duly elected as "proctors" for Convocation. In order to know whether my decision is right the court must take notice of matters which have never yet been deemed to be within its judicial cognizance. If this court had jurisdiction in such matters I should be liable to repeated mandamuses.

Tristram, Q.C., and Jeune, in support of the rule.—The elections to Convocation take place under the Queen's writ, which has not, in this case, been properly executed. If the Queen's writ has not been properly executed the court will set it right. The Archbishop may decide disputed elections, but with an appeal to this court. The power of decision must depend upon custom, and the custom must be decided by the court. There is no authority to show that Convocation has jurisdiction to decide disputed elections. The position of the Archbishop is similar to that of an archdeacon in an election to a vestry. Although the archdeacon's return that a particular person was duly elected would be good, the return could be traversed and the question would be triable in this court. The same principle applies to an election to Convocation. The reason why no precedents exist for such an appeal as this is, that for 120 years Convocation was suspended. The right of voting for proctors in Convocation is a legal franchise capable of being established by a court of law: Randolph v. Milman, 17 W. R. 262, L. R. 4 C.P. 107. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—That case turned on the construction of a statute, and was, by mutual consent, submitted to the court by special case.] If that is so there is no decision upon the point, but it is submitted that, upon principle, a person elected, as in this case, to a public office, is entitled, in the event of such election being disputed, to have the question judicially decided.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 25.—Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., read the following written judgment of the court:—In this case the Archbishop of York was called upon to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to him commanding him to order that the name of Henry Baker Tristram, clerk in holy orders, and one of the canons of the Cathedral Church of Durham, be called as one of the proctors for the Archdeaconry of Durham and otherwise to admit him to act as such proctor in the Convocation of the province of York. The facts out of which this application has arisen are few, simple, and undisputed, but they give rise to a variety of historical and legal questions, not, perhaps, altogether easy of solution, if it were necessary to solve them. In the Northern Convocation the parochial clergy are, and have been for centuries, represented by two proctors from each archdeaconry within the province of York; in addition to these there are, as in the province of Canterbury, the deans of each cathedral, the archdeacons, and a representative of each cathedral chapter. The Archbishop is, as in the Southern Province, the president of the Convocation. In the month of July, 1886, a fresh Convocation was summoned, and in the Archdeaconry of Durham the election of the two proctors to be returned as representatives for the parochial clergy of that archdeaconry was a contested one. The third, fourth, fifth, and sixth paragraphs of the affidavit of Canon Tristram are not contradicted as to these facts by anything in the affidavits filed by the Archbishop, and I read them so far as they narrate the facts out of which this application has arisen. [His lordship here read the paragraphs of the affidavit referred to.] Whether the decision of the Archbishop was correct in point of law is a matter on which we offer no opinion, an expression which must not be taken as suggesting anything in any way unfavourable to it, but simply that, as we have not had the matter argued, we think it better to be silent. Before any argument on his Grace's decision the question must be decided whether we have any jurisdiction to inquire into it; whether this court is a court of appeal from the Archbishop, and can correct any errors of his committed in his conduct of the affairs of his Convocation, supposing that he has in fact committed any errors. This, it must be observed, is not a case in which the Archbishop has declined to act. If it were, different considerations might arise, and our judgment might be, though we do not say it would be, different. It is a case in which he has acted and has decided, and the application, though in form of a mandamus, is in truth and substance an application to us to annul his act and reverse his decision. Have we any such jurisdiction as the application assumes? It is conceded that our jurisdiction is invoked for the first time during the many centuries of the existence of the Convocations, and in face of the fact that contested elections must have and have in fact occurred, in which the defeated parties might have had recourse to our jurisdiction to correct the decisions of the Primates, if such jurisdiction had in fact or in law existed. Nor is this surprising, if the history and constitutional position of these bodies is recollected. Our supposed jurisdiction, it must be remembered, rests on no statute; if it exists at all, it exists at common law, and existed, therefore, in days when Convocations were as important as Parliaments, as independent, perhaps as powerful. This writ, if the argument be correct, might have been directed to Chichele or Sudbury, to Scrope or Wolsey, as well as to Archbishops Benson or Thomson.

What was the exact origin of Convocation, at what point of time it was divided into two bodies, whether it be the synod of the nation, whether it be, as the 139th canon decrees, "the true Church of England by representation"—these are questions antiquarian rather than practical, and need not detain us now. Probably in some shape it is older than Parliament; certainly in the time of Edward I. and Edward II. there were attempts made, partially and temporarily successful, to incorporate it into Parliament. The clergy are still summoned in the writs addressed at the beginning of each Parliament to the archbishops and bishops of England—and it was the same in Ireland before the disestablishment—though this has long ceased to be anything more than an obsolete form. The old writ remains as a piece of historical evidence; but the separation of Convocation and Parliament has been complete since the days of Richard II., if not of Edward III. In Convocation the clergy not only passed canons with the king's consent, but taxed themselves, which, like many a right once earnestly contended for as a privilege, became in lapse of years a burden, and was finally relinquished about 1665 in consequence of a verbal and wholly informal agreement between Archbishop Sheldon and Lord Clarendon, who was at the time Lord Chancellor. (See Speaker Onslow's note in the Oxford edition of Burnet's Own Times, vol. 1, p. 302.) Convocation, as appears from the collection of precedents in the Codex of Gibson—which for this purpose is of good authority—was summoned not directly by the king's writ, but by the writ of the archbishop and bishops, the archbishop being set in motion by the king, and, as Dr. Burn tells us, for the most part varying in his summons from the king's writ both as to the time and place of meeting. In this Convocation, he continues, "the archbishop sat as king; his suffragans sat in the Upper House as his peers; the deans, archdeacons, and proctor for the chapter represented the burghers, and the two proctors for the clergy the knights of the shire. And so this body, instead of being one of the estates, as the king (Edward I.) designed, became an ecclesiastical Parliament to make laws and to tax the possessions of the clergy." (Burn, ed. 1842, vol. 2, pp. 22, 23.) To the members of Convocation were accorded, by the 8 Hen. 6, c. 1, "for the security and quiet of the prelates and clergy for ever hereafter, such liberty or defence in coming, tarrying, and returning as the great men and commonalty of the realm called or to be called to the king's Parliament do enjoy and were wont to enjoy, or in time to come ought to enjoy." All this and much more as to the powers and privileges of Convocation may be collected from the precedents in Gibson above mentioned, and is set out shortly and clearly in Godolphin's Abridgment, pp. 586 et seq. Its antiquity appears from him whom Godolphin calls "Mr. Bede," and the passage in Lord Coke's Fourth Institute devoted to Convocation shows the respect which he, no favourer of ecclesiastical pretensions, thought due to Convocation while it kept within the limits prescribed to it by the ancient English Constitution. Blackstone, book 1, c. 7, is to the same effect.

The whole history of the junction of Convocation with Parliament and its subsequent separation is to be found in Fuller's Church History, book 5, and in Collier's Ecclesiastical History (4th and 5th volumes of the London edition of 1841). In the case of Bird v. Smith, Moore, 781, it was held by Lord Ellesmere, who was assisted by the two Lord Chief Justices Popham and Coke and the Lord Chief Baron Fleming, that canons passed by Convocation on ecclesiastical matters, with the assent of the king, bind the whole realm. One of the reasons given in the report from this judgment is that the Convocations originally were and in law continued to be part of the Parliament of England. The point, indeed, as to the binding effect of canons must be considered as overruled by Lord Hardwicke in the famous case of Middleton v. Croft, 2 Str. 1056, 2 Atk. 659, a case repeatedly acknowledged as law, and especially by the Court of Common Pleas in Marshall v. Bishop of Exeter, 7 C. B. (N. S.) 653, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 73. But the historical reasons remain true as history, and, indeed, cannot be denied. Further, it was seriously debated in the time of Charles I. (1640) whether by a dissolution of Parliament Convocation was also dissolved. In fact, fortified by the opinion of the Lord Keeper Ford and Littleton, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, that Convocation continued to sit after Parliament was dissolved and passed several canons. It would not be wise to rely on the authority of a precedent created by Charles I. and under the Primacy of Laud; but the very contention is a proof both of the ancient rights and the absolute independence of Convocation, and the notion of the King's Bench of that day interfering by mandamus to command the Archbishop to admit a particular proctor to sit and vote in Convocation was one which assuredly no judge of that time would have even for a moment entertained. Indeed, the celebrated judgment of Lord Hardwicke in Middleton v. Croft—which V. Williams, J., in Marshall v. Bishop of Exeter described as "a prodigy of industry and learning"—is founded upon the broad distinction which exists between the power of Convocation and its privileges when acting within its own jurisdiction and upon its own subjects and the power of the same body when it attempts to bind the laity and to impose anything, even ecclesiastical in its nature, on the nation without the authority of Parliament. What we are asked to do is to interfere in the internal affairs of an ancient body as old as Parliament and as independent, to control the action of its president, and to revise or reverse his decision on a matter relating to the constitution of the body itself. For 700 or 800 years, it is contended, no precedent for such an interference can be found. Such an interference would not only be without a shadow of precedent, but would be inconsistent with the character and constitution of the body with which we are asked to interfere. Accordingly we discharge the rule, and with costs.

Rule discharged.

BETTS v. ARMISTEAD. (a.)

Adulteration—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 6—Defence to prosecution—Want of knowledge.

Absence of knowledge in the defendant that the article sold was adulterated is no defence to a prosecution under 38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, s. 6.

This was a case stated for the opinion of the court by the justices of the borough of Nottingham.

The respondent was prosecuted by the inspector of nuisances, under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, for selling bread which was found to contain a quantity of alum. During the proceedings before the magistrate the respondent did not require the public analyst to be called, but contended that, as he did not know that alum was in the bread, he was entitled to be acquitted. On the authority of Core v. James, 20 W. R. 201, L. R. 7 Q. B. 135, a case decided under the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 37, s. 8, the magistrates refused to convict. The inspector appealed.

Stanger, for the appellant.—The only question in this case is whether the knowledge of the seller is material or not. In the first place the words of section 6 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, show that knowledge is not material, for they are not qualified in any way. Secondly, if we look at sections 3 and 4 we see that the offences are stated in the same unqualified way, but section 5 expressly provides that absence of knowledge is to be a defence in those two cases. Therefore on the principle expressio unius exclusio alterius, it is clear that the Legislature did not intend that absence of knowledge should be a defence under this section. There are several sub-sections which contain grounds of defence, but no suggestion that want of knowledge is one of them. Section 25 only applies to cases in which a thing is resold in the same condition in which it was originally bought.

No counsel appeared for the respondent.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that in this case the justices came to a wrong conclusion. Section 6 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, enacts that no person shall sell any article of food which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser, under a penalty not exceeding £20. In this case it was proved that the respondent had sold bread containing alum, and consequently came within section 6. The magistrates thought that the word "knowingly" should be read into that section; I am of opinion, however, that we ought not to read that word in, unless that was the intention of the Legislature, and from the other sections it is plain that this word was purposely excluded. This appears from section 5, which provides that no one shall be convicted under sections 3 and 4 if he proves that he was ignorant of the adulteration. So that where the Legislature desired to limit the offence and make ignorance a ground of defence the Legislature has expressed that intention in most distinct terms. Its presence, therefore, in sections 3 and 4, and absence in section 6, shows that the Legislature clearly intended that the word "knowingly" should not be inserted. It is said that the magistrates followed a decision on another statute, but no decision on any other statute can have any effect on the construction of this one.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The offences under sections 3 and 4 are misdemeanours, and, therefore, the statute enacted that want of knowledge was a defence, but this does not apply to section 6, which only inflicts a fine.

FIELD v. FIELD AND DENTON. (a.)

Divorce — Husband's petition — Separate estate—Costs against wife—Notice of application—Practice.

In an action for dissolution of marriage by a husband, costs may be given against the wife where she has separate estate, but she must have notice of the application.

Hearing before Hannen, P., without a jury, of an undefended action by the husband for dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent.

The parties were married in 1864, and had had four, of whom nine children were surviving.

The court, on proof of the adultery, pronounced a decree nisi, with costs, against the co-respondent.

Searle, for the petitioner, asks also for costs against the respondent, who had not appeared, on the ground that she had separate estate, and the husband gave evidence to the effect that she had a separate income of about £300 per annum.

HANNEN, P., directed that notice of this application should be given to the wife, and adjourned the case.

Notice of the application was accordingly served.

Dec. 15.—Moyses appeared for the respondent, and read an affidavit sworn by her in which she disputed the statements made by the petitioner as to the amount of her income.

HANNEN, P., made an order condemning her in costs subject to a reference to the registrar to inquire as to her means if she required it.

LEAROYD v. WHITELEY. (a.)

Trustee—Investment—Real security—Trade premises—Brickfield—Interest.

Trustees, who were authorized to invest upon real securities, proposed to invest the trust funds on the security of a freehold brickfield. Valuers reported that "the land, premises, and freehold fixtures form a good security" for the money to be invested. The trustees, without further inquiry, advanced the money, and the security failed to realize the amount advanced.

Held, that the trustees had not acted with ordinary prudence, and were personally liable to make good the money, with interest at four per cent. from the last payment; and that the tenant for life was not bound to return the excess of interest which had been paid because the security was hazardous.

Decision of the Court of Appeal affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Cotton, Lindley, and Lopes, L.JJ.), affirming a decision of Bacon, V.C., reported 34 W. R. 450, 32 Ch. D. 196, and 33 Ch. D. 347.

The appellants, as trustees under the will of Benjamin Whiteley, had power to invest "in or upon real securities in England or Wales."

In January, 1878, they invested £3,000 of the fund upon the security of a five per cent. mortgage of a freehold brickfield containing about ten acres, with the buildings, machinery, &c., affixed to the soil, where business was being carried on. The report of the valuers described the premises, and, after observing that allowance should be made for the working out of the brickfield, concluded, "but, having carefully considered this, we think the land, premises, and freehold fixtures form a good security for £3,500."

Interest was duly paid till August, 1884, when the business ceased. In January, 1884, the property was offered for sale by auction, but was bought in at £3,300.

The respondents brought this action against the appellants to make good the loss sustained, and Bacon, V.C., held the trustees liable to pay the £3,000, with interest at four per cent. This decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Baker replied.

August 1.—Lord HALSBURY, C.—In this case trust funds have been lost by an investment on insufficient security. Some doubt has been expressed as to whether Bacon, V.C., did not intend to decide that the security upon which the money was invested was not a real security at all, and therefore not within the powers of the trustees. In my opinion he did not intend so to decide. What he said was—and I think it is accurate—that although the ten acres of land upon which this money was invested were in a certain sense real security, because it was land, the substantial value upon which the money was advanced was a brick-making concern. The trade has ceased to exist, and the substantial part of the security, which represented £3,500 or £3,000—for I do not think it is material to consider the question of £500—has ceased to exist. No one, either at the bar or in either of the courts in which this matter has been litigated, has doubted that the trustees intended to do what was right, and certainly no imputation can be made against them that they were actuated by any other motive than that of procuring the highest amount of interest that they could for their cestuis que trust. But the goodness of their motives cannot justify the propriety of the investment. A trustee must use ordinary care and caution, and although it is impossible to lay down an absolute rule—and indeed it cannot be contended that the ordinary practice of courts of equity has the force of law—yet there are some limits beyond which it is manifest that no trustee is authorized in going. It is, of course, true that it is not because the money has been lost that the trustees are necessarily liable. But as the money has been lost by the insufficiency of the security it is necessary to see what precautions were taken by the trustees in conducting the business of the trust. I think it is quite clear that a trustee is entitled to rely upon skilled persons in matters in which he cannot be expected to be experienced. He may, perhaps, rely upon a lawyer in some matters of law, and in this case I do not deny that he would be entitled to rely upon a valuer upon a pure question of valuation. But unless one examines with reference to what question the skilled person gives advice it is possible to confuse the reliance which may properly be placed upon the skill of a skilled person with the judgment which the trustee himself is bound to form on the subject of the performance of his trust. I do not think it is true to say that one is entitled to consider the special qualities or degree of intelligence of the particular trustees. Persons who accept that office must be supposed to accept it with the responsibility at all events for the possession of ordinary care and prudence. In applying the principle that I have indicated to this particular case it is obvious to remark that the trustees not only relied upon the skilled persons for the possession by those persons of skill in their own business, but appear to have adopted without sufficient care what those skilled persons said. As to the propriety or impropriety of the investment looked at not merely as a question of the due performance of the trust, is it true to say that the trustees have been misled by an erroneous statement as to what was the value of the land? I think not. I should think they might well be able to defend themselves from responsibility on the ground that they had selected a reasonably careful person, and acted upon the skilled advice that they had received upon such a question; but that is what they did not do. Assuming in their favour that they sufficiently understood and analyzed the valuers' report—though I doubt whether that assumption is accurate—they acted on advice not that these ten acres of land were, as land, a sufficient security for the sum they invested, but as to whether they, the trustees, were justified in investing upon the security of a speculative trading adventure. The forming a judgment on such a question was the duty of the trustees themselves, a duty which they could not delegate to others. I only wish to add that I am unable to follow or adopt some observations of the Court of Appeal which seem to point to a different degree of care in regard to the conduct of the business of a trust according to whether there are persons to take in the future, or whether the trust fund is created for one beneficiary absolutely. The question must be the due care of the capital sum. Whether that capital sum is one in which there is a life estate only or absolutely for the use of the beneficiary seems to me to bear no relation to the question of the due caution which a trustee is bound to exercise in respect of the investment of the trust fund. I agree with Cotton, L.J., that the tenant for life during the time the money was invested received the income she was entitled to receive, and that the trustees were right in paying her the interest, as it was in truth and in fact the interest received from the trust fund whereof she was tenant for life. But it seems quite an untenable proposition to contend that she is therefore bound to bring into account the interest that she has received upon the investment because that investment has turned out to be an insecure one, and the trustees are called upon to make good the deficiency that has arisen. I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right, and I move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Watson.—I also am of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal must be affirmed. As a general rule, the law requires of a trustee no higher degree of intelligence in the execution of his office than a man of ordinary prudence would exercise in the management of his own private affairs. Yet he is not allowed the same discretion, in investing the moneys of the trust, as if he were a person sui juris dealing with his own estate. Business men of ordinary prudence may, and frequently do, select investments which are more or less of a speculative character; but it is the duty of a trustee to confine himself to the class of investments which are permitted by the trust, and likewise to avoid all investments of that class which are attended with hazard. So long as he acts in the honest observance of these limitations the general rule already stated will apply. The courts of equity in England have indicated and given effect to certain general principles for the guidance of trustees in lending money upon the security of real estate. Thus it has been laid down that, in the case of ordinary agricultural land, the margin ought not to be less than one-third of its value; whereas in cases where the subject of the security derives its value from buildings erected upon the land, or its use for trade purposes, the margin ought not to be less than one-half. I do not think these have been laid down as hard-and-fast limits up to which trustees would be invariably safe, and beyond which they could never be in safety to lend, but as indicating the lowest margins which, in ordinary circumstances, a careful investor of trust funds ought to accept. It is manifest that, in cases where the subjects of the security are exclusively or mainly used for the purposes of trade no prudent investor could be in a position to judge of the amount of margin necessary to make a loan for a term of years reasonably secure until he had ascertained, not only their present market price, but their intrinsic value, apart from those trading considerations which gave them a speculative, and, it might be, a temporary value.

Upon the general law applicable to this case I have only to observe further that, while trustees cannot delegate the execution of the trust, they may, as was held by this House in Speight v. Gaunt, avail themselves of the services of others, wherever such employment is according to the usual course of business. If they employ a person of competent skill to value a real security, they may, so long as they act in good faith, safely rely upon the correctness of his valuation. But the ordinary course of business does not justify the employment of a valuator for any other purpose than obtaining the data necessary in order to enable the trustees to judge of the sufficiency of the security offered. They are not in safety to rely upon his bare assurance that the security was sufficient, in the absence of information which would enable them to form, and without forming, an opinion for themselves. At all events, if they chose to place reliance upon his opinion without the means of testing its soundness they could not, should the security prove defective, escape from personal liability, unless they proved that the security was such as would have been accepted by a trustee of ordinary prudence, fully informed of its character, and having in view the principles to which I have already adverted. By the terms of Benjamin Whiteley's will his trustees were authorized to invest trust moneys upon real securities in England and Wales. It is not disputed that in lending £3,500 upon the security of the brickfield the appellants acted in good faith. Of that sum £3,000 only belonged to Whiteley's trust, a circumstance which does not alter the character of the security, because it has not been shown that the trust money was made a charge in priority to the balance of £500. The course which was followed by the appellants in entering into the transaction of January, 1878, is very compendiously stated by Mr. Learoyd, in whose evidence, so far as it related to matters within his personal knowledge, Mr. Carter generally concurred, and from that it plainly appears that the appellants had no information regarding the subjects mortgaged, except what was contained in the report of their valuators. In my opinion the report was not such a document as a lender of ordinary prudence would have ventured to act upon. It disclosed the fact that there were only ten acres of land, and that a not inconsiderable portion of the subjects consisted of buildings and fixed machinery used for brickmaking. But it did not state either the cumulo value of the subjects or the separate values of the land, the buildings, and the machinery. It did, no doubt, contain the statement that the valuators thought the land, premises, and freehold fixtures would afford good security for £3,500; but trustees who chose to act upon such an opinion must take the risk of the security proving insufficient. In these circumstances, I think it has been established that, at the time of taking the security, the appellants altogether failed to exercise that ordinary amount of care which the law required of them. Notwithstanding such failure, they would still have had a good answer to the respondents' claim had they been able to show that, if they had made full inquiries and had obtained all necessary particulars from their valuators, they would have been justified, as men of ordinary prudence, in accepting the security. Unfortunately, the evidence led by the appellants themselves appears to negative any inference of that kind. Their witness and valuator, Mr. Uttley, states that in 1877 he valued the subjects as a going brick work at £7,200, of which £2,000 was for the land, and the remaining £5,200 for buildings and machinery. He did not, in 1877, form any estimate of their value upon a sale by the mortgagees, and not as a going concern. Being asked, on cross-examination, what difference that would have made in his estimate, he said: "I should say 10 per cent. would represent the difference not as a going concern. Everything was in order." The answer is by no means satisfactory. It assumes that the works would be kept in the same good order; and it leaves out of account the possibility of depression in the brickmaking trade, a factor which I do not think a prudent valuer would omit from his calculations. But taking his estimate as he gave it, a deduction of 10 per cent. leaves a margin of £520 below the minimum amount which ought to be allowed in order to cover the possible depreciation of subjects affected, to the extent of five-sevenths of their value, by the fluctuations of trade. Upon the question of interest, I agree with the reasoning of Cotton, L.J. I do not think the tenant for life can now be required to repay or give credit for any part of the sums paid to her before August, 1884, as the actual income of the trust estate.

Lord Fitzgerald.—I concur that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed. There was no controversy in the court below or at your lordships' bar as to the rule which, in such a case as the present, governs the duties and liabilities of trustees; and I am satisfied to accept in substance the exposition of Cotton, L.J., though it may be open to some verbal criticism. The rest of the case relates to the proper view of the facts, and I am compelled to take the same view as my noble and learned friends—namely, that the trustees did not exercise ordinary care in investing the money intrusted to them. They invested the trust fund on a very insufficient security, and without due or proper inquiry. It may well be described as a loan on a security the sufficiency of which depended on the prosperity of a hazardous manufacture carried on by the mortgagors on the mortgaged premises. I concur in affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal with that regret which a judge feels in every case where his decision fixes liability on trustees who have acted honestly but erroneously, and to some extent negligently, in not requiring more full and precise information than they received from the valuators they employed. In my opinion the trustees, in selecting and adopting the security in question, did not exercise the care or foresight which a man of ordinary prudence ought to exercise, and would probably exercise, in making such an investment. I am not disposed, however, to say that the fact that the investment was one for the benefit of the tenant for life, and after her decease then for her children, is to be left entirely out of consideration. It was not to be a temporary investment, but one to last for many years if not called in or paid off. Lopes, L.J., thus accurately describes the security which the trustees accepted: "Its value mainly depends on the success of a speculative and fluctuating business, a business for which it is difficult to find customers" (i.e., purchasers), "a business largely dependent on the energy and solvency of those working it, a business of necessity of precarious duration, and one which cannot be carried on without such an excavation and destruction of the soil as must eventually leave what remains nearly useless for agricultural and other purposes"; and, I may add, a security of a peculiarly hazardous character, and one in reference to which it has been properly observed that the value of the buildings and fixed machinery depended entirely on the mortgagees being able to find a purchaser for it as a going concern for the manufacture of bricks. Upon the minor point in the case, I also concur with my noble and learned friends.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Court of Appeal.

From Stannaries Court. Feb. 3.

In re Wheal Buller Consols (Limited).
Ex parte Jobling. (a.) Company — Winding up — Contributory — Director — Qualification of director.

A person by becoming a director of a company and acting as such does not, ipso facto, agree with the company to take the requisite qualification shares.

A. was duly elected as a director of a company, and for some time acted in that capacity, but he never applied for or agreed to take the qualification shares prescribed by the articles of association of the company.

Held, that A. was not liable to be placed on the list of contributories on the winding up of the company.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries, placing Mr. Jobling on the list of contributories of the Wheal Buller Consols in respect of 250 shares of £1 each, being the number which constituted the qualification of a director under the articles of association of that company.

The company was incorporated with limited liability under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1880, on the 6th of February, 1883, for mining purposes, its primary object being to take over the business of the Basset and Buller Consols (Limited).

Mr. Jobling was one of the subscribers of the memorandum of association in respect of ten shares, and he also signed the articles of association.

The articles of association provided that the number of directors should not be less than three or more than seven; that the qualification of a director should be the holding of preference shares or stock of the company of the nominal value of £250 at the least, and that any director might act before acquiring his qualification shares or stock; and that a director should vacate his office if he ceased to hold his qualification shares or did not acquire the same within three months after his election or appointment.

By the articles of association five directors were nominated, of whom Mr. Jobling was not one, and their first meeting was held on the 23rd of February, 1883. At the second meeting, which was held on the 10th of May, 1883, Mr. Jobling was elected a director in the place of one Colonel Johnstone, who had retired. Mr. Jobling subsequently attended several meetings of directors, two of which took place more than three months after his election, and a circular was printed and circulated to a small extent bearing his name as a director; but he never applied for nor had allotted to him more than his original ten shares.

The company did not prosper, and on the 19th of January, 1884, a winding-up petition was presented in the Stannaries Court, upon which an order was made, but it was not drawn up until August, 1885.

An official liquidator having been appointed, he applied to have Mr. Jobling's name placed on the list of contributories in respect of the 250 shares required to be held by a director. Mr. Jobling denied his liability except in respect of the ten shares for which he had signed the memorandum of association, but the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries held him liable in respect of the whole 250 shares.

From this decision Mr. Jobling appealed as far as related to 240 shares.

lant. The mere acceptance of the office of director is no contract to take shares: Brett's case, 32 W. R. 234, 25 Ch. D. 283, 295; Brown's case, 22 W. R. 171, L. R. 9 Ch. 102; In re Pandora Theatre Co., 28 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 238; Onslow's case, 31 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 46. A contract with the company to take shares must be shown, and the articles only constituting a contract between the shareholders inter se, a contract with the company cannot be made out of them: Browne v. La Trinidad, ante, p. 289, 37 Ch. D. 1. What was the contract, if any, entered into by Mr. Jobling? Not a contract to qualify himself: Coventry and Dixon's case, 28 W. R. 775, 14 Ch. D. 660. A person, in order to be a member, must, under the Companies Act, 1862, s. 23, have taken or agreed to take shares—i.e., agreed with the company to take them. But nothing in the articles constitutes an agreement with the company: Pritchard's case, 21 W. R. 829, L. R. 8 Ch. 956; Carling's case, 24 W. R. 165, 1 Ch. D. 115; Chapman's case, L. R. 2 Eq. 567, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 36. Even if the articles do constitute an agreement with the company, it is an agreement to conform to the articles, not an agreement to qualify. The articles provide, not that a director shall take shares, but only that he shall vacate his office if he does not. If he does not he may incur liability by acting without authority, but that is all. The observations upon which the Vice-Warden relied in Karuth's case, L. R. 20 Eq. 506, 511, 24 W. R. Dig. 55, and Miller's case, 3 Ch. D. 661, 665, 25 W. R. Dig. 54, were only dicta, which have not been established by any decision.

Buckley, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the respondent.—Where it is provided by the articles that a director shall possess a certain share qualification, and a person accepts the office and acts after the time when the qualification should be acquired, he has contracted to take that number of shares. By section 16 of the Companies Act, 1862, all members are bound by the articles, and Jobling was a member. The articles imposed upon any person becoming a director a duty to take shares; and Jobling, by acting as director, in substance contracted to take the shares from someone. The question whether the shares must be taken from the company does not affect the present case. [COTTON, L.J.—There are cases containing dicta by judges suggesting grounds on which a director who has not taken shares may be put on the list for the amount of qualification; but can you refer to any case in which it has been done?] It has been done in four cases under special Acts, and which it is difficult to distinguish from the present case: Kincaid's case, 19 W. R. 122, L. R. 11 Eq. 192; Forbes' case, 23 W. R. 402, L. R. 19 Eq. 353; Purcell's case, 29 W. R. 170; Portal v. Emmens, 25 W. R. 235, 1 C. P. D. 664. [COTTON, L.J.—It seems to me that Onslow's case is decisive of the present case.] In that case the company, while a going concern, had repudiated the contract, and it was impossible for the liquidator to obtain specific performance of it. [They referred also to Mackley's case, 24 W. R. 92, 1 Ch. D. 247.] By acting after the expiration of the time, Jobling may be taken to have been re-elected. [LINDLEY, L.J.—If so, it would only be for three months under the articles.]

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal by Mr. Jobling from a decision of the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries placing him on the list of contributories in respect of shares which he never agreed with the company to take, unless he is to be held to have done so by signing the memorandum of association and accepting the office of director, and continuing to act as such after the time at which, according to the articles, he vacated his office if he did not hold the specified number of shares.

I am of opinion that the decision of the Vice-Warden is erroneous. To make a person liable to contribute to the assets of the company he must, under section 38 of the Companies Act, 1862, be a member—i.e., according to section 23 he must have agreed to take shares. It is not necessary that he should be actually on the register, his agreement to take shares is enough, but the agreement must be with the company.

If A. agrees with B. to take shares from him, whatever may be the right of B. against A. to be indemnified, the company has nothing to do with A., and he cannot be placed on the list of contributories unless the shares have been actually transferred to him.

Now, is there any agreement between Mr. Jobling and the company to take 250 shares? By the articles it is provided that the qualification of a director shall be the holding of preference shares of the nominal value of £250 at least, that a director may act before acquiring his qualification, and that he shall vacate his office if he does not acquire the qualification within three months after his election. Mr. Jobling was not an original director. He subscribed the memorandum of association for ten shares, and in respect of them he admits that he is a contributory. He was afterward elected a director, but he never applied for any shares besides his original ten shares. It is said that the articles contain a contract by him with the company that he will take the necessary shares for his qualification, but in my opinion they do not. Section 16 of the Act provides that the articles when registered "shall bind the company and the members thereof to the same extent as if each member had subscribed his name and affixed his seal thereto and there were in such articles contained a covenant on the part of himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, to conform to all the regulations contained in such articles subject to the provisions of this Act." It is conceded that the regulations are only to bind the company and the members of the company inter se. It may be that the appellant has bound himself to his fellow-members to this extent: "If I become a director it is my duty to qualify myself by taking shares." But during three months he is at liberty to act without any qualification, and I think it would be wrong to say that his continuing to act after that period amounts to a contract to take the shares requisite for a qualification. There are cases where a director has been held not liable for the shares requisite to qualify him; there have in some cases been observations to the effect that acceptance of the office and acting as director may make a person liable as if he had taken a qualification, but no judge has ever acted upon that view.

Some cases have been referred to relating to shares in companies formed by special Acts of Parliament. In my opinion they cannot govern the present case. If Parliament thinks fit to say that persons shall be members, it can do so, and members they must be; but they become so by force of the Act of Parliament, not by agreement. Here the question is whether the appellant agreed to take shares; and I think it would be wrong to say that the acceptance of the office of director and acting in it constituted such an agreement. A director may estop himself from disputing his being a shareholder, as where a director without his knowledge was entered on the register for the qualification shares, and was held to be fixed with them because he, being a director, must be presumed to have known of the entry; but, having regard to the nature of the entries in this case, I think that principle cannot be applied here.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case arises under articles of a peculiar description. I will clear the ground by saying that the evidence falls very far short of what is required to estop the appellant from denying that he is a holder of 250 shares. He, therefore, can only be put on the list in respect of them on the ground that he agreed to take them. Is it made out that he did so agree? In my opinion it is not. The appellant was authorized by the articles to act as director for three months without qualification. At the end of those three months the sheriff was in possession of the mine under an execution against the former proprietors, and there was no prospect of the company being carried on. I cannot, under these circumstances, draw from the mere fact of his continuing to act as a director the inference that he agreed to take the shares requisite for his qualification. I am one of those who think that the law is not on a satisfactory footing on this subject, and that it would be just for a person who acts as director to be held liable for the shares without which he had no right to act; but that does not enable us to infer an agreement to take them.

BOWEN, L.J.—I agree that there is no estoppel, and that, if the appellant is to be on the list, it must be by virtue of an agreement, within the meaning of section 23, to become a member—that is to say, an agreement to that effect with the company. Where is such an agreement to be found? The appellant signed the memorandum of association, and therefore, by virtue of section 16, he became bound to the same extent as if he had signed and sealed the articles, and they had contained a covenant by him to conform to the regulations contained in them. But has he entered into any contract to take shares because he has bound himself to conform to the regulations contained in the articles, including, of course, those as to the qualification of directors? There is no provision in the articles that the directors shall take the shares required for a qualification or be liable as if they had taken them. There is only a provision that if a director does not acquire the requisite number of shares within three months he shall cease to be a director. That regulation makes it his duty not to act after the three months; but that is quite different from a regulation that if he continues to act he shall be deemed to have contracted to take them. That seems to me to dispose of the case. I do not say that the present case is governed by Onslow's case, for that case is not sufficiently reported to be relied on, and I was struck by the observation of Mr. Buckley upon it; but I think we ought to affirm the principle which Mr. Grosvenor Woods cited it to establish.

Bankruptcy—Petition for liquidation—Composition—Subsequent adjudication of bankruptcy — Relation back of title of trustee—Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), s. 126.

Where the creditors of a debtor have resolved to accept composition under section 126 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and the debtor is subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt under the last clause of that section, there is no relation back of the trustee's title to the act of bankruptcy committed by the debtor in filing his petition, so as to validate a payment made by him between the filing of his petition and the adjudication of bankruptcy.

APPEAL from a decision of Mr. Registrar Hazlitt.

ON the 15th of August, 1879, the debtor presented a petition for liquidation under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and, after repeated adjournments, the creditors, upon the 22nd of October, 1883, resolved to accept a composition, under section 126, of 20s. in the pound, payable in four instalments of 5s. each, the first instalment to become due on the 13th of July, 1884. On the 12th of July, 1884, the debtor by deed assigned to McDermott, who had notice of the composition proceedings, the proceeds of four policies of insurance effected by the debtor on his own life, and which were surrendered by him in 1883, upon trust to pay certain persons named in the deed, and to hold the balance towards payment of a debt due to McDermott from the debtor. The proceeds of the policies, which were received by McDermott on the 28th of August, 1884, amounted to £5,765, and the balance, after the payments specified in the deed, amounted to £2,251. This sum of £2,251 was, at the request and under the direction of the debtor, paid by McDermott to certain persons. None of the instalments of the composition were paid, and on the 26th of March, 1886, the debtor was adjudicated bankrupt under the power contained in section 126 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869.

The trustee in bankruptcy applied for an order directing McDermott to pay over to him this sum of £2,251, on the ground that the title of the trustee related back to the act of bankruptcy committed by the debtor in 1879 in filing a petition for liquidation.

The registrar made the order.

McDermott appealed.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and Cooper Willis, Q.C. (F. C. Willis and F. A. Broxholme with them), for the appellant.—After the resolution for a composition the debtor was left with full dominion over his property and full power to dispose of it. When the debtor was adjudged a bankrupt under the last clause of section 126 the adjudication was not made upon any act of bankruptcy, but because the composition could not be carried out. Therefore neither section 6 nor section 11 applies, and there is no relation back. Sections 6 and 11 apply to petitions for adjudication founded on an act of bankruptcy. There is no petition for adjudication under section 126.

Sir H. James, Q.C., and Winslow, Q.C. (Sidney Woolf with them), for the trustee.—An adjudication cannot take place without an act of bankruptcy. An adjudication under section 126 is founded upon an act of bankruptcy—namely, the filing of the petition for liquidation with a declaration that the petitioner is unable to pay his debts. That act of bankruptcy, which was suspended during the composition arrangement, revived upon the order for adjudication. The limit of time prescribed in section 6 does not apply to an adjudication under section 126.

* The COURT, after hearing the above arguments, adjourned the case for the purpose of enabling counsel for the trustee to consider whether they would contend that the deed of the 12th of July, 1884, was void as against creditors under 13 Eliz. c. 5, or under section 91 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. The court were subsequently informed that counsel declined to argue these points.

April 30.—Lord Esher, M.R.—We have been informed that the trustee in seeking to avoid this deed does not rely upon the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5, nor upon section 91 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. We have, therefore, to determine the point of law argued before us.

It appeared that on the 15th of August, 1879, the debtor filed a liquidation petition, and on the 22nd of October, 1883, the creditors resolved to accept a composition under section 126 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, payable by instalments, the first of which became due on the 13th of July, 1884. On the 12th of July, 1884, the debtor, by deed, transferred certain moneys to McDermott, and certain payments were made under that deed, and the balance was dealt with under the direction of the debtor. On the 26th of March, 1886, the debtor was adjudicated bankrupt, and a trustee was appointed.

The trustee now contends that his title relates back to the act of bankruptcy committed by the debtor in 1879 in filing his petition for liquidation. If this were an ordinary bankruptcy it cannot be doubted that there would be no such relation back, as the act of bankruptcy committed in 1879 would be too old. Under section 6 the act of bankruptcy upon which the adjudication is founded must have occurred within six months before the presentation of the petition for adjudication; and under section 11 the bankruptcy relates back to the act of bankruptcy upon which the adjudication was made, or to the first act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt within twelve months preceding the order of adjudication. In my opinion the true view is that an adjudication in bankruptcy under section 126 is not made upon an act of bankruptcy at all. That section commences by enacting that the creditors of a debtor may, without any proceedings in bankruptcy, resolve that a composition shall be accepted in satisfaction of the debts due to them from the debtor. The creditors therefore agree to accept a composition in satisfaction of their debts. It leaves the debtor free to deal with his property just as if there had been no composition. The creditors were dealing with a debtor who, to their knowledge, had committed an act of bankruptcy by filing his petition, and, according to the decision in Kearley and Clayton's Contract, 26 W. R. 324, 7 Ch. D. 615, the object and effect of the resolution for a composition is to leave the debtor with complete dominion over his property and full power to dispose of it. Therefore, until steps are taken under the last clause of section 126 to adjudge the debtor a bankrupt, anyone has a right to deal with the debtor in perfect safety, otherwise the debtor might be prevented from paying the composition which the creditors had agreed to accept. When the court is asked to adjudge the debtor a bankrupt under the last clause of section 126 its duty is not to inquire whether there has been an act of bankruptcy. The filing of the petition is the foundation of all the subsequent proceedings; the debtor may have committed fifty acts of bankruptcy to the knowledge of the creditors, and yet they have refused to make him a bankrupt and have accepted a composition. The act of bankruptcy is swept away by the resolution for a composition, and the court has not to inquire whether an act of bankruptcy has been committed or not. The court has to inquire whether "the composition cannot, in consequence of legal difficulties, or for any sufficient cause, proceed without injustice or undue delay to the creditors or to the debtor," and, if so, it may adjudge the debtor a bankrupt. Therefore, the adjudication is to be made, not in consequence of an act of bankruptcy, but in consequence of something else. The petition for liquidation gives the court jurisdiction; it is a causa sine quâ non. But the court makes the adjudication without consideration of any act of bankruptcy, the adjudication differing therein from an ordinary bankruptcy. Therefore, this transaction cannot be impeached upon the ground contended for, that the trustee's title related back, as it was a transaction between the debtor and another person in respect to property with which the debtor had a perfect right to deal. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The registrar ordered McDermott to pay to the trustee £2,251 which the debtor, in August, 1884, handed over to McDermott. We are now asked to hold as a matter of law that the adjudication of bankruptcy in March, 1886, relates back to the filing of the petition in 1879. That, to my mind, is a very startling proposition, for the Act of 1869, by section 11, limits the relation back to a period of twelve months preceding the order of adjudication.

The question for our consideration is whether there was here any act of bankruptcy upon which the adjudication was founded. To say that the debtor was adjudicated bankrupt in 1886 upon the act of bankruptcy committed by him in filing his petition in 1879 is contrary to the fact. That act of bankruptcy might have been made the ground for adjudicating him bankrupt at the time under section 6. But it was not. The ground of the adjudication in 1886 was the difficulty in carrying out the composition. The adjudication was not in truth founded upon any act of bankruptcy at all. There was therefore no section which caused the bankruptcy to relate back. A little reflection will show that the other view must be wrong. The theory of a composition is that the debtor remains master of all his property so that he may be enabled to pay the composition. The composition scheme would be unworkable if there was any relation back in the event of bankruptcy superseding the composition. That being so, the protection clauses, sections 94 and 95, are not wanted and have no application in a bankruptcy of this sort. The above view has been adopted by the courts for some time past: Ex parte Charlton; In re Kearley and Clayton's Contract; and Sharp v. McHenry. In liquidation proceedings under section 125 there are words which introduce the doctrine of relation back, and properly so for this reason, that the property of the debtor is taken away from him and vested in a trustee. The order of the registrar must, therefore, be discharged.

Butler v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. (a.)

Railway company—Passenger—Production of ticket—Right to eject from carriage.

Where a passenger over the line of a railway company who has taken and paid for his ticket, but has lost it, declines to pay the fare over again, the company have no power to eject him from the railway carriage, but can only take his name and address and sue him for the fare.

Appeal from the decision of Manisty, J.

The plaintiff, on the 27th of November, 1887, took an excursion return third-class ticket from Sheffield to Manchester on the defendants' line, for which he paid the special reduced fare of 2s. 6d. He gave up the outward half of the ticket at Manchester, but when, on the return journey, his ticket was demanded at Wadsley Bridge Station, where the tickets for Sheffield are collected, it was discovered that he had lost it. He gave his name and address to the ticket collector and offered to pay the whole excursion fare of 2s. 6d., but the collector demanded 3s. 5d., the ordinary third-class single fare from Manchester to Sheffield. The plaintiff declined to pay this, and was thereupon ejected from the carriage by the defendants' servants, and was detained at the station until he paid the 3s. 5d. This action was then brought for assault and false imprisonment. The defence raised was that the plaintiff was unlawfully upon the premises of the defendants, and that they were therefore entitled to eject him from them. The jury found that if the plaintiff had been rightly ejected no more force than was necessary had been used, but if the defendants had no right to eject him they assessed the damages at £25. Manisty, J., gave judgment for the defendants, holding that they had acted within their rights. The plaintiff appealed.

Waddy, Q.C., and Lawson Walton, for the appellant. —There is no bye-law of the company authorizing them to eject a passenger for not producing his ticket. Their remedy was by action for the fare.

Lockwood, Q.C., and Cyril Dodd, for the respondents. —The ticket is either the only evidence of the contract between the railway company and the passenger, and must be produced when demanded, or it is a licence to travel over the company's premises which is revocable: Wood v. Leadbitter, 13 M. & W. 838. At any rate, it is part of the plaintiff's contract that he should show and deliver the ticket when requested to do so, and in not doing so he committed a breach which made him a trespasser: Shelton v. Lake Shore Railway Co., 29 Ohio State Reports, 216.

They also referred to Saunders v. South-Eastern Railway Co., 5 Q. B. D. 456, 28 W. R. Dig. 186; Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), ss. 103, 104, 109.

Waddy, Q.C., was not called upon to reply.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case a passenger on the line of a railway company had paid for his ticket and had lost it. At a certain stage of his journey he is asked for it, and cannot produce it. He is told that he must pay a certain fare—it signifies not what. He refuses to do so, and the company thereupon assume the power to put him out of the carriage. This action is then brought for the assault. The company set up for their defence that he was unlawfully upon their premises and in their carriage, and that they, using no more force than was necessary, exercised their right to put him out. Now is this true? The jury have found that if the passenger was rightfully ejected no more force than was necessary was used; but had the company the right to eject him? What were the relations which existed between the plaintiff and the defendants? In my opinion they were purely contractual.

It was urged that the contract was, in fact, one by which the passenger had a right, in the nature of an easement, to go over the land of the company; that it was, in fact, a licence which they had a right to revoke. I think that contention is absurd. To say that every passenger has an easement over the line of the company is ridiculous, more especially as some companies contract to carry passengers over the lines of other companies over which they could not create easements. The case of Wood v. Leadbitter was cited in support of that view. I think that case has nothing to do with this point. It was a case which no one would be willing in these days to see carried any further.

There was a contract between the plaintiff and the defendants that, in consideration of a fare paid beforehand, the company would carry the plaintiff, taking all reasonable care of him, to his destination. The contract may, no doubt, by reason of the notice upon the ticket, be subject to certain conditions and regulations. Those are the conditions and regulations which the company is authorized to impose by section 109 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, and they are set out in the time table. The only regulation bearing upon this point runs thus:—"Every passenger shall show and deliver up his ticket (whether a contract or season ticket or otherwise) to any duly authorized servant of the company whenever required to do so for any purpose. Any passenger travelling without a ticket or failing or refusing to show or deliver up his ticket as aforesaid shall be required to pay the fare from the station whence the train originally started to the end of his journey." I shall not say now whether that regulation is, in my opinion, reasonable or not. The case of Saunders v. South-Eastern Railway Co. seems almost to decide that it is unreasonable, but I think it unnecessary to say anything about that now. By this regulation the only consequence of a passenger not producing his ticket is that he will have to pay the fare. If he breaks this contract he must be sued; but there is nothing about any power to eject a passenger who does not show his ticket. There is no law that enables the company to do so, unless there is any agreement between the passenger and the company to such an effect. I think, therefore, that the company have no defence to this action. I cannot agree with the decision of Manisty, J. I can see no implied contract that the plaintiff would allow the defendants to eject him if he did not produce his ticket. Therefore I think that the company were wrong, and that the plaintiff must succeed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case is one of great importance both to railway companies and to passengers. I do not express any opinion as to whether a bye-law could be framed which would not be ultra vires and would yet cover the action of the company. There is no bye-law or regulation in existence which authorizes them to turn out of a carriage a passenger who does not produce his ticket. The plaintiff had taken his ticket and paid his fare for both journeys. The effect is that the railway company contracted with him to carry him to his destination and back. There is no authority to support the contention that a contract of carriage is an interest in land within the meaning of the Statute of Frauds. That is a very different thing, and I think it is absurd to say that it was really a revocable licence. It was a contract of carriage, and neither more nor less. Even supposing that the contract involved the production of the ticket when demanded, and that the regulation was part of the contract, then, when the plaintiff broke that part, had the company any right to eject him? I think not. Their proper remedy was by action for his fare. To say that he was no longer lawfully upon their premises does not at all follow from breach of the contract. I agree in thinking that the case of Wood v. Leadbitter has no application here. No one would extend the doctrine there laid down to contracts of carriage. If the plaintiff had broken the contract the only remedy of the defendants was to sue him, and they had no right to act as they did. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—I think it is an extraordinary thing that there are no authorities on a point of such importance. The case is, to my mind, a very clear one. There is no bye-law and no regulation which can be relied upon by the company in justification of their conduct. For my own part I doubt very much whether any could be framed which would not be ultra vires, but that is unnecessary to decide now. The plaintiff had properly taken his ticket and paid his fare, and had accidentally lost the ticket. The effect of that state of facts is that he was lawfully upon the premises and in the carriage of the defendants. In itself that is sufficient to show that the defendants were not justified in what they did. I cannot understand what is the implied contract which the plaintiff is said to have broken. Did he impliedly contract to allow the defendants to lay hands on him if he did not show his ticket? There is no evidence of any such contract. If his conduct only amounted to a mere breach of the contract of carriage the remedy of the company was by action and not by ejecting him. They might take his name and address and sue him if they thought fit to do so. It is worthy of observation that if they had done this the defendant would have had a good answer to the action, since he could have shown that he had paid his fare and taken the ticket. Wood v. Leadbitter and the principles there laid down have, in my opinion, nothing to do with this case, and the questions as to revocable licences do not arise. I think Manisty, J., was wrong, and that judgment must be entered for the plaintiff for £25.

Judgment accordingly.

DAVYS v. RICHARDSON. (a.)

Practice — Payment of money into court — Tender — Denial of liability—Order on solicitor for repayment —Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 22, rr. 5 (c), 6 (c).

In an action for wrongful dismissal, claiming a year's salary in lieu of notice, the defendant denied liability for more than a month's salary, or, alternatively, for more than three months' salary, which amount he tendered before action and paid into court, "with defence setting up tender."

Immediately after the delivery of this defence and before trial, the whole amount so paid in, was paid out to the plaintiff's solicitor under ord. 22, r. 5 (c). At the trial the plaintiff obtained a verdict for one month's salary. On an application by the defendant for an order for the repayment of the difference, the Divisional Court ordered the solicitor to the plaintiff to repay the amount to the defendant. The plaintiff being dead, the solicitor filed an affidavit stating that he had paid the whole amount over to his client after deducting costs.

Held, that the order of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 552, 575n, 20 Q. B. D. 722) was wrong, and that, whatever might be the remedy of the defendant against the personal representatives of the plaintiff, there could be no order against the solicitor, who had been guilty of no misconduct.

A plea of tender cannot be set up in an action for unliquidated damages.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.), reported ante, p. 552, 575n, 20 Q. B. D. 772.

The action was brought for wrongful dismissal, and claimed a year's salary.

The defence set up (inter alia) that "by the agreement the plaintiff was only entitled to one month's notice at the time when he received the same." "Alternatively the plaintiff was not entitled to more than three months' notice or salary in lieu thereof." "Further, as to the whole statement of claim, the defendant made tender before action of £163 which the plaintiff refused, and the defendant has paid the said amount of £163 into court, and says it is enough to satisfy the plaintiff's claim." The sum of £163 included, as appeared from the particulars, the sum of £62 10s., "three months' salary in lieu of notice."

The request for lodgment in court contained a statement that the money was "paid in with defence setting up tender," and the sum paid in was receipted on the pleadings by the Bank of England, Law Courts Branch, as being "paid in with defence setting up tender." At the trial Day, J., held that the plaintiff was only entitled to one month's notice or salary in lieu thereof, and gave judgment accordingly.

On applying for payment out of court of the difference between one month's salary and the sum paid into court in respect of three months' salary, the defendant ascertained that before the trial the whole amount had been paid out of court to the plaintiff's solicitor upon the plaintiff's written authority. A summons was taken out for the repayment of the money, but a master and Pollock, B., at chambers refused to make any order. The Divisional Court, however, made an order upon the plaintiff's solicitor for the repayment of the money. The plaintiff had in the meantime died, and the solicitor now appealed, and filed an affidavit in which he stated that he had paid the money over to the plaintiff immediately that he received it, and that he had only retained his costs.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., and Horace Browne, for the solicitor.—The money was paid in under ord. 22, r. 5 (c), with defence setting up tender, and it could, therefore, be paid out at the request of the plaintiff. At any rate the solicitor who has been misled by the defendant's pleading ought not to be obliged to make good money he has already paid over.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Morton Smith, for the respondent.—The defence must all be read together, and it will then be seen that it denies liability. The payment into court, therefore, falls under ord. 22, r. 6 (c), and the money ought not to have been paid out without an order. The question was one of discretion for the Divisional Court, and this court will not interfere.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

LINDLEY, L.J. [after stating the facts].—In this case the Divisional Court have ordered the solicitor to the plaintiff to refund the money to the defendant. The plaintiff himself is dead, and nothing has been said as to any order upon his representatives. The court took the view that in strictness and propriety this could not be a defence setting up a plea of tender, since the action was brought for unliquidated damages, to which no tender could be pleaded. No doubt, strictly speaking, the law is the same as it was before the passing of the Judicature Acts, and no plea of tender can be set up in an action for unliquidated damages such as an action for wrongful dismissal. A plea of tender can only be set up where the action is for liquidated damages. But the Divisional Court, having come to the conclusion that the money was improperly taken out of court, have made an order upon the plaintiff's solicitor to refund it. It appears to me that, looking at the matter with a view to see whether the solicitor had acted rightly or wrongly, the Divisional Court have come to an erroneous conclusion. It appears from the affidavit of the solicitor, which certainly was not before the Divisional Court, that when he had got the money out of court he immediately paid it over to his client, merely retaining his own costs. The statement of defence is, to say the least of it, ambiguous, and it is calculated (though it was probably not intended) to mislead a person acting, as this solicitor undoubtedly did, in perfect honour and good faith. It would have misled, I think, ninety-nine persons out of every hundred placed in a similar position. That being so, is the defendant entitled to say that his opponent has done wrong if he has done that which the statement of defence appears to invite him to do? The defendant has really done all that he could to induce the plaintiff to take this money out of court. It does not, of course, follow that the person who has got the money is entitled to retain it. But the Divisional Court, in the view they have taken, appear to have confused two very different things. The right of the plaintiff's representatives to retain the money is one question, the right to make the solicitor pay over the money which he no longer has is another and a very different one. It is conceded that the solicitor has acted perfectly right, and in my opinion whatever claim there may be should be against the principal, and not against the agent. It has been urged upon us that the question was one of discretion for the Divisional Court, and that we ought not to interfere. I do not think that discretion has anything to do with it. In my opinion the Divisional Court has made an order against a person who was not liable in any legal sense whatever, and therefore their judgment must be set aside, and this appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—In my opinion this statement of defence is informal and is calculated to mislead. Any solicitor might feel a doubt as to its exact effect. I agree, however, with the Divisional Court that the true reading of it is that the payment into court was made under rule 6 (c) with a denial of liability, and not with a plea of tender under rule 5 (c), of order 22. I therefore so far agree with the Divisional Court as to the effect of this pleading. But the Divisional Court made an order upon the plaintiff's solicitor to repay to the defendant money which he had taken out of court and paid over to his client. No misconduct on the part of the solicitor has even been suggested, and it is clear that what he did was done under a bonâ fide and excusable mistake.

Under these circumstances I do not think that the Divisional Court had power to order the solicitor himself to refund the money.

*Infant—Maintenance—Accumulation—Money invested in Consols in name of infant only—Dividends—Guardians—Bank of England—*11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 65, s. 32.

A sum of Consols was standing in the sole name of an infant, and it was desired to obtain payment of the dividends to be accumulated for her benefit, as they were not required for her maintenance. The Bank of England refused to act upon a suggested order requiring them to accumulate the dividends.

Order made for payment of the dividends to the trustees of a will under which the property was derived, to be applied for the benefit of the infant.

Petition.

(a) Reported by H. C. ROPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a petition asking that the right to transfer a sum of bank annuities standing in the name of Alice Kemp, an infant, and to receive the dividends already accrued thereon, might be vested in certain trustees, and that they might transfer the fund into their own names to be held on the trusts of the will of S. Hayward, or that they and Fanny Kemp might be appointed guardians of the infant, and the dividends paid to them on their undertaking to apply them for her maintenance.

S. Hayward, by his will, left the residue of his property to J. Kemp and F. C. H. Bellyse upon trust to invest and accumulate till the youngest child of F. Kemp attained twenty-one, and then to divide amongst the testator's grandchildren. Alice Kemp was the only grandchild still an infant, and the whole estate had been divided and the estate wound up except her share, which had been paid to a separate account. In 1885 part of this fund was invested in the purchase of £1,494 7s. 9d. Consolidated Three per Cent. Bank Annuities in the joint names of J. Kemp and Alice Kemp, her name being inserted by mistake for that of F. C. H. Bellyse, the other trustee. J. Kemp and F. C. H. Bellyse were both dead, and F. H. Bellyse and B. Kemp had been appointed new trustees of the will. F. Kemp, the mother of Alice Kemp, was her statutory guardian. It was stated that the dividends were not needed for her maintenance.

The petition was presented by the new trustees, the infant, and her mother, and was intituled in the matter of Alice Kemp, an infant, and in the matter of the will of S. Hayward, and of the Act 11 Geo. 4 and 1 Will. 4, c. 65, and the Trustee Act, 1850, and the Trustee Extension Act, 1852. When it came on for hearing on the 21st of April, Kay, J., directed that a draft order should be sent to the Bank of England to see if they would act on it, to the effect that, the court being of opinion that the dividends on the Consols would not be wanted for the maintenance of the infant petitioner, it was ordered that the Secretary or Deputy-Secretary, or Accountant-General or Deputy-Accountant-General of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England should, during the minority of the said infant, invest the dividends now due or hereafter to accrue due on the Consols standing in the name of J. Kemp, deceased, and Alice Kemp in the books of the Bank of England, or in any stock for which the same may be converted, in 2¾ per cent. Consolidated Stock, and should also invest and accumulate the dividends as they accrued on such stock when purchased in like stock.

The bank replied, through their solicitor, that there was nothing in the Act enabling the court to throw such a duty upon them, and that they must decline to undertake such a responsibility.

D. Sturges, for the petitioners, now asked for an order for payment of the dividends to the new trustees under the Infants and Lunatics Act, 1830, s. 32, which authorizes the court to direct payment of dividends "to any guardian of such infant or to any other person, according to the discretion of such court, for the maintenance and education or otherwise for the benefit of such infant," such guardian or other person being named in the order.

In re RAILWAY AND ELECTRIC APPLIANCES CO. (a.)

*Contract—Patent—Assignment of patent rights to company—Omission by company to pay fees—Lapse of patent—Bona fides—Fraud—Consideration—Implied covenant in a deed—Damages.*

By an indenture which recited an agreement to sell a patent for £250 "and for the other considerations herein appearing," the patentees, "in consideration of the premises and of the sum of £250," assigned their rights to a company, and covenanted that the patent might be held and enjoyed by the company "during all the term subsisting therein." The company covenanted to pay royalties on articles manufactured under the patent "while subsisting." The deed contained no covenant to keep on foot the patent or manufacture or sell any articles under the patent. The company omitted to pay stamp duty, and the patent lapsed. The patentees claimed damages against the company, which was in course of voluntary liquidation.

Held, that the omission to pay duty was a bonâ fide mistake, and that there was nothing to show that it was a wilful act on the part of the company; and that, for that reason and because the assignment was by deed, and that deed contained no covenant to manufacture or sell, a covenant to keep the patent on foot could not be implied.

Adjourned summons.

This was a claim by E. Gilbert and D. Sinclair for £2,000 damages against the company, and the question was whether a covenant to keep on foot a patent must be implied as one of the terms of the contract between the parties.

By an indenture of the 1st of March, 1883, made between Edward Gilbert and Daniel Sinclair of the one part, and the Railway and Electric Appliances Co. (Limited) of the other part, after reciting that Gilbert and Sinclair had obtained a patent for a new or improved fastener for securing the coverings for railway and other wagons or vehicles during the term of fourteen years, subject to payment of £50 stamp duty within three years, and £100 within seven years; and that Gilbert and Sinclair had agreed with the company "for the sale to them of the said invention and letters patent, and the rights, privileges, and advantages thereof, at or for the price or sum of £250, and for the other considerations herein appearing," it was witnessed that "in consideration of the premises and of the sum of £250 paid by the company," &c., Gilbert and Sinclair did "grant, bargain, sell, assign, and set over unto the company and their assigns all that and those the said inventions and letters patent thereinbefore mentioned, and the full and exclusive benefit and advantage whatsoever thereof and thereupon, with the like benefit of, and right to apply for, take out, and procure all future and other letters patent, prolongations, or extensions of the said letters patent, or any other letters patent or like privileges, whether within the countries and places aforesaid or elsewhere, for, or in respect of, the said invention, and all rights, powers, authorities, advantages, privileges, profits, emoluments, and benefits of the said invention, letters patent, and premises, or any of them, or in any wise appertaining or belonging thereto," to hold the same for the absolute use and benefit of the company. Gilbert and Sinclair covenanted for title "and that the said letters patent shall and may thenceforth be lawfully held and enjoyed by the company and their assigns during all the term subsisting therein," and to assist the company in working the patent. The company covenanted to pay to Gilbert and Sinclair a royalty of one halfpenny for every fastener or other article manufactured or sold by them under the said letters patent, or any such other letters patent as aforesaid, "while respectively subsisting"; and also in each year in which the profits on articles manufactured under such letters patent, "while respectively subsisting," should be such that thirty-five per cent. thereof should exceed the aggregate of the royalties for that year to pay a further sum to Gilbert and Sinclair. The deed contained no covenant by the company to keep on foot the patent, or to manufacture or sell any articles under the patent.

The assignment was duly registered at the Patent Office by the company. On the 4th of June, 1885, they sold licences to use the invention, during the unexpired residue of the term, to the Caledonian Railway Co. for £250, and to the North British Railway Co. for £200. The company paid several substantial sums to the patentees under their covenants.

By the rules of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, the fees of £50 and £100 were changed into annual payments of £10, and the first of these was paid by the company on the 11th of October, 1885; but the next one, due on the 11th of October, 1886, was omitted, and at the end of the three months' grace allowed from that date the patent lapsed.

The company in the session of 1887 applied by petition to Parliament for leave to present a Bill enabling them to pay the fee, and that the patent might thereupon be restored. The petition stated that if this were not allowed the company would be liable for damages to the patentees and other persons.

The petition and Bill were rejected, and on the 3rd of November, 1887, the company passed resolutions for a voluntary winding up.

Gilbert and Sinclair sent in a claim in the liquidation for £2,000 damages caused by the lapse of the patent.

The liquidators declined to admit this claim, and took out a summons for directions as to whether they were bound to do so.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the liquidators.—No covenant to keep up the patent can be inferred from the terms of the deed nor implied. The parties had no such intention, and the court will not imply a covenant to pay money to a third person. There is no covenant to manufacture or sell articles under the patent, as damages would be nominal: Churchward v. The Queen, L. R. 1 Q. B. 173; Stirling v. Maitland, 13 W. R. 16, 5 B. & S. 840; Rhodes v. Forwood, 24 W. R. 1078, 1 App. Cas. 256; McIntyre v. Belcher, 11 W. R. 889, 14 C. B. N. S. 654; The Telegraph Despatch Co. v. Maclean, L. R. 8 Ch. 658; Aspdin v. Austin, 5 Q. B. 671; Rashleigh v. South-Eastern Railway Co., 10 C. B. 612; Ivens v. Elwes, 3 W. R. 119, 3 Dr. 25.

Horton Smith, Q.C., and Haldane, for the claimants.—The facts show that the parties intended the patent to be kept up. It is a question of contract, and the court will imply a covenant not to do anything which will prevent the carrying out of the contract. All the cases cited are on that footing: Erasmus v. Elderton, 2 H. L. Cas. 624.

KAY, J.—I am asked in this case to imply in a deed a covenant which is not there, a deed which, it seems to me, is carefully and not unskilfully drawn; and the very great danger of implying such a covenant in a deed is, of course, manifest.

I have no right to know—I cannot know—anything about the negotiations which led to this deed. I can only look at the attending circumstances at the time it was executed. It may be that the parties thought this matter, and deliberately and with intention omitted to put into the deed such a covenant as I am asked to imply, and, of course, the danger of raising a right by an implication of that right is a very great one which I amply illustrated by the consideration I have just mentioned.

The facts are as follows:—Gilbert and Sinclair were possessed of a patent which they had recently taken out, and in respect of which there were certain payments to be made, and the omission to make these payments would make the patent invalid. They assign it to the Railway and Electric Appliances Co., which is now in liquidation by a deed of the 1st of March, 1883, and in that deed I am asked to imply a covenant by the company to make the payments necessary to keep on foot the patent. There is no such covenant in the deed. There are no such words in the deed as can support such a covenant.

There are a good many authorities on this subject, many of which show the extreme danger and difficulty of making an implication of this kind. One of the earliest is McIntyre v. Belcher, and there by certain articles of agreement for the sale of the goodwill of a medical practice, it was stipulated that the purchaser should have delivered up to him possession of the house, and have sold to him the horse, drugs, bottles, and surgical instruments and furniture employed in the business at the sum of £17 5s., and the vendors agreed with the purchaser to pay the rent and taxes up to a certain day, and that they would not within ten years from the date of the agreement practise at or within ten miles of the place; and the purchaser agreed that he would, in consideration of the premises, pay the vendor for or in respect of each of the succeeding years ending the 31st of December, 1860-1-2-3, if he should be living at the end of each respective year, one quarter part of the earnings and receipts in respect of the said practice without any deduction for expenses, provided the earnings and receipts of each year should amount to £300 a year. Then the matter came on on demurrer to the declaration, and it turned entirely upon a question of pleading, and the judgment, which seems to have been brief, contains, amongst others, this passage: "The substance of that"—that is, the pleading—"is that he has wilfully chosen to destroy the goodwill. Is that a breach of agreement? I think it is necessarily implied from the stipulations in the agreement that the defendant would take common and ordinary care so to carry on the business as to realize receipts. And a wilful omission so to do renders him liable to an action." Another of the learned judges says: "Looking at this agreement, although it is true there is no specific contract on the part of the defendant to carry on the business for four years, I think such a contract may be fairly implied." And another of the learned judges says: "The nature of the stipulated payments is such that it is necessary that the business should continue to be carried on during the four years. By wilfully incapacitating himself from so doing the defendant has clearly broken his contract." And the illustration he gives is this, "As if I grant a man all the apples growing upon a certain tree, and I cut down the tree, I am guilty of a breach." I must say that illustration does not quite satisfy my mind.

It seems to me that that illustration imports perfectly new considerations—I do not use the word considerations in the larger sense—but a perfectly new matter altogether. If a man sells the fruit of a standing tree it is not necessary to say there is an implied contract to keep the tree there, but if, after selling the fruit, having in his pocket the price which has been paid for it, he cuts the tree down, he commits a deliberate fraud upon the person to whom he has sold the fruit of the tree; and I should suppose that that element of fraud enters more or less distinctly into all such cases as McIntyre v. Belcher. Where a man contracts to make certain payments as part of the price of a thing which he has bought, and then wilfully (because every one of the judges uses that word) incapacitates himself from making those payments by destroying the thing which was to produce the money out of which the payments were to be made, he commits in the eye of a court of equity, and I should presume in the eye of a court of law too, a fraud upon the man in whose interest he was to make the payment. No doubt it was put in that case upon the ground of contract, and also in the case of Stirling v. Maitland, where the Chief Justice says: "I look on the law to be that, if a party enters into any arrangement which can only take place by the continuance of a certain existing state of circumstances, there is an implied engagement on his part that he shall do nothing of his own motion to put an end to that state of circumstances under which alone the arrangement can be operative."

Just to mention the other case on which reliance has been placed—In re the Telegraph Despatch Co. There, again, it was a sale of a business for £2,500 by instalments, the first two payable in any event, but the payment of the other two being contingent on the profits of the business. It was held that, as the purchase-money was to be ascertained with reference to the profits, therefore that there was an implied covenant that the business should be kept on, and that the plaintiff had broken the covenant by assigning the business to other parties against whom he could not recover.

In all these cases there is the element of a wilful act on the part of the person against whom relief is sought which incapacitated him from carrying out his contract to make particular payments. Here the contract is by deed, and I quite agree that it should therefore be construed by a more careful rule than if it were only an agreement, because if it were only a preliminary agreement it might not have been prepared with the same care. The deed seems to me to have been skilfully and carefully framed. It recites that Gilbert and Sinclair had contracted to sell their rights for £250 and for the other considerations therein appearing. I quite agree that those words are important as showing that what occurs afterwards is part of the consideration. Then there is an assignment and a covenant by the patentees that "the said letters patent shall and may thenceforth be lawfully held and enjoyed by the company and their assigns during the term subsisting therein."

These are apt words to describe the duration of a completed period, and various covenants which I need not dwell upon particularly. The company also covenant to pay a royalty of one halfpenny for every article manufactured and sold under the patents "while respectively subsisting therein." Observe that the terms are altered; instead of "during the term subsisting therein" you now have "while respectively subsisting." There is an entire absence of any covenant by the company to make payments to keep the patent on foot, or to keep it on foot, or to make any articles under the patent if they do keep it on foot.

Now the liquidators come in the liquidation and ask whether a claim by Gilbert and Sinclair for damages can be sustained under these circumstances. The first payment of stamp duty on the patent was duly made. The second payment, by what was obviously a bonâ fide mistake, was omitted, and the three months' grace expired, and the good faith of the company was shown by this, that they actually went to the expense of applying to Parliament for leave to bring in a private Bill. They did not succeed, and the patent lapsed. To say that there was anything wilful in the sense that would involve an act of bad faith on the part of the company is impossible. But the real question is, If you can imply a covenant in any case of contract, can I imply this covenant here? It would only be while the patent was subsisting. It was known that the patent would only subsist whilst these payments were made, and that if they were not made it would lapse; and seeing that the expressions used as to the duration of the contract are dropped when you come to the payments which the company had to make, it seems to me that it was intended that it should be left to the company and the interest they would have in keeping the patent on foot. Therefore it seems to me that I should be running the extremest danger of doing that which would be contrary to the intention of both parties if I imported into this deed a covenant to keep the patent on foot. I therefore must decline to do this. It seems to me that the patent lapsed by a mistake which did not involve bad faith, and I cannot hold that the company are liable because they did not make the payments which they might have made if the patent had been kept on foot. Very great weight must be attributed to the other side of the argument. There is no covenant to make any of these articles, so what damages could the claimants have? The company cannot carry on business, and are not bound to make any articles. So I could only give nominal damages. Much the safest rule is, where there any reasonable doubt whether the parties intended to enter into a covenant such as is sought to be implied here, is to look to the circumstances in which the deed was made, and if you find no such covenant in the deed, nor any bad faith by the parties against whom it is sought to imply a covenant, the court ought to be extremely careful how to imply a covenant in a well-considered deed, where there are no words whatever which express that covenant in any way. Here I must say that no claim can be allowed. The patentees brought in the claim, and they cannot have any costs; the liquidator will have his costs out of the estate.

In re The Palatine Estate Charity. (a.)

Charity—Objects—"Reparations, ornaments, and other necessary occasions"—Erection of spire—Salaries.

The objects to which the funds of a charity were applicable were "the reparations, ornaments, and other necessary occasions of the parish church of Stoke Newington." A new parish church having been erected by voluntary contributions and substituted for the old one, under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, s. 1, and the funds having been insufficient for the erection of a spire which formed part of the design,

Held, that the erection of the spire fell within the objects of the charity.

Held, also, that the salaries of persons employed in the church, except such as were concerned with the maintenance of the fabric of the church, could not be paid out of the charitable funds.

The origin of this charity was unknown. In an inquisition, however, held in the reign of Charles I. it was found that the churchwardens of Stoke Newington had been seised from time immemorial of 4 acres and 3 roods of pasture land commonly called "the gravel pits" in the parish of St. Mary, Stoke Newington, and had time out of mind employed "all the rents, issues, and profits of the said 4 acres and 3 roods of pasture land for or towards the reparations, ornaments, and other necessary occasions of the parish church of Stoke Newington," subject to a small quit rent payable to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's as Lords of the Manor of Stoke Newington.

By the beginning of the present century the property of the charity had come to be known as "The Palatine Estate."

In 1845, the parish church of St. Mary being not large enough for the parish, an ecclesiastical district was formed comprising parts of the parishes of Stoke Newington and Hornsey. This district was called the district of St. Matthias, and a district church called the Church of St. Matthias was erected. This church stood in the parish of Stoke Newington.

In 1855 an information was filed at the instance of the then incumbent of St. Matthias, by which a share of the income of the Palatine Estate was claimed on behalf of that church. The information was heard by Lord Romilly, M.R., in 1857 (Attorney-General v. Love, 23 Beav. 499) and he decided against the claim on the ground that the parish church of St. Mary only was entitled to the income of the charity until it could be shown that the income was in excess of the requirements of that church. His lordship also decided that a new parish church which had then recently been erected, and under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, s. 1, substituted for the old church, was entitled to the income in place of the old church.

By the scheme settled under that information the trustees of the charity were directed, after providing for the expenses of working the scheme, to pay to the churchwardens for the time being of the parish of St. Mary, Stoke Newington, such sums as should be necessary for the reparations, ornaments, and other necessary occasions of the parish church of St. Mary, to be applied by them in such reparations, ornaments, and occasions. And leave was reserved to the Attorney-General, if at any time he should consider it desirable, to apply for a new scheme.

In 1873 the Palatine Estate was enfranchised, and building leases were granted, and the annual income in consequence increased so that it was now £500 above what it had been in 1859.

It being difficult to expend the whole of the income of the estate in ordinary repairs and ornaments of the church, it had for a long time past been the practice to pay the salaries of the sexton, church cleaners, organist, and other officials out of the income of the charity. On the hearing of the above-mentioned information the Master of the Rolls said, with regard to the payment of these salaries, "It is doubtful whether these salaries are within the terms of repair, ornament, and other necessary occasions of the parish church," but he did not further decide the question.

Of late years other ecclesiastical districts—namely, those of All Saints', St. Faith's, and St. Andrew's—had been formed, each comprising part of the parish of Stoke Newington. The incumbents of these districts all claimed part of the income of the charity, on the ground that the income was larger than was requisite for the parish church of St. Mary.

The present parish church of St. Mary was erected in 1858 by voluntary contributions. The design included a tower and spire, but, the contributions being insufficient, the tower and spire were not erected. It having been proposed to borrow upon mortgage the sum requisite for adding the spire, and to employ the surplus income of the Palatine Estate in paying off this mortgage, the Attorney-General, at the instance of the incumbents of the district churches, applied for a new scheme.

An order for a new scheme having been obtained, a draft was prepared and afterwards amended. By the amended draft the Attorney-General proposed to divide one-half of the charity between the old and new parish churches, and the other half in equal shares between the four district churches standing in the parish.

Since the matter had been set down an arrangement had been come to between the incumbents and churchwardens of the district churches and the rector and churchwardens of the parish church (subject to the approval of the court), by which £6,000 was to be raised by mortgage of the Palatine Estate for the completion of the spire, to be repayable out of the charity income by instalments extending over thirty years, and out of the residue of the income £75 was to be paid every year to each of the district churches for thirty years, and at the end of that time a new scheme was to be made. The Attorney-General, however, declined to accede to this arrangement, on the ground that the spire was not within the objects of the charity.

Cecil Russell, for the Attorney-General, cited Attorney-General v. Love, 23 Beav. 499, 5 W.R. Dig. 13, and Merchant Taylors' Co. v. Attorney-General, 19 W. R. 641, 6 Ch. App. 512. He contended that the erection of the spire was not within the objects of the trust. It was not an "ornament." [He referred to the definition of "ornament" given by Lord Kingsdown in Liddell v. Westerton, Moo. Spec. Rep., at p. 156; "Church Furniture," by Edw. Peacock; and two decrees dated 10th year of King John in the Cotton MS. at the British Museum.] Nor was the spire a "reparation," because no spire had previously existed. Nor was it a "necessary occasion," for if it had been the bishop would not have consecrated the church without it, nor could the services have been conducted. With regard to the salaries he cited Burn's Eccles. Law, 9th ed., p. 374, tit. Church, and Church of St. John's, Margate, v. Parishioners of the Same, 1 Hagg. Cons. 198.

Hastings, Q.C., and Boome, for the trustees of the charity, including the rector and churchwardens of St. Mary's, contrà, cited Woodward v. Makepeace, 1 Salk. 164; Nicholson v. Master, Vin. Abr., tit. Churchwardens; and Maynard v. Brand, 3 Phil. 501.

Stuart Moore, for the vicar and churchwardens of St. Matthias.

Ingle Joyce, for the vicars and churchwardens of the other district churches.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts and proceeded:—The question is, How the surplus rents of this charity ought to be applied? It is contended on behalf of the Attorney-General that they ought to be applied cy-près. On the other hand, it is contended on behalf of the parish church that, the charity having been established for the "reparations, ornaments, and other necessary occasions" of the church, there can be no surplus to be applied cy-près until all the objects of the original trust have been exhausted, and it is said that there is a purpose within the scope of the original trust to which the surplus ought to be applied—viz., the erection of a spire, which was contemplated by the architect, but has not yet been erected for want of funds. The question is whether such an application of the funds falls within the objects of the charity. I am asked by the Attorney-General to construe the gift very much as if the charity were founded by a charter. I am not sure that that is a proper mode of construing it, but I propose to deal with it on that footing, and to consider whether the erection of a spire falls within the "reparations, ornaments, and other necessary occasions" of the church. It is not clear that it may not fall within the one or other of the first headings. In regard to "reparations" the law is very wide, and it has been frequently laid down that the term is not to be confined in its application to old buildings, but may be extended to the reparation of a new building. That was sanctioned in Attorney-General v. The Wax Chandlers' Co., 19 W. R. 33, 5 Ch. App. 503. Again, as regards "ornaments," it is contended by the Attorney-General that the word has a technical meaning, and, as laid down by the Privy Council in Liddell v. Westerton, is confined to the internal furniture of the church. I am not sure that that is not putting too narrow a construction upon the word. Sir Robert Phillimore treated ornaments as including decorations. He included a spire, and certainly said that decorations included all architectural decorations; and organs and bells have been held to be ornaments. But it is not necessary to decide whether a spire comes within either of the terms "ornaments" or "reparations." What are "necessary occasions" if they do not include such a work as this? It seems to me that they may fairly include all purposes necessary and proper in order that the building may fulfil the object for which it was erected—viz., that of being the parish church of St. Mary, Stoke Newington. The church, as designed by the architect, is incomplete at the present moment, for it has not got a spire, and the spire is the place in which it is usual to hang the bells, which are necessary ornaments of the church. In Woodward v. Makepeace it was laid down that bells were not mere ornaments, but were a necessary part of a complete parish church. I think I ought not to limit the meaning of "necessary occasions" to anything less than that. It seems to me, therefore, that the erection of a spire falls within the original trust, and that a part of the funds may be devoted to that purpose. There is another point—viz., whether the salaries of certain persons employed in or about the church are properly payable out of this fund. That point arose in 1857, when the case was before Lord Romilly, and he then said, "I do not know whether anything is brought before me except the question of right. If the question were before me, I should think it extremely doubtful whether the salaries to particular persons could be brought within the terms of the original foundation." Considering that the matter was not put at rest then, I should have been willing to let it remain open now. But, looking at the accounts, I do not find that these salaries were paid before the year 1815, when the increase in the rents of the property took place. In 1685 there was a minute in the Vestry Minute Book to the following effect:—"Whereas the rents annually arising from the Parish Field have heretofore been employed promiscuously with other moneys by the churchwardens, whereas it should have been only appropriated and applied for the repair of the parish church, and the ornaments thereof: It is ordered that the said rent be employed for the uses aforesaid and no other." It seems to me that this usage is too modern and too far apart from the purpose mentioned in the early documents for me to hold that the salaries fairly fall within the scope of the original charity, but, having regard to the length of time during which the rents have been so applied, and to the fact that in 1857 the Attorney-General took no steps to obtain a declaration upon the point, I think that existing arrangements should be disturbed as little as possible, and if binding contracts have been entered into they should not be interfered with. Upon these declarations the scheme will go back to chambers for settlement.

His lordship subsequently stated that the salaries of persons employed in the care and maintenance of the fabric of the church might continue to be paid out of the charitable funds. This included the sexton, organ-tuner, and verger, so far as he was concerned with the care of the fabric, but not such persons as the organist and bell-ringers.

STIMPSON v. WOOD & SONS. (a.)

Negligence—Husband and wife—Wife living apart in adultery—Action on behalf of widow—Lord Campbell's Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93), s. 2.

A woman who has left her husband and is living apart in adultery at the time of his death unsupported by him is not entitled to bring an action under Lord Campbell's Act for compensation for the death of her husband.

Quære (per Manisty, J.), whether evidence of the willingness of the husband to take back the woman as his wife would have entitled her to claim the benefit of the Act.

Motion to enter judgment for the defendants, or for a new trial.

This action was one brought by a widow to recover damages, under Lord Campbell's Act, for the loss of her husband through the negligence of the defendants. The action was tried before Grantham, J., and a common jury, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff, with £5 damages. The material facts in evidence were that the plaintiff's husband was killed by the negligence of the defendants, but that for five years the plaintiff and her husband lived apart owing to the plaintiff's adultery, and that during that time she continued to live in adultery with another man, who supported her. It was proved, however, that the deceased had met the plaintiff several times and had given her small sums of money, but not to an amount sufficient to support her.

Murphy, Q.C., and Pyke, for the defendants.—There was no evidence of a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit by the plaintiff from the deceased. The husband was not bound to support his wife after she had committed adultery: Sykes v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 33 W. R. 473; Govier v. Hancock, 6 Term. Rep. 603.

Kemp, Q.C., and Cohen, for the plaintiff.—There was evidence for the jury that the deceased might have taken back the plaintiff as his wife, and, if so, that was sufficient ground for a reasonable expectation of support from him on her part. The adultery of the wife with the connivance or by the tacit permission of the husband did not free him from his legal obligation to support her: Wilson v. Glossop, ante 296, 20 Q. B. D. 355.

MANISTY, J.—This action was brought by Sarah Ann Stimpson, as widow of William Stimpson, who was killed by the negligence of the defendants, as the jury have found. The defendants, however, allege that she has sustained no pecuniary damage, on the ground that she had not lived with her husband for several years before his death, during which period she was supported by another man with whom she lived in adultery. The husband also lived with another woman during that time, and the only suggestion of the condonation of her offence by the husband is the woman's own statement that he intended to take her back. The question is whether, under such circumstances, the plaintiff has, in law, any claim whatever against the defendants. She clearly had no legal claim against her husband. He could not be compelled to support her. But now that he is killed, she claims a right to compensation for the loss of him. It would be strange if she had such a claim in law. What legal relationship did she occupy towards her deceased husband? She had deserted him, and was living in adultery continuously. The point is dealt with in several authorities. Coke lays it down that, "If the wife leave her husband and goeth away and tarrieth with her adulterer she shall lose her dower" (Co. Litt. 32a). In Govier v. Hancock the action was for the board and lodging of the defendant's wife, whom he had turned out of doors when she had committed adultery, but whom he had refused to take back. The verdict was directed for the defendant, and the court refused a rule to set it aside. In Rex v. Flinten, 1 B. & Ad. 227, it was held that a husband could take advantage of the desertion of him and adultery by his wife to render himself not liable to her support, although he afterwards himself committed adultery. That case was an appeal by the defendant from his conviction as a vagrant for not supporting his wife. During the argument Littledale, J., said of the wife: "Having rendered herself unworthy of her husband's protection, she returns to the same state as if she were not married."

In the present case the wife returned to the same legal state she was in before marriage by her adultery, and so had no claim on her husband. The person guilty of negligence is, under Lord Campbell's Act, responsible for the pecuniary loss sustained by any of the persons named in section 2 of the Act. Upon the first point we must hold clearly that the plaintiff was not, in law, in a position to make any claim whatever on the deceased. As to the second point, I do not think that there was any evidence of the husband being willing to take his wife back. As at present advised, I very much doubt whether, if there had been strong evidence of the husband being willing to take the plaintiff back, she would have been entitled to maintain the action. There was no evidence, at any rate, fit and proper to submit to a jury of any probability of the husband condoning her offence. I am, therefore, of opinion that the verdict ought to be entered for the defendants, on the two grounds that the plaintiff did not stand in the relationship of a wife having any claim on her husband, and that there was no evidence on which the jury could reasonably come to the conclusion that there was any prospect of the husband taking her back.

STEPHEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. This was an action under Lord Campbell's Act, which enacts that the persons entitled to the benefit of that Act should be the wife or husband, parent or child. It is not necessary to suppose that every one of these persons had a legal right of support from the person killed, as, for instance, in the case of a father and a son over sixteen; yet in every case under the Act the right arises out of the relationship of the parties. It must be some such relationship between the parties as would give a right to a reasonable expectation of support. There is a well-known instance of a man who, having children, makes no will, or does not provide for certain of his children. Although he was not legally bound to provide for them after his death, and although he had not, in fact, done so, yet if the father had been killed by negligence the children would be entitled to claim under the Act as having an unqualified, an undoubted right, founded on a natural expectation of some future provision from the father had he lived. Or take, again, the instance of a father having only a life estate in his property. The child could have no legal right at all to look for provision from it after his death. Yet if there was a reasonable expectation by them of advances to them from the father had his life continued, the jury are entitled to find compensation as due to them under the Act. Now there are two characters here under which the jury might be asked to compensate the plaintiff. First, as the widow of the man killed, they might be entitled to suppose that she had an expectation of support from her husband unless there was some reason to the contrary. That she remained as his wife after her adultery cannot, I think, be doubted. She might have been divorced for that adultery, but she was not. Nevertheless, although she continued to be his wife, the cases show that, by adultery, she lost the right to support from her husband, i.e., she had no legal right to his support. Does she come, then, under the second class of persons who, by reason of their relationship, but without any legal claim, may be held by a jury to have had a reasonable expectation of support from the deceased, which they have only lost by his untimely death? What reasonable expectation had she in point of fact? There was some evidence to go to the jury, though of a very unsatisfactory nature, that the deceased had occasionally given her some money. Even if so, there was no reasonable inference to be drawn from that of what he might have done. I do not think any estimate of damages could be based on this chance of receiving some slight help from a man who himself had hardly any money. It is said there might have been a possible reconciliation, but there seemed to be no evidence of that to leave to the jury. I base my judgment, therefore, on these two grounds—first, that there was no evidence in this case of any legal right in the widow, so circumstanced, to support from the deceased; secondly, that there was no evidence of any reasonable expectation by her of pecuniary advancement. Lastly, I may say, as to the £5 damages, that I am not sure they might not be found to be excessive on the ground that there was no ground of estimating any such amount.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave and Wills, JJ.) June 18.

Ex parte COMMISSIONERS OF WOODS AND FORESTS. In re THOMAS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Disclaimer—Property held of the Crown—Right of trustee to disclaim—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 55, 150.

The provisions of section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, are binding upon the Crown, and a trustee in bankruptcy is entitled under that section to disclaim a bankrupt's interest in property held by him from the Crown.

Appeal from an order of his Honour Judge Brynmor Jones in the county court at Cheltenham refusing an application on behalf of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests to set aside a notice of disclaimer whereby the official receiver, as trustee in the bankruptcy, disclaimed all the estate and interest of the bankrupt in certain tract of coal in the Coleford High Delf Vein the Forest of Dean, known as the "Success Level ale."

The case raised the question whether, under section 55 the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, a trustee in bankruptcy disclaim property held of the Crown.

The facts of the case were not substantially in dispute. By the Dean Forest Amendment Act, 1841, s. 1, grant of a gale shall be deemed to have conferred the grantee, his heirs, and assigns, an interest in the nature of real estate, and by section 4 it is provided that the obligation to pay the rent, royalties, and dues shall be in the person in actual possession or in receipt the rents and profits of the gale, and be a personal obligation, and that he may be proceeded against as if had entered into a covenant with the Crown to pay such rents, royalties, and dues.

The interest of the bankrupt was three-sixteenth two-forty-ninth shares in the "Success Level ale," and on September 25, 1886, the official receiver, trustee, gave notice to disclaim this interest.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Gore, for the Commissioners of Woods and Forests.—The simple question is, How far section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is binding on the Crown? It is a general rule in the construction of Acts of Parliament that the Crown is not reached, except by express enactment or by necessary implication, in any case where it would be ousted of an existing right or prerogative. Therefore the Crown is only bound by the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to the extent specified in section 150. The bankrupt's interest in the gale in question is vested in the official receiver under section 54, and as the covenants run with the land he thereupon became liable to perform them. But the Crown is not bound by section 55 giving the trustee a right to disclaim, as section 150 clearly does not include the disclaimer provisions.

They referred to Ex parte Postmaster-General, In re Bonham, 27 W. R. 325, 10 Ch. D. 595; In re Henley & Co., 26 W. R. 885, 9 Ch. D. 469.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.—The case is clear on two grounds. Either the provisions of section 55 are provisions "relating to the remedies against the property of a debtor" within section 150, or inasmuch as the Act is not taking away but giving the Crown, as lessor, a right against another person—viz., the trustee, if the property vests in the trustee the Crown cannot say that it assumes the liability of the trustee under section 54 without the corresponding power of the trustee to get rid of it.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the county court judge dismissing the motion to set aside the disclaimer was correct. It appears to me that the best way to put the case is to say that it comes within the language of section 150 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Section 150 provides that "Save as herein provided the provisions of this Act relating to the remedies against the property of a debtor, the priorities of debts, the effect of a composition or scheme of arrangement, and the effect of a discharge shall bind the Crown." Now the remedies against the property of a debtor are not put under any separate heading in the Act, but where provisions are found relating to the remedies against the property of a debtor they will bind the Crown. The ordinary remedies in this case are remedies by way of covenants, by which the Crown might impose on the debtor certain onerous liabilities. On the making of a receiving order no action could be brought on the covenants, and the effect of discharge is that the bankrupt is absolutely relieved. Then by section 54 the property is transferred to the trustee. Now it seems to me that that is all one mode of dealing with the remedies against the property of a debtor. The remedies against the debtor are taken away, and in the interest of the creditors there is a vesting of the property in the trustee, and as attaching to that there is a right to disclaim and get rid of the property altogether. You must look at the whole of the sections, and the effect is that the creditor can no longer get at the property of the debtor. On the other hand there is substituted the right to prove against the estate, and the property is vested in the trustee in order that he might dispose of it to the best advantage. It would be outrageous to say that the Crown has a right to interfere with the vesting of a Crown lease. The sections which provide for the vesting of a property in the trustee are so connected with the sections which restrain actions against the debtor that we must read them together, and say that they do relate to the remedies against the property of a debtor. If section 54 is a section relating to the remedies against the property of the debtor, so is section 55. It is one whole, showing on what terms the property is to vest in the trustee.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have very little to add. The extremely narrow construction put forward by the appellants would lead to consequences so extravagant that that in itself must be a strong argument that it is not a proper construction of the Act. The proper view in my opinion is to take the group of sections which deal with taking the property out of the bankrupt and vesting it in the trustee as a whole, and say that they are provisions relating to remedies against the property of a debtor.

Appeal dismissed.

Ex parte THE TRUSTEE.
In re WHITAKER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Reference—Application by official receiver as trustee—Fees—Disclaimer—Joinder of respondents—Practice.

Where an application is made to the court by the official receiver as trustee in a bankruptcy, he is not exempt from the payment of the fee of five shillings prescribed by the scale of fees and percentages.

In an application to disclaim property against a landlord, any number of mortgagees or sub-lessees who are interested in parts only of the property sought to be disclaimed may be joined, but different landlords of separate and distinct estates cannot be joined as respondents to one application for leave to disclaim the aggregate property.

Reference by the registrar to the court at the request of the trustee in the bankruptcy.

The questions to be decided were:—(1) Whether, when the trustee making an application to the court happens to be the official receiver, he is exempted from the payment of the prescribed fee of five shillings (see Scale of Fees and Percentages, Table A.) although he does not make the application in his capacity of official receiver, but as trustee?

Up to the present time the court had required him to pay the fee, and the question was one of importance to the revenue, and the decision upon it would govern the practice, not only in the London district, but in all the county districts.

(2) May a trustee, in making an application to disclaim property, include in one application paper and one notice of motion any number of distinct and different properties, and any number of distinct and different respondents, such as landlord, mortgagees, &c., and use one affidavit dealing with all the distinct and different properties?

The question was of importance to the revenue, as, if he might do so, there would only be one five shilling stamp required, there being only one application. The practice hitherto had been to allow the trustee to include in one application any number of different properties, provided the persons to be served as parties interested were the same, but where the parties interested were different, separate applications were required, it having been found to cause great inconvenience to include different parties in one application, as they had to peruse a long affidavit, the very much greater portion of which had nothing whatever to do with them or their interests.

In the present case, and in some others now pending, there are a very large number of different properties to be disclaimed, and in which the parties interested are different.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 1.—CAVE, J.—The first point I have to decide is whether the official receiver is exempt from the payment of the prescribed fee of five shillings when he makes the application as trustee and not as official receiver.

Table A. of the Scale of Fees and Percentages contains the following:—"Every application to the court, except by the official receiver—5s." In my judgment the exemption only applies when the official receiver makes the application as official receiver, and not when he makes the application as trustee. There are, I think, good grounds for the distinction. Where the official receiver makes an application as trustee he is, as a general rule, in possession of the assets in the bankruptcy, and there seems no sufficient reason why a particular estate should be exempted from the fee when the application is made by the official receiver in his capacity as trustee, and be compelled to pay the fee when a similar application is made by a trustee appointed by the creditors. These fees are applied in paying the salaries of the officials and other expenses of working the Bankruptcy Act, and I can see no reason why a particular estate should be exempted from its share of the burden where an application is made by the official receiver in his capacity of trustee. It may be said that there are cases, especially in the administration of small estates, where there are no available assets for the payment of these fees. Such cases can only occur very seldom, and when they do occur the fees will, in fact, be payable out of the moneys applicable in paying the expenses of the Act, which seems a far more reasonable course than that in all cases, whether there are assets or not, an estate should be exempt from these fees so long as the official receiver was acting as trustee. Moreover, rule 318, which was made at the time when the table of fees was sanctioned, provides that the trustee shall, before the estate is handed over to him by the official receiver, discharge any balance due to the official receiver on account of fees, costs, and charges properly incurred by him and payable under the Act. The words "except by the official receiver" appear to me to have a sufficient meaning given to them if they are confined to applications made by the official receiver to the court as official receiver, such as applications under rule 334, or under rule 339 (4), or the like.

The second question is, in effect, What is an application? Primarily an application connotes a respondent against whom the application is made, and an application does not cease to be one because there are more respondents than one who are affected by the whole of the application. Nor do I think it ceases to be one application because there are respondents who are interested in part of the application only, provided there is also a chief respondent who is interested in the whole. But when there is no longer any chief respondent who is interested in the whole application, but only respondents who are interested in one part and others who are interested in another part, then I think the character of unity is gone, and the application is no longer one. I answer, therefore, that so long as there is a chief respondent who is affected by the whole application, the application is one, and one fee only is payable, although there may be many other respondents, some of whom are concerned as to part only and others as to other parts only, but that as soon as there is no chief respondent who is sought to be affected by the whole of the application, then the application is double and should not be allowed to be made in that form.

Apply this principle to an application to disclaim. I think the landlord is the chief respondent, and that if an application against one landlord, whether individual, partners, or company, any number of mortgagees or sub-lessees who are interested in parts only of the property sought to be disclaimed may be joined; but that different landlords of separate and distinct estates cannot be joined as respondents to one application for leave to disclaim the aggregate property.

Attorney-General v. Marquis of Ailesbury. (a.)

Probate duty—Accumulations of personal estate—Conversion—Lunacy.

The accumulations of the personal estate of a lunatic were invested in the purchase of land by his committees under the orders of the Lords Justices. By the conveyances made in pursuance of the orders, the lands were conveyed to the use of the committees, their heirs and assigns, upon trust for the lunatic, his executors, administrators, and assigns, either until the inquisition as regarded his soundness of mind should be superseded, or until his death, whichever should first happen, and until such time the grantees had certain powers of leasing, selling, or exchanging. Each conveyance also declared that the premises thereby granted were, "to all intents and purposes, to be considered as part of the personal estate" of the lunatic, but there was no trust for sale. Upon the death of the lunatic the Crown claimed probate duty on the value of the investment in land.

Held, that the value of the lands was part of the personal estate of the lunatic at his death, and liable to probate duty.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 34 W. R. 261, 16 Q. B. D. 408) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ.), reversing a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (Mathew and A. L. Smith, JJ.), reported 33 W. R. 731, 14 Q. B. D. 895.

The information in this case was to recover duty payable under the Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 Vict. c. 12), in respect of certain investments representing portions of the personal estate of Sir Henry Meux, deceased, of whose will the defendants were executors.

The short facts of the case are stated in the judgments delivered by Lords Selborne and Macnaghten.

This appeal was first argued by Vaughan Hawkins (Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Sir E. Clarke, S.G., with him), for the appellant, and by Montague Cookson, Q.C., and Sir H. Davey, Q.C. (*R. Hawkins replied.

Aug. 8.—Lord Halsbury, C.—It is not my intention to dissent from the conclusion at which the majority of your lordships have arrived. If the matter were res integra I think that much might have been said as to the effect of the original investment in land on behalf of the lunatic, and the authority under which that investment was made, and to the effect that should properly be given to the trust declared by the Lords Justices. But I yield to authority. I think that the practice of the Court of Chancery for more than 100 years and the authority of judges of very great eminence establish such a course of practice and such a chain of authority that I do not think I am at liberty to assume that either that Court or its very learned judges were in error as to their powers and jurisdiction; and I cannot deny that if the course so sanctioned by usage and authority is authorized by law it governs this case. I do not think that it would be a profitable exercise to point out how, if this case were not governed by such authority and one were more free to argue it on abstract principles, the decision ought to be the other way. I am therefore prepared to concur in the motion which I understand the noble and learned earl is about to make.

Earl Selborne.—In this case money of a lunatic was invested, by order of the Lords Justices having jurisdiction in lunacy, in purchases of lands, which, under their lordships' direction, were conveyed to trustees upon trust for the lunatic, his executors, administrators, and assigns, with a declaration that the lands so conveyed (and all others to be purchased in lieu of them under any exercise of certain powers of sale and reinvestment which were contained in the deed) should, "to all intents and purposes, be considered as part of the personal estate" of the lunatic. After the death of the lunatic, who never recovered, the Crown claimed probate duty upon his interest under this trust, as part of his personal estate and effects at the time of his death, which by virtue of the probate of his will (made before the lunacy) became vested in his executors. A divisional court of the Queen's Bench Division held the Crown entitled to the duty so claimed; but that judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal. The question is important, and it might have been expected to have been previously the subject of judicial decision. But no authority directly in point was cited at the bar. It is to be observed that in this case the lunatic to whom the money laid out in these purchases belonged never himself did, or assented to, any act by which it was or could be converted into realty; he was incapable of doing any such act, or of giving any such consent. And although I do not think it is open to dispute that the Lords Justices, in the due course of the administration of his estate in lunacy, might have done any act which they judged to be for his benefit, it is to me clear that in this case they did not judge it necessary, or for his benefit, to do any act which would have the effect of converting his personal right to the money thus invested into a real right to land with the incidents belonging to realty; but that, on the contrary, they intended to prevent the investment which they authorized from having any such consequence, and introduced both into their own order and into the conveyance which followed thereon declarations which they considered proper and sufficient to effectuate that intention. Under these circumstances, I think the present case undistinguishable in principle from those in which trustees without authority, or the guardians of an infant or committees of a lunatic without the sanction of any court, have invested personalty belonging to the trust, or to the infant, or the lunatic, in the purchase of lands of inheritance, nothing being afterwards done to supply the original want of authority. The Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices in Lunacy, high as are their functions, and regulated as they are by statute, act not as proprietors but only as guardians and administrators of the lunatic's property; and, whatever power they may have to convert any part of it from realty into personalty, or from personalty into realty, when judging this to be for his benefit, and deliberately intending to do it, it is in my opinion neither necessary nor right to ascribe that effect to an investment, which they have authorized on the terms, and with the declared intention, that it should not have that consequence. If an investment, de facto, in land may leave the original personal right to the money invested unchanged in equity for want of authority in the persons making that investment to change it, so in my judgment may a similar investment, made under the direction of a court, which declares, both in the order and in the conveyance, that it intends the personal right to remain unchanged, and does not mean to exercise any authority which it may possess to change it. In such a case little or nothing appears to me to depend upon the mere technical form of the conveyance to the trustees. In this respect I am unable to perceive any ground for making a difference between an investment of a lunatic's personal estate in land, under the authority of the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices in Lunacy, and an investment of an infant's personal estate in land (the terms of the order and of the conveyance in trust being assumed to be in each case similar), under the authority of the Court of Chancery or the High Court of Justice. There may be differences in some other respects, but in this respect I think there is none. Some of the older authorities, applicable to cases in which the investment has been unauthorized, are referred to in the first volume of Sir Edward Williams' book on Executors and Administrators, 7th ed., pp. 666 and 667. Two of these were cases of infants (Gibson v. Scudamore, 1 Dick. 45, and Witter v. Witter, 3 P. Wms. 99); and one that of a lunatic (reported under the name of Lord Plymouth as committee, in Freeman's Chancery Cases, p. 114, and under the title of Awdley v. Awdley in 2 Vern. 193). In Gibson v. Scudamore the court treated the purchase-money as in equity charged on the estate. In Witter v. Witter the same Lord Chancellor (Lord King) said: "The renewed lease, though for lives, shall follow the nature of the original one, and go to the executors or administrators of the infant, as that should have done. . . . This might and ought to have been declared in trust for the executors and administrators of the infant, if he should die during infancy." Lord Chancellor King there pointed out, as proper to preserve the personal character of the right during infancy, the same form which was afterwards used by the court in the case of Bridges v. Bridges in 1752 (Seton on Decrees, 2nd ed., 345); and was followed with approval by Lord Eldon in 1801, in Ashburton v. Ashburton, 6 Ves. 7, expressly to prevent the court from "changing the nature of the property." That form was for a long period of time, and under very great judges, sanctioned by the general course of the Court of Chancery in such cases. I do not see how your lordships could now hold a trust, declared in such terms to be ineffectual for the preservation of the personal right, with its proper incidents (of which the devolution of the equitable title to executors or administrators was certainly not the least important, nor the least distinctly in view), without practically declaring that all those judges were mistaken, and that the course of the Court of Chancery in those cases proceeded upon a misconception of the powers of the court, and of the effect in equity of what is authorized to be done. In the old lunacy case, as reported by Freeman, the Lords Commissioners (in 1690) held "that the administrator should have the benefit of the purchase, and not the heir; for if the money had not been laid out, it had been clear that the administrator should have had it; and, if laying out of the money would alter the estate, then it would have been in the power of the grantee of the custody to prefer the heir or administrator as he pleased"; and they said, "This court may either follow the land purchased, or the estate of Lord Plymouth." The report of the same case in 2 Vern. (Raithby's ed., 194n.) gives an extract from the decree, which declared "that it was not in the power of any committee to alter the nature of the lunatic's estate"; and adds, that the decree, in effect, declared the money laid out in the purchase to be a charge upon the land. It is true that, although it was not in the power of a committee, it is in the power of the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices in Lunacy, to change the nature of a lunatic's estate, and also that there is not, when that authority has given its sanction to an investment in land, any personal liability to make good the amount invested as there was in Lord Plymouth's case. But it is contrary to the general principle and course of the administration in lunacy to change the nature of a lunatic's personal estate into realty, unless it is judged, for special reasons, to be for his benefit to do so; and a power to change the nature of the estate, not exercised or intended to be exercised, appears to me to leave the case just as if there had been no such power; and, although there is no personal liability, the alternative remedy remains of "following the land"—that is, of treating the land as in the nature of a security for the money invested, with the chance of loss or increment, to be worked out either by means of a sale, as the proper and necessary means of effectuating the trust declared, or under the powers of a court of equity. The lunatic had, in my opinion, under the orders for these investments, and the trusts declared pursuant thereto, such a personal right transmissible to his executors, which vested in them by virtue of their office. If so, no election by any person beneficially interested after the lunatic's death to take the land in specie could displace the right of the Crown to probate duty, or the rights of the creditors or legatees to be paid in a due course of administration. This case, therefore, is governed, in my opinion, by the principle on which the Attorney-General v. Brunning and the Attorney-General v. Hubbuck were determined, although it differs in specie from those cases. The Court of Appeal seems to have thought that the declarations by which the Lords Justices manifested their intention to prevent the conversion of the lunatic's personal estate into realty might for some purposes be effectual, though not for the purpose of preserving the personal right, so as to vest in his legal personal representatives, and become liable to probate duty. That is not, to my mind, a distinction resting upon satisfactory grounds. If the necessary effect, in equity, of the investment as made, with a declaration of trust in the form which was approved by the court in this, and doubtless in a multitude of other cases, were to make the purchased property real estate of the lunatic, and to extinguish the personal right of his executors or administrators to follow the money invested, and call for its extrication from the land (with or without the assistance of a court of equity); and if the question had been, as was insisted by the learned counsel for the respondents, merely one of conversion of real estate into personal, and not of the preservation, unconverted in equity, of an antc-cedent personal right, then I could understand that the Lords Justices might have had no jurisdiction to alter the devolution of the lunatic's real estate after his death, and to cause it under any form of trust depending for its equitable effect upon their authority only to pass to executors or administrators instead of heirs (Fitch v. Weber, 6 Hare, 145). But that is not the view which I take of the present question. I therefore think that the order appealed from ought to be reversed, and the order of the Queen's Bench Division restored, with costs.

Lord Watson concurred.

Lord Fitzgerald.—The committee of the estate of Sir Henry Meux thought that it was advisable that the large accumulations of money standing to the credit of the lunatic's estate should be invested in the purchase of real estate, but could not do so without the sanction of the court, to be obtained on establishing to the satisfaction of the court that it was for the benefit of the lunatic that the investment should be made. The committee entered into a preliminary negotiation with the Earl of Clarendon for the purchase of an estate, and obtained from the court an order of the 27th of April, 1865, authorizing the committee on behalf of the lunatic to employ competent surveyors to ascertain the value of the estate, and to enter into a provisional contract for the purchase subject to the approval of the court. The provisional agreement for purchase was made on the 19th of June, 1865, by which the Earl of Clarendon agreed to sell to Sir Henry Meux, and the said Sir Henry Meux by his committee agreed to purchase, the freehold and inheritance of the estate in question for £225,000. On the ordinary reference the master in lunacy reported that it was fit and proper, and for the benefit of the lunatic, that the provisional contract should be adopted and carried into effect. On that report the ordinary reference was made by the court to settle a proper conveyance to the commitees "in trust for the said Sir Henry Meux, his executors, administrators, and assigns, with a declaration that the said estate is to be considered as part of the personal estate of Sir Henry Meux." In pursuance of that order the conveyance of the 30th of June, 1866, was settled and executed to the committees and their heirs in trust for Sir Henry Meux, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and it was thereby "declared that the manors, advowsons, hereditaments, and premises hereinbefore expressed to be hereby granted, are to all intents and purposes to be considered as part of the personal estate of the said Sir Henry Meux." The purchase was so completed because it was judicially considered that to do so was for the benefit of the lunatic, and it was probably at the time a wise determination having regard to his position, the state of his family, and the provisions of his will made whilst he was of sound mind. We are now dealing with this case for revenue purposes only. As the Inland Revenue Act declares that probate duty is to be paid "on the estate and effects in respect of which probate is to be granted," and as the imposition of a duty of the kind requires clear and unambiguous language which ought not to be extended so as to embrace matters not plainly within the purview and intention of the Legislature, I had led myself to think that the question was, what was the character of this estate at the time of the death of Sir Henry Meux? On that question there could be no real difficulty. It was "land" purchased for his benefit, and remained such to the period of his death, and was not subject to any contract or obligation to treat it otherwise than as land, or to any trust or duty in anyone as against Sir Henry Meux to reconvert that land into money, nor was there any right in anyone to call for its reconversion. It seemed to me therefore that it would be simpler and more in accordance with the sound construction of the statute and with principle to consider this estate for revenue purposes to be what it physically was, "land," and not subject to probate duty as if personal estate, but coming under other Acts for the purposes of duty or taxation as real estate, and liable to taxation or duty in that character. We have had the benefit of two arguments characterized by learning and ability, and I have read the judgment of the noble and learned earl and the judgment of Lord Macnaghten, accompanied by reasons of a weighty and exhaustive character. It seems that for a great length of time a theory has existed in equity, which has been carried into effect in practice, that an investment of the money of a lunatic in the purchase of land under such conditions as are now before us does not change its character or its destination. It remains "money" for all intents and purposes and unchanged in character during the continuance of the lunacy, and up to and at the time of the death of the lunatic if he has had no lucid interval. I think it would be unsafe and unwise to shake a doctrine and a practice so long established and acted on, and on that ground I concur in the conclusion at which the noble and learned earl has arrived.

Lord Macnaghten.—On the death of the late Sir Henry Meux, a lunatic, the Crown claimed probate duty in respect of the value of a freehold estate in Wiltshire, known as the Wootton Bassett Estate, which had been purchased during the lunacy, under the authority of the court, out of the lunatic's personal estate. The Divisional Court allowed the claim. The Court of Appeal decided the other way. From that decision the Crown has appealed. It was admitted by the learned counsel for the respondents that whatever is actually or constructively personal estate—whatever is personal estate either at law or in equity—becomes on the death of the owner subject to probate duty. This admission reduces the case to the simple question, what was the true character of the Wootton Bassett Estate at the death of Sir Henry Meux? To answer that question it is necessary to consider the circumstances under which the estate was purchased, and the terms and conditions on which the purchase was sanctioned by the court. Sir Henry Meux was found a lunatic in 1858. He had been married in 1856. His wife was alive, and there was one child of the marriage, the present baronet, who is a respondent. Sir Henry Meux was a person of considerable wealth, and in receipt of a large income from the well-known brewery business in which he was engaged. He continued to be of unsound mind from the date of the inquisition until his death, which occurred in 1883, and during all that time his estate of course was under the care of the court. The principles on which the court acts in dealing with the property of lunatics under its care are not open to question. The leading principle, the paramount consideration, is the interest of the lunatic. Consistently with that principle it is settled that, in the ordinary course of managing a lunatic's estate, the court pays no regard to the interests or expectations of those who may come after; but it is equally well settled that, in matters outside the ordinary course of management, it is the duty of the court, so far as may be possible, not to alter the character of the lunatic's property, or to interfere with any rights of succession. This is no new doctrine. In substance it is to be found in the statute De Prerogativâ Regis, which has been construed as impliedly forbidding the investment of a lunatic's personal estate in the purchase of land: Awdley v. Awdley, 2 Vern. 192. Lord Hardwicke lays down the rule on more than one occasion. In Ex parte Annandale he says: "In cases of lunacy the first care of the court is the maintenance of the lunatic, and after that it is a rule never departed from to vary or change the property of the lunatic so as to effect any alteration as to the succession to it." In 1772, in a case which was much considered, Ex parte Grimstone, Lord Bathurst expresses himself as follows: "It was said to be a general rule that the court will not alter the lunatic's property to the prejudice of his successor. Rightly understood, it is true. The court will not buy or sell land for him; but in the management of the estate the governing principle is the interest of the lunatic." In 1793, in Oxenden v. Lord Compton, Lord Loughborough makes the following comments on Lord Bathurst's judgment in Ex parte Grimstone: "If the Chancellor was continually looking to the right and left and weighing the probable interest of the representatives, the interest of the lunatic would be committed in favour of those who have no immediate interest, and whose contingent interests are left to the ordinary course of events. Therefore the Chancellor is to administer the estate tanquam bonus pater familias, making every advantage fairly to increase and improve it without engaging in risks and dangerous adventures, for those are not fit enterprizes. But whatever leads towards ordinary improvement it is strictly the duty of the administrator to do, considering only the immediate interest of the proprietor of the estate. But when I am laying down this so generally I must be understood to do it with this guard, that great care must be taken that nothing extraordinary is to be attempted, as estates to be bought or interests to be disposed of. Alteration of property is, as far as possible, to be avoided consistently with the idea of preserving the interest of the proprietor." In In re Badcock Lord Cottenham, while declining to listen to objections on the part of next of kin, in a case of ordinary repairs, observes that, "if the money were laid out in the purchase of land, or what would amount to the same thing, in building a farmhouse, it would be right that the sum so laid out should retain its character of personalty." If the rule which guards against alteration in the character of a lunatic's property should seem to require authority over and above that derived from the statute of Edward II., and the long-continued practice of the court, such authority may, I think, be found in the views of the Legislature as declared in the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, and the earlier enactments embodied in that statute. The Act of 1853 provides (section 118) for raising money for certain purposes by sale or mortgage of the lunatic's property. It provides (section 119) that if the money is raised by sale or mortgage of the lunatic's "land" (which comprehends all property other than "stock" as defined by the Act), the lunatic and his heirs, next of kin, devisees, legatees, executors, administrators, and assigns shall have the like interest in any surplus moneys as he or they would have had in the property if no sale or mortgage had been made, and that "the surplus moneys shall be of the same nature and character" as the estate sold or mortgaged. The Act also provides (section 118) for charging the lunatic's land with the expenses of permanent improvements if it appears to be for the lunatic's benefit, and enacts that if the money required is advanced out of the lunatic's general property it is to be secured "to some person as a trustee for him as part of his personal estate." Indeed, the principle is of wider application still. For example, it extends to cases where private property is taken for quasi-public purposes under the authority of Parliament. To quote James, L.J.'s observations in In re Barker, 29 W. R. 873, 17 Ch. D. 241, "Where property is taken compulsorily from any person who is not sui juris, and is not competent to make the subsequent alteration in the disposition or the devolution of that property which would naturally follow such change, the presumption is, if the words in the Act of Parliament really admit of that interpretation, that the Legislature did not intend to interfere with any legal rights or legitimate expectations of any persons whatsoever." That, as the Lord Justice says, is "a broad, general principle." In dealing with the property of lunatics, in late years at any rate, and since the Act of 1853, the court has given effect to the rule in cases which at first sight appear to lie rather on the line, and might possibly have been dealt with differently but for the Act. I will only refer to two instances. In In re Leeming, 9 W. R. 403, 3 De G. F. & J. 43, a mortgage created by an ancestor of the lunatic was paid off out of the lunatic's personal estate. The mortgage was kept alive, and on the death of the lunatic, intestate, it was held that the sum expended out of personal estate in paying off the mortgage ought to be raised out of the real estate comprised in the mortgage and dealt with as personal estate. In In re Ryder, 30 W. R. 417, 20 Ch. D. 514, the court sanctioned the enfranchisement of a copyhold estate belonging to a lunatic, but, as the descent of copyholds in the manor was different from the descent of freeholds, the court made a declaration for the purpose of carrying the equitable interest in the enfranchised copyholds, in the event of the lunatic dying intestate, to the persons who would have taken the property if it had not been enfranchised. In making the order the late Master of the Rolls, referring, of course, to cases outside the ordinary course of management, observed that it was, "a settled principle in lunacy that the court would not alter the rights of succession to the lunatic's property." I have dwelt at some length on this part of the case, because it seems to me that, if the rule is established, the contention of the Crown must prevail, unless it can be shown that there was some oversight or blunder on the part of the court when it sanctioned the purchase of the Wootton Bassett Estate. Now, let me invite your lordships' attention to what occurred on the occasion of the purchase. It appears that in 1866 the Wootton Bassett Estate was for sale. It was considered a very desirable property. The price was over £200,000, but there were ample funds resulting from the accumulation of income from the brewery business standing to the credit of the lunacy. Under these circumstances the committees of the lunatic's estate presented a petition asking for leave to buy the property on behalf of the lunatic. It was not disputed at your lordships' bar that the court had power to sanction the purchase. Whatever the origin of the power may have been, it is too late to dispute its existence. But unquestionably such a purchase was altogether outside the ordinary course of administration of a lunatic's estate, and, therefore, as it seems to me, if the court thought fit to sanction the purchase, it was bound to take care that the character of the lunatic's property was not altered. Knight Bruce and Turner, L.JJ., sitting in Lunacy, approved the purchase and declared it to be for the benefit of the lunatic, proceeding, I presume, on the footing that the proposed expenditure was an outlay which a person of sound mind in the pecuniary position of Sir Henry Meux might not unnaturally consider desirable in the interests of his family. At the same time they laid down the conditions on which the purchase was sanctioned, and they prescribed the form of the conveyance. The property was to be conveyed to trustees "upon trust for Sir Henry Meux, his executors, administrators, and assigns," with a declaration that the estate was "to be considered as part of the personal estate of Sir Henry Meux." If it had not been for the judgment of the Court of Appeal I should have thought the meaning and effect of the transaction clear. The commissioners had no power of themselves to lay out the lunatic's personal estate in land. "It was not in the power of any committee," as the decree in Awdley v. Awdley expressly declared, "to alter the nature of a lunatic's estate." The purchase could only be made with the sanction of the court. In giving its sanction it was surely competent for the court to impose such terms, not inconsistent with law, as it thought right. Terms so imposed are, I think, to be treated as binding and effectual. I read the order as authorizing the proposed purchase on the terms that the money to be laid out in the purchase was to retain its character, and that the property was to be conveyed to trustees upon trust to be held and applied as part of the lunatic's personal estate, which the court then and there declared it to be. The language of the order seems to me to be framed for the purpose of impressing upon the property to be purchased the character of personal estate from the moment of the purchase during the lunatic's lifetime as well as after his death. The conveyance carries out the order of the court in terms. It recites the order. It conveys the property precisely as the court directed it to be conveyed. It repeats the declaration which the court prescribed, and which is none the less the declaration of the court because it is embodied in the conveyance. A trust for sale would have made the conveyance no better and no worse. Practical effect under the circumstances it could have none. I do not see why a sort of magical effect should be attributed to it. The court is guided by the same principles and speaks in the same language, whether it is sitting in chancery or in lunacy. The origin of the Crown having the custody of idiots and lunatics is, as Lord Bathurst said in Ex parte Grimstone, "more matter of curiosity than of use." He adds that it certainly existed before the statute De Prerogativâ Regis, and that "after custody is granted the Great Seal acts in matters relative to the lunatic not under the sign-manual, but by virtue of its general power as keeper of the King's conscience." The observations of Lord Redesdale in In re Fitzgerald, 2 Sch. & Lef. 432, are to the same effect. Now, the order of the Lord Justices was not a novel experiment in lunacy administration, nor was it couched in language unfamiliar to courts of equity. In Simon Degge's case, 4 Bro. C. C. 235n, it appears that the lunatic was entitled to a freehold lease held for three lives of which the lunatic was ultimately the survivor. On the dropping of each of the other two lives, the lease was renewed under the order of the court, and the fines and charges were paid out of the lunatic's personal estate. On each occasion it was ordered, in the one case by Lord Hardwicke, in the other by Lord Northington, that the interest in the renewed lease during the life added was to be considered as part of the lunatic's personal estate for the benefit of his next of kin. Those orders were commented on by Sir Edward Sugden in Leitrim v. Enery, 6 Ir. Eq. Rep. 357, and certainly he appears to treat them as well-founded and effectual for the purpose of preserving the character of the lunatic's estate. In Elmer's Practice in Lunacy (6th ed. 206) a precedent is given for an order sanctioning the purchase of a house for the residence of a lunatic. It orders "that the property to be so purchased be deemed and taken to be part of the personal estate of the lunatic." It directs that the conveyance be made to trustees "upon trust for the lunatic, his executors, administrators, and assigns." The order, it appears, was made on the 7th of December, 1860, by Knight Bruce and Turner, L.JJ. It is obvious from the very nature of the case that there it must have been intended to preserve the character of the lunatic's property as personal estate. And so I think this order has an important bearing on the question before your lordships, whether it was specially framed by the learned judges who pronounced it, or taken, as is more probable, from an earlier precedent. Turning now to the practice in the Court of Chancery, we find in Seton on Decrees (3rd ed., vol. 2, p. 692) a precedent on precisely the same lines, which was in use in the Court of Chancery for some hundred years: "Let the estates mentioned in, &c., be conveyed to trustees to be approved, &c., in trust for the plaintiff (infant), his executors, administrators, and assigns. And let the conveyances be settled by the (judge). And declare that such trustees are to stand seised of the said estates in trust for the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, and assigns, as part of his personal estate. And in case the plaintiff shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years, then let the said trustees convey and assure the said estates to the plaintiff, his heirs and assigns for ever: Bridges v. Bridges, M. R., 30th of July, 1752, A. 559." It is the form of order employed before the Wills Act, when real estate was purchased with personalty belonging to an infant. The object was to preserve the character of the property, and thus to enable the owner, though an infant, notwithstanding the outward form of the property, to deal with it by will. That precedent had the sanction of Lord Eldon, and seems to have been uniformly adopted by him when the occasion required it: see Ashburton v. Ashburton; Ware v. Polhill, 11 Ves. 278. The efficacy of that precedent was never questioned. If such an order was efficacious in the case of an infant, why is it futile, or less efficacious, in the case of a lunatic? The result of the judgment of the Court of Appeal, if I recollect it rightly, seems to be this: The Wootton Bassett Estate, though bought with the lunatic's personalty, was land, and nothing but land; real, not personal estate; the equitable fee vested in Sir Henry Meux, either under the limitations of the conveyance, or through a resulting trust; the declaration that the property was to be considered part of the lunatic's personal estate was not a matter which could take effect during his lifetime; but in the event of his dying intestate, and in the event of his heir and next of kin being different persons, the estate was not to descend according to the ordinary rules of real property; it was to "follow the route taken by the personal estate," and devolve on the next of kin. That I apprehend is an impossible disposition. Real estate must descend according to the ordinary rules of real property. You cannot give real estate in fee, and say that on the death of the owner intestate it shall go to his next of kin. I venture to think that the court has no power to make such a disposition. So far as I am aware it has never attempted to do anything of the kind. Certainly I should hesitate to attribute such an experiment to Knight Bruce and Turner, L.JJ. In Holmes v. Godson, 4 W. R. 415, 8 De G. M. & G. 152, it happened that they themselves had to consider a very similar disposition. In a most learned and exhaustive judgment, Turner, L.J., sums up the law in the following words:—"The law has said that, if a man dies intestate, the real estate shall go to the heir and the personal estate to the next of kin, and any disposition which tends to contravene that disposition which the law would make is against the policy of law, and therefore void." It may be observed that, if the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right, the Lords Justices, in sanctioning the purchase of the Wootton Bassett Estate, did that which might have led to a practical difficulty. In the opinion of the Court of Appeal, the Lords Justices converted the lunatic's personal estate into real estate; they then had no power to reconvert it; thenceforward the Court in Lunacy had only certain limited powers of sale over the property under the Act of 1853. Now, if that were so, and if any misfortune had happened to the brewery business, and the money invested in the Wootton Bassett Estate had been wanted for the purpose of the business, it would have been found that the court had tied its own hands, and that, while professing to act for the benefit of the lunatic, it had put a fetter upon his property which it would have been difficult, if not impossible, to remove. On the other hand, if the land were impressed with the character of personal estate, actual conversion, if required, would always be in the power of the court. Stress was laid on the power of sale and exchange contained in the conveyance. I am at a loss to see how that can affect the question. It is a usual power. So long as the property retained the form of real estate it might have been extremely useful. But it does not show that the real character of the property was the same as its outward form. It was said that the Lords Justices had the lunatic's will before them when they sanctioned the purchase, and that the will gave everything to the only child. True. But he might have died in the lunatic's lifetime, or he might have survived the lunatic and died under age. In view of either event, and I may add in view of the testator's directions as to the surplus income of his estate, it seems to me that it was specially incumbent on the court to preserve the character of the lunatic's property. In the course of the argument some faint reliance was placed on the case of Matson v. Swift (8 Beav. 368). In that case there was equitable conversion during the testator's lifetime; actual conversion after his death. The proceeds were in court. The Crown claimed probate duty. The argument on behalf of the next of kin, and the decision of the court, proceeded on the ground that the right to probate duty depended on the actual form and condition of the property at the death; that the Crown was not entitled to enforce, for fiscal purposes, equities between private parties; and that real estate, though converted out and out, was not within the jurisdiction of the ordinary, nor part of the "estate and effects, for or in respect of which probate" is granted under the Act of George III. That view was perfectly intelligible. But after the decision of this House in Attorney-General v. Brunning, it was thought to be inconsistent with the grounds on which that case was decided, and it seems to have been finally exploded by the reasoning of James, L.J., then Vice-Chancellor, in Forbes v. Stevens, 18 W. R. 686, L. R. 10 Eq. 178, which met with general acceptance, and has been followed in Attorney-General v. Lomas, 22 W. R. 188, L. R. 9 Ex. 29, and Attorney-General v. Hubbuck, both of which cases relate to probate duty. In connection with this point it is to be observed that, although the Probate Court never recognized the doctrine of equitable conversion, a different view is now taken in the Probate Division. In In the Goods of Gunn, 33 W. R. 169, 9 P. D. 242, the President granted probate of a married woman's will or appointment, dealing only with real estate, which had been impressed with the character of personal estate, and he concluded his judgment in these words:—"I am of opinion that, where freehold property has had impressed upon it a changed character by reason of the doctrine of equitable conversion, it is to be treated as personalty, and probate duty is payable, and it therefore follows that probate must be granted. Probate must issue." Under these circumstances, it seems to me that no reliance can be placed upon Matson v. Swift, or, I may add, upon any of the glosses on that case, which it is difficult, I think, to understand, and still more difficult to reconcile with the facts as they appear in Mr. Beavan's report. It was not easy to apprehend the precise view which the learned counsel for the respondents took of the order of the Lords Justices, and the conveyance of the Wootton Bassett Estate. One thing, however, was clear: they did not accept the view of the Court of Appeal in its integrity. They admitted that the declaration that the property was to be considered part of the lunatic's personal estate for what it was worth applied, or might apply, for the purposes of administration during the lunatic's life. They did not conceal their opinion that, in the event of the lunatic dying intestate, and his real estate and personal estate becoming separated, the heir would have had a better claim to the Wotton Bassett Estate than the next of kin. So that on two points, one of which goes to the root of the decision of the Court of Appeal, the counsel for the respondents were at odds with the judgments they attempted to support. It seemed to me that, if they had not been hampered by those judgments in their favour, they would have preferred to argue, as they appear to have argued before the Court of Appeal, that the declaration of the Lords Justices had no effect at all. And rightly. The truth is, you must either give the order and conveyance their full meaning and effect, or you must hold that the declaration that the property was to be considered personal estate had no force or operation whatever, and that the order of the Lords Justices was a blunder. For the reasons I have given I decline to adopt the latter alternative. I think it was the duty of the Court in Lunacy to preserve the character of the lunatic's property. I think the court plainly intended to do so. I think the order and conveyance were effectual for the purpose. And therefore I am of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal must be reversed.

Order appealed from reversed; decree of the Queen's Bench Division restored; respondents to pay to appellant the costs both in the House of Lords and below; cause remitted to the Queen's Bench Division.

Stonor v. Fowle. (a.)

Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 5—Judgment summons—Commitment order—Direction to suspend issue of warrant during payment of instalments.

Judgment was recovered in a county court against a defendant, who was ordered to pay £20 in a fortnight. Upon default in payment, a judgment summons was taken out and an order made to commit the defendant to prison for ten days. The judge, however, directed that the warrant should not issue if the defendant paid instalments of £4 a month.

Held, that the order was made in respect of the past default in payment of £20, and not in anticipation of a default in payment of £4, and that the judge had jurisdiction to make the order under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 35 W. R. 130, 18 Q. B. D. 213) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), affirming a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Manisty, J.).

On the 7th of January, in an action of Bowen v. Fowle, the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant for £57 2s. 6d. debt and costs, and the defendant was ordered to pay by two instalments—£20 on the 21st of January, and the balance on the 21st of February. Default was made in the payment of the first instalment, and a judgment summons was served on the defendant. On the 4th of March evidence was given that the defendant had had means to pay the instalment of £20, and the judge indorsed the summons as follows:—"Commitment, ten days. Suspend warrant £4 monthly, first payment in fourteen days." The note made by the registrar for his own use ran thus—"Fourteen days. £4 a month." The order was entered in the Commitment Summons Book by the registrar in the following terms:—"Commitment ten days; suspended fourteen days. Means."

(a.) Reported by C. G. Napier Tholloper, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The two first instalments only were paid.

On the 18th of June, in answer to an application by the defendant's solicitor for a copy of the order of the 4th of March, the registrar replied as follows:—"Order made 4th March, 1886: £4 to be paid 18th March, 1886, and each succeeding calendar month. If not so paid warrant of commitment might be issued. The May payment is overdue, the June payment is due to-day." This reply was stamped with the seal of the county court.

An order of commitment was afterwards drawn up and issued. This order was dated the 4th of November, and was in respect of the non-payment of the balance of £20 and 16s. costs, after deducting the two instalments of £4 each which had been paid.

A rule nisi for the issue of a writ of prohibition, directed to the county court judge and the plaintiff, was made absolute by the Divisional Court, and the decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

The county court judge appealed to the House of Lords.

Nov. 22, 24.—Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and R. S. Wright (Sir E. Clarke, S.G., with them), for the appellant.—The order for commitment was in respect of the default in payment of the instalment of £20. The direction as to £4 a month was only to the registrar, and was not part of the order. The Commitment Summons Book shows the true order. The registrar had no authority to write the letter he did.

Sir R. E. Webster replied.

Nov. 24.—Lord Halsbury, C.—In this case I desire to say at once that if I understood the facts to be as assumed by the Lord Chief Justice and by the Court of Appeal I should entirely agree with the law which they have laid down in their judgments.

The two different propositions which have been suggested as guiding the interpretation of the statute are as distinct as anything can be. The Debtors Act, in that respect giving the jurisdiction to the judges both of the High Court and of the county court, although exercised under different conditions, has prescribed that there shall be in substance an abolition of imprisonment for debt, but has also provided that if a debtor having had the means, or having the means at the time when the matter comes for adjudication before either the judge of the High Court or the county court judge, wilfully refuses to pay or has improperly spent the money which he had after the date of the judgment, and has not applied it as he should have done in honesty for the purpose of satisfying the creditor's claim, there shall then be a jurisdiction, exercised by whichever judge exercises the jurisdiction, of sending him to prison, and that that sending of him to prison shall be a punishment to him for the offence which upon that hypothesis he has already committed, inasmuch as the Act specially provides that that imprisonment shall not be in satisfaction of the debt—it is an imprisonment for the offence which he has already committed.

In this particular case there are two views suggested as being, the one or the other, the true view of the facts. A certain debt was due by this debtor, and on the 4th of March, the debtor having been at a previous court ordered to pay £20, the matter is brought before the judge. It is suggested on the one side that what happened was that the learned judge made an inquiry into the means of the debtor and ascertained on that 4th of March that he either had had, or had at that date (it is immaterial to inquire which), means whereby that debt might have been discharged, and that having adjudicated that he had or had had that £20 he had refused or neglected to pay it, and that thereupon the learned judge directed an order for his committal for ten days for the offence which at that date—namely, the 4th of March—was already consummate, but that he gave a direction to the registrar of the court in consequence of something which passed between the plaintiff and the defendant in the cause that, although that warrant of commitment might then and there have issued because the offence had already been committed, yet it might be suspended and not put into execution if the debtor paid £4 a month in discharge of the debt which he had so owed and had so wilfully refused or neglected to pay.

If that is the view of the facts it does not appear to be doubted that that was within the legal competency of the judge. What happened afterwards, whether the man had means or had not, whether he did comply with the conditions into which he had entered or not, could in logic or good sense have no relation to the offence which on the 4th of March was already consummate. But the extreme rigour of the law might be relaxed in his case if, instead of continuing his refusal or neglect to pay, he had complied with what the plaintiff in the cause was satisfied with—namely, the gradual wiping off of the debt by the payment of £4 a month. And I do not think that any one observation of the learned judges in the courts below, with the single exception, perhaps, of Lopes, L.J., seems to throw any doubt upon such a course being legal. Lopes, L.J., however, rather indicates that it might be a sort of circuitous evasion of the Act of Parliament.

On the other hand, it is suggested that the facts of the case were these: that the £20 being due the parties appeared before the learned judge, and that the learned judge made no order for commitment for the non-payment of the £20, because as the whole thing took place on the 4th of March I suppose it would be too unreasonable and absurd to suppose that he made two contradictory orders at the same time—that what he did was to make a substituted order with regard to the £20 with which the previous order had dealt, and to reduce the amount payable to instalments of £4 a month. The question of fact for your lordships to determine upon those materials resolves itself into this question, What was it that the learned judge did at that date, and was there any substituted order made?

I have no doubt that the learned judge would, under the Debtors Act, have the power and authority to make such an order had he been so minded. But the answer appears to me to be overwhelmingly conclusive. There is not a fragment of evidence of any such order having been made at all. On the contrary, in the form which is relied upon in argument by the respondent, "I hereby certify that the above is a true copy of an entry in the summonses for commitment, interpleader, and minute of orders thereon," I find that every one of the entries included in that certificate is absolutely inconsistent with the existence of any such order as it is suggested to your lordships was made. I find that the amount for which the summons was issued was £20. I find that the order is not an order for £4, with the additional direction that if not paid the person is to be committed, but I find "Commitment ten days: suspended fourteen days." What does that mean? If the order which is now suggested was made—namely, that the instalment was altered from £20 to £4—and that that was to be paid in future, how could there be any commitment for ten days? There was no default made, and the commitment for ten days would have been totally inappropriate, for the judge could not possibly anticipate that the order would not be obeyed.

When one looks at the order for commitment which was ultimately issued, it appears to be very clear in its terms. Those terms are "Whereas the defendant hath made default in payment of" What? "Of £20 16s.," the odd 16s. being the cost of the hearing I suppose; "And whereas a summons was at the instance of the plaintiff duly issued out of this court by which the defendant was required to appear personally at this court on the 4th day of March, 1886, to be examined on oath touching the means he had then, or had had since the date of the judgment, to satisfy the sum then due and payable in pursuance of the judgment, and to show cause why he should not be committed to prison for such default"; "And whereas at the hearing of the said summons it has now been proved to the satisfaction of the court that the defendant now has [or has had] since the date of the judgment the means to pay the sum then due and payable in pursuance of the judgment, and has refused [or neglected] to pay the same, and the defendant has shown no cause why he should not be committed to prison; now, therefore, it is ordered that for such default as aforesaid," for the non-payment of the £20 which he had the means of paying on the 4th of March, "the defendant shall be committed to prison for ten days."

Every document in the cause appears to me to bear the same meaning. Even the document upon which so much reliance has been placed, the note made by the registrar upon a scrap of paper, seems to be in accordance with the note of the learned judge. What I should understand that to mean was that the order had then been made by the judge for commitment for ten days, but that it was to be suspended for fourteen days, and that the condition upon which the warrant was to lie in the office and not to be given out to the high bailiff for execution was the payment of £4.

If that is the true view of the matter what is the error, what is the mischief, what is the objection on the part of the defendant of which he has a right to complain? He is not being adjudicated, as Sir Henry James put it, in default for his not having the £4 at the end of the fourteen days, but what he is adjudicated as guilty of contempt for, and what he is sent to prison for, is what the judge has found as a fact upon the judicial evidence before him—namely, that on the 4th of March he had the £20 and did not pay it. I cannot help thinking that some confusion has been created by the ambiguous use of the word "order" without describing what order, and of the word "direction" without describing what direction. This was an order of commitment for ten days for the non-payment of the £20 on the 4th of March, and has no relation to the payment or the non-payment of the £4 at any subsequent date.

Under these circumstances it seems to me that the learned judge had full jurisdiction to make the order which in fact I find he did make, and, if so, of course this writ of prohibition cannot be sustained.

I desire to say one word as to the letter of the solicitor on the one side and the reply of the person professing to act under the orders of the court on the other. It seems to me to have been an irregular proceeding from beginning to end. The solicitor had no right to write such a letter, the registrar had no right to make any such reply. The registrar was thereby taking upon himself to give an exposition in contradiction of what the judge's order really was; and I cannot help thinking that that letter bears upon the face of it a sort of invitation to the registrar to fall into the trap which, as it appears to me, he has fallen into. I only desire to say upon that matter that I should regard it as certainly a novelty in our jurisprudence if the regular order of a learned judge could be affected or qualified or altered in the slightest degree by what some subordinate officer of the court thought proper to say in writing about it, even though in so doing he committed this additional irregularity that to that private correspondence he thought proper to affix the seal of the court.

For these reasons I move that the judgment of the court below be reversed, and that this appeal be allowed, with costs.

Lord Watson.—I shall content myself with saying that I entirely concur in the judgment which has been proposed by the Lord Chancellor, and also in the reasons which have been assigned for it by his lordship.

Lord Bramwell.—I am of the same opinion and for the same reasons. I think a county court judge would do wrong if, merely because both parties were willing to give time, as was done here, he should adjudicate that the man had means and had made default. At the same time if the whole conduct of the parties before him was such as to recognize that the man had had means, the county court judge might well adjudicate without any specific proof of it. I think it is important to bear in mind that an adjudication of committal ought only to take place where there has been a wilful default in payment; because in truth this power of committal is not an imprisonment for debt, it is an imprisonment for past dishonesty, together with the prospect of the plaintiff getting his money.

There is one remark which I should like to make about imprisonment under the Debtors Act. It has nothing to do with the particular case, but it might be useful to mention it. A learned county court judge once told me that at first he used to make orders of committal for a short time, and he found that the people went to prison. He then lengthened the period and he found that fewer people went to prison; and he found that the longer the period for which he committed people to prison for not paying, the shorter was the total amount of imprisonment suffered by debtors, because when they were committed for the whole six weeks they moved heaven and earth among their friends to get the funds and pay; whereas if the term was a short one they went to prison and underwent the punishment. That might possibly be useful as a guide. I am not speaking of my own experience, but I only say what I was told.

To come back to the matter in hand, I agree that for the reasons which have been given we ought to decide that there was here a finding by the county court judge that the man had had the means, and had made default in paying the amount, and an adjudication that for that default he should go to prison for ten days, but there was a direction at the same time that the execution of that order should be respited or delayed, and that it should not be executed at all if payment were made according to the instalments which were mentioned.

Lord Herschell.—I quite agree. I am not surprised altogether at the view taken by the learned judges in the court below of the facts, considering the way in which the case was presented to them and the admissions or statements which were made by the learned counsel who appeared on behalf of the county court judge. I think that we have probably an advantage which they had not with regard to arriving at a correct view of the facts of the case.

I should be extremely sorry to be supposed to throw any doubt upon the view which was expressed by the learned Master of the Rolls in conformity with that which he said had been entertained by Wills, J., and had been acted upon by the judges; but I think that in the present case there was an inquiry as to the means of the debtor; there was the conclusion that he was in default; there was an order for his commitment in respect of that default; and all that was done further was in mercy to the person declared liable to suffer imprisonment, he was allowed an opportunity of escaping from that liability provided he made certain payments. Now I do not think it is material how the amount of those payments was arrived at, whether it was according to what the judge thought he would be able to pay, which was perfectly consistent with his having been in default in respect of past non-payment, or whether it was according to what the plaintiff was willing to take. I do not think that we need enter into those motives at all, because I do not think that it was in respect of the non-payment of that sum that any proceedings were about to be taken to cause the debtor to suffer imprisonment which led to this application for a prohibition. But I desire to say this with regard especially to what was urged by Mr. Wallace, that I think a judge would very much neglect his duty if, in order to save himself the trouble of inquiring whether there was default, and whether the man had possessed the means of making payment of the instalments down to that time ordered, he were to issue a warrant of commitment with a stipulation for suspension if some smaller sums were paid, without having really arrived at the conclusion that there had been default. I think that that would be a most irregular and improper proceeding, and one which might very well be called in question. I think that it would be an abuse. But if there has been really in good faith a determination and adjudication of a past default, then I cannot see that the case is really open to the objections which have been raised.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I concur.

BADELEY v. CONSOLIDATED BANK. (a.)

Partnership—Loan to person engaged in undertaking—Participation in profits—Mortgage to secure loan—Test of partnership—Intention.

A loan was made to a person engaged in an undertaking at a rate of interest varying with the profits arising out of the undertaking, the amount of the loan and the interest being secured by a mortgage to the lender of the borrower's interest in the undertaking. The borrower became bankrupt.

Held, reversing Stirling, J. (35 W. R. 106, 34 Ch. D. 536), that, notwithstanding participation in profits, no partnership was created between the lender and the borrower, but that the transaction was a bonâ fide loan.

In deciding the question of partnership or no partnership in such cases, the court will not base its decisions upon isolated clauses in the agreement, nor upon such circumstances as participation in profits, but will look at the whole agreement. If it appear that, under the agreement as a whole, the business was a joint business, each party being concerned as principal and as agent for the other, the agreement will be treated as constituting a partnership.

Mollwo, March, & Co. v. Court of Wards, L. R. 4 P. C. 435, 21 W. R. Dig. 167, and Ex parte Tennant, 25 W. R. 854, 6 Ch. D. 303, followed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Stirling, J. (reported 35 W. R. 106, 34 Ch. D. 536).

The principal question in the case, and the only one calling for a report here, was as to whether certain dealings between the plaintiff, John Badeley, and one Joseph Melland Smith, and particularly an indenture of mortgage dated the 4th of July, 1878, constituted a partnership between them. This mortgage and the facts of the case, so far as may be necessary for the present report, are set out in the report in the court below (35 W. R. 106).

Stirling, J., held that a partnership was created between the plaintiff and Smith, and held that the plaintiff was liable on that footing. The plaintiff appealed.

The arguments used and authorities cited sufficiently appear in the judgments.

Rigby, Q.C., Swinfen Eady, and Eve, for the appellant.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the executors of one Haworth, who, by a counter-claim, had raised the question of a partnership having been established between the plaintiff and Smith.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., Barber, Q.C., S. Hall, Phipson Beale, and Tanner, for the other defendants.

COTTON, L.J.—This case turns upon one important point—namely, as to whether there was or was not a partnership between the plaintiff and Smith. On this point the judgment of Stirling, J., was unfavourable to the plaintiff. With that judgment I do not agree. The principle upon which this case should in my opinion be decided is found in the cases of Ex parte Tennant, 25 W. R. 854, 6 Ch. D. 303, and Mollwo, March, & Co. v. Court of Wards, 4 P. C. at p. 435. What is the law applicable to such cases? It is thus stated in the judgment in Mollwo, March, & Co. v. Court of Wards, as quoted by Jessel, M.R., in Pooley v. Driver, 25 W. R. p. 163, 5 Ch. D., p. 474: "If cases should occur where any persons, under the guise of such an arrangement," that is, the guise of an arrangement as creditor and debtor, "are really trading as principals, and putting forward, as ostensible traders, others who are really their agents, they must not hope by such devices to escape liability; for the law in cases of this kind will look at the body and substance of the arrangements, and fasten responsibility on the parties according to their true and real character." And in Ex parte Tennant, where the principle applicable was the same as that which governs the present case, I thus expressed myself: "Now as to participation in profits, there is, no doubt, a clause in the agreement which for the purpose of my judgment I will assume to amount to a participation in profits. . . . And I take it the law is this, that participation in profits is not now conclusive evidence of the existence of a partnership, but it is one of the circumstances, and a very strong one, which are to be taken into consideration for the purpose of seeing whether or not a partnership exists, that is to say, whether there was a joint business, or, putting it in another way, whether the parties were carrying on the business as principals and as agents for each other, whether it is a joint business, or the business of one only. Now let us see what is said by Lord Blackburn in Bullen v. Sharp, 14 W. R. 338, L. R. 1 C. P. 86, 112: 'I think that the ratio decidendi of Cox v. Hickman, 8 H. L. C. 268, is that the proposition laid down in Waugh

(a.) Reported by C. HERBERT BROWN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

v. Corver, 2 H. Bl. 235—viz. that the participation in the profits of a business does of itself by operation of law constitute a partnership—is not a correct statement of the law of England' (it has not been overruled, but it is qualified certainly) 'but that the true question is, as stated by Lord Cranworth, whether the trade is carried on on behalf of the person sought to be charged as a partner, the participation in the profits being a most important element in determining that question, but not being in itself decisive; the test being, in the language of Lord Wensleydale, whether it is such a participation of profits as to constitute the relation of principal and agent between the person taking the profits and those actually carrying on the business.' Certainly the Master of the Rolls does not in any way dissent from the proposition of law so laid down, because he quotes with approval the authority of Mr. Justice Lindley, stating the rule in substantially the same way. The Master of the Rolls, in Pooley v. Driver, 5 Ch. D. 481, says:—'I may cite, further, from p. 45 of the 3rd edition of Mr. Lindley's book, considering that gentleman is now a judge, the conclusion that he comes to as to the effect of the case of Cox v. Hickman, 8 H. L. Cas. 268, 'that primâ facie the relation of principal and agent is constituted by an agreement entitling one person to share the profits made by another to an indefinite extent; but that this inference is displaced if it appears from the whole agreement that no partnership or agency was really intended.' So that the Master of the Rolls, Mr. Justice Lindley, and Lord Blackburn all agree that what you must look at is whether the relation of principal and agent existed, a participation in profits not necessarily constituting a partnership, but being a matter which is to be considered, and which may be, conclusive if there is nothing else to prevent there being a partnership." So while there are dicta to the effect that participation in profits may establish or furnish evidence that there was a joint business—i.e., a partnership—yet where such participation depends upon a clause in an agreement, the court must examine the whole agreement to ascertain whether it was an agreement for a loan or a partnership.

The mortgage deed under which the partnership is sought to be established is peculiar. The object of the advance is to enable Smith to carry on his contract with the railway company; and the security to Badeley is whatever Smith should get from the railway company. The contract was to be carried on by Smith; but the loan was not merely a loan to the business, as in Delhasse's case, 26 W. R. 338, 7 Ch. D. 511. Smith was to go on with the contract, and power was reserved to Badeley to take it over and make it effectual, in order to duly to keep up the value of his security.

It was said that a share of profits was secured to Badeley, notwithstanding that the loan might be previously paid off. This is not inconsistent with the transaction being really a loan to Smith, but was by way of consideration for the risk involved in the loan. Badeley incurring such risk, the right was reserved to him to get ten per cent. of the profits, after making a suitable allowance for the work and labour of Smith; and there is nothing in this pointing to a device to mask a secret partnership.

Letters between the plaintiff and Smith have been referred to, in which the plaintiff uses the expression "working capital," or says, "we should do so and so," or speaks of a "servant of ours," "our interests," "our work." In some of the letters, capital is distinguished from interest; but nowhere does the plaintiff speak of "our capital" or treat the capital as a common fund of himself and Smith. And such expressions as I have referred to are explained by the fact that both the plaintiff and Smith were interested in the success of the contract; but the distinction remains between the present case and cases where the business is so carried on by each on behalf of and as agent for the other as to constitute a partnership. In my opinion the judgment of Stirling, J., must on this point be reversed, and the counter-claim brought by the executors of Haworth must be dismissed.

[His lordship then proceeded to deal with certain questions of priority between different incumbrancers, which do not call for a report, holding that on these questions the judgment of Stirling, J., must be affirmed.]

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the question of partnership, Stirling, J., considered, basing his decision upon participation in profits and certain expressions in the agreement and in the correspondence, that there was a partnership between the plaintiff and Smith. But we must look at the real agreement, the whole of it, and not infer a partnership merely from the fact of participation in profits. In my opinion the principle was correctly stated in the Privy Council in the case of Mollwo, March, & Co. v. Court of Wards, at p. 433: "It was contended at the bar that whatever may have been the intention a participation in the net profits of the business was in contemplation of law such cogent evidence of partnership that a presumption arose sufficient to establish as regards third parties that relation unless rebutted by other circumstances. It appears to their lordships that the rule of construction involved in this contention is too artificial, for it takes one term only of the contract and at once raises a presumption upon it; whereas the whole scope of the agreement and all its terms ought to be looked at before any presumption of intention can properly be made at all."

Stirling, J., has, in my opinion, fallen into error in picking out certain clauses in the agreement, and not looking at the agreement as a whole. I may point out that in this case there is no provision as to participation in loss, as in Pooley v. Driver and in Delhasse's case. The transaction, as it seems to me, was a bonâ fide loan; and no partnership was created. On the other points in the case I also agree with Cotton, L.J.

GRAY v. HOPPER. (a.)

County court—Claim indorsed on writ exceeding £50—Reduction below £50 by judgment under order 14—Jurisdiction to order trial in county court—County Courts Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108), s. 26.

By section 26 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, where, in an action of contract, the claim indorsed on the writ exceeds £50, but "is reduced by payment into court, payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise, to a sum not exceeding £50," a judge may order that the cause be tried in a county court.

Held, that the words "or otherwise" included the case of the claim being reduced after action brought; and that, therefore, where the claim was reduced to a sum not exceeding £50 by judgment under order 14, for a portion thereof, there was jurisdiction to order that the cause be tried in a county court.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 716), affirmed.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 716).

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The claim indorsed upon the writ was for £66 money due. The plaintiff obtained judgment under order 14 for £28, which was paid, the defendant having liberty to defend as to the residue of the claim. After issue joined the plaintiff applied for an order that the cause should be tried in the county court of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, pursuant to section 26 of the County Courts Act, 1856. The district registrar of Newcastle made the order, and this order was affirmed by the judge at chambers and the Divisional Court.

19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 26.—"Where, in any action of contract brought in a superior court, the claim indorsed on the writ does not exceed fifty pounds, or where such claim, though it originally exceeded fifty pounds, is reduced by payment into court, payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise, to a sum not exceeding fifty pounds, a judge of a superior court, on the application of either party, after issue joined, may, in his discretion and on such terms as he shall think fit, order that the cause be tried in any county court which he shall name."

Tindal Atkinson, for the defendant.—There was no jurisdiction to remit the cause for trial under section 26 of the County Courts Act, 1856. The words "or otherwise" coming immediately after "payment, an admitted set-off" must be read ejusdem generis with them as referring to something before action brought. That was the construction placed upon similar words in section 7 of the County Courts Act, 1867: Osborne v. Homburg, 24 W. R. 161, 1 Ex. D. 48; Foster v. Usherwood, 26 W. R. 91, 3 Ex. D. 1. In that section the words "payment into court" are omitted, but those words do not immediately precede "or otherwise," and these latter words must be construed ejusdem generis with those that immediately precede them. This mode of reducing the claim under order 14 was unknown at the time of the passing of the Act of 1856.

He also referred to Lewis v. Lewis, ante, p. 63, 20 Q. B. D. 56.

French, Q.C., and H. Newson, for the plaintiff.—The words "or otherwise" follow three particular expressions, one of which at any rate refers to something happening after action brought. Therefore the generality of the words cannot be limited by the preceding particular words.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In my opinion this appeal must be dismissed. As was pointed out by Bramwell, L.J., in Foster v. Usherwood, the wording of the two County Courts Acts are different. We have to apply the well-known rule that, where particular words of limited meaning are followed by general words, the general words must be read ejusdem generis with the particular. In Foster v. Usherwood, decided upon section 7 of the County Courts Act, 1867, this court held that the words "payment" and "set-off" meant payment and set-off before action brought. It followed that the words "or otherwise" also referred to something happening before action. The effect of that rule was to limit the meaning of the general words in that section. Can that rule be applied here? In section 26 of the County Courts Act, 1856, there is obviously one expression, "payment into court," which can only refer to something happening after action brought. Therefore the rule cannot apply so as to limit the meaning of the general words to something happening before action. The general words must have their natural interpretation, and the court had jurisdiction to make this order.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Reading the words of section 26 of the Act of 1856 in their natural sense, it is clear to me that the construction placed upon them by the court below is correct, and I concur in the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls. There seems to me to be a reason for the difference in the language of that section and of section 7 of the Act of 1867. The words "payment into court" were purposely omitted in the later section. Under the earlier section the judge has an absolute discretion in the matter; under the later section that discretion is gone, the words being "the judge shall, unless there be good cause to the contrary," remit the action to the county court. It is obvious that if the defendant could, by paying money into court, bring himself within the later Act, he could of his own will force the plaintiff into the county court. A reason, therefore, exists for the use of the more limited words, and that reason does not apply to the earlier Act.

Appeal dismissed.

Coch v. Allcock. (a.)

Practice—Evidence—Commission to examine witnesses—Ord. 37, r. 5.

It is in the discretion of the court or judge, taking all the circumstances of the case into consideration, to grant or withhold a commission to examine witnesses who are out of the jurisdiction, and the commission will not be granted ex debito justitiæ. The rule will be more strictly applied when a plaintiff asks for a commission to be himself examined.

Kemp v. Tennant, 2 Times Law Rep. 304, explained.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Field and Wills, JJ.).

The plaintiff was an ice merchant residing at Brevig in Norway. He agreed to sell and deliver to the defendant at Ramsgate a cargo of ice. The ice was loaded by the plaintiff's servants at Brevig, and shipped in the plaintiff's ship, but on arriving at Ramsgate the defendant refused to receive it, alleging that it was not of the size and condition specified by the contract. The plaintiff brought this action for £24, the price of the ice, and applied for a commission to Norway to examine himself and other material witnesses. The application was granted by a master, but refused by Denman, J., at chambers. The Divisional Court reversed his decision, and the defendant appealed.

Butler Aspinall (L. E. Pyke with him), for the appellant.—The court will not grant a commission where the amount is so small, nor will it ever, except under very special circumstances, grant a commission to a plaintiff to be himself examined.

Meek, for the respondent.—The court will grant a commission ex debito justitiæ where witnesses are out of the jurisdiction, since the witnesses cannot be compelled to come to this country: Kemp v. Tennant, 2 Times Law Rep. 304; Lawson v. Vacuum Brake Co., 33 W. R. 186, 27 Ch. D. 137. [Lopes, L.J., referred to Light v. Governor and Company of the Island of Anticosti, 4 Times Law Rep. 430.] The case is within Armour v. Walker, 32 W. R. 214, 25 Ch. D. 673.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In consequence of the case of Kemp v. Tennant, I have consulted my brother Mathew, and he tells me he never intended to convey that a commission must be granted ex debito justitiæ, or that Wills, J., had ever said so. He entirely agrees with the view which we have always taken, that a commission is a matter of judicial discretion, and that it is not to be granted except on reasonable cause shown. What that reasonable cause may be depends upon all the circumstances of the case. It is the duty of the judge to see that there is no oppression on the party making the application, and also that the other party is not in any way prevented by it from presenting his case fairly. It is, therefore, necessary to take all the circumstances of the case into consideration. With regard to a plaintiff asking for a commission that he should himself be examined as a witness, I think the rule is the same as with regard to a commission to examine any other witness, but it will be more strictly applied. In this case we do not feel inclined to overrule the Divisional Court, but we say that although the commission must issue the costs of the commission shall be in the absolute discretion of the judge who tries the case.

A sum secured to the wife on a dissolution of marriage under section 32 of the Divorce Act, 1857, is not alimony, and is property in respect of which the court has jurisdiction to grant the wife's solicitor a charging order for costs under section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860; but the court will not grant such an order unless the solicitor make out a primâ facie case of inability to obtain payment in any other way.

A married woman, having either no separate property or only separate property subject to a restraint on anticipation, who institutes divorce proceedings after the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, cannot be deemed under that Act to have entered into a contract, with respect to her separate property, for payment of the costs of her solicitor incurred in the divorce proceedings.

Order of Butt, J., discharged.

Appeal from Butt, J.

In May, 1886, Mrs. Harrison, on her petition, obtained a decree absolute for dissolution of her marriage with Mr. Harrison; and in March, 1887, an order was made under section 32* of the Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), that the respondent (Mr. Harrison) should secure to the petitioner (Mrs. Harrison) during her life the annual sum of £130.

On the 17th of May, 1888, Mrs. Harrison changed her solicitors, and on the 5th of June, 1888, Mrs. Harrison's former solicitors obtained from Butt, J., in chambers, a charging order under section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), for their costs upon this sum of £130 as property recovered or preserved through their instrumentality.

From this order Mrs. Harrison appealed.

E. W. Byrne, Q.C., and Bargrave Deane (Phillpotts with them), for the appellant.—This sum secured to the wife is in the nature of alimony, and therefore is not property capable of being charged with the payment of costs: In re Robinson, 33 W. R. 17, 27 Ch. D. 160. A solicitor has no lien on money received by him as alimony for the wife: Leete v. Leete, 27 W. R. 921; Cross v. Cross, 43 L. T. N. S. 533 (which case explains Bremner v. Bremner and Brett, 15 W. R. 75, L. R. 1 P. & D. 254). The husband is liable for the payment of the sum secured to the wife: Linton v. Linton, 33 W. R. 714, 15 Q. B. D. 239; and the solicitors of the wife can sue the husband for their full costs: Ottaway v. Hamilton, 26 W. R. 783, 3 C. P. D. 393.

Gill v. Gill and Hogg, 12 W. R. 808, 33 L. J. N. S. P. & M. 43, was also referred to.

Bayford, Q.C., and W. T. Barnard, in support of the order of Butt, J.—An allowance such as this, secured to the wife as permanent maintenance by virtue of an order made under section 32 of the Act of 1857, is property capable of being charged under the Solicitors Act, 1860. Such an allowance is only made on a dissolution of marriage, and is not to be confounded with alimony, which is only granted in cases of judicial separation, and while the relationship of husband and wife exists. Alimony, whether payable permanently or pendente lite, is given under rule 94 of the Rules of Practice in Divorce and Matrimonial Matters, and is liable to be varied from time to time or withdrawn altogether at the discretion of the judge and on the application of either husband or wife. But a sum secured by way of permanent maintenance under section 32 of the Act of 1857 cannot be subsequently altered or varied, but must always stand according to the terms of the deed executed in pursuance of the order made under section 32. Bremner v. Bremner and Brett, Leete v. Leete, Cross v. Cross, and In re Robinson were all cases of alimony, and are, therefore, not in point. Linton v. Linton was not a case of money secured to the wife under section 32 of the Act of 1857, but was either a case of alimony on a judicial separation or a case where an order had been made under 29 & 30 Vict. c. 32, s. 1, for weekly or monthly payments by the husband to the wife. Ottaway v. Hamilton was decided

* The Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 32, so far as material, enacts that "The court may, if it shall think fit on any such decree" (i.e., for dissolution of marriage) "order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife such gross sum of money or such annual sum of money for any term, not exceeding her own life, as, having regard to her fortune (if any), to the ability of the husband, and to the conduct of the parties, it shall deem reasonable, and for that purpose may refer it to any one of the conveyancing counsel . . . to settle . . . a proper deed or instrument to be executed by all necessary parties."

The Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Amendment Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 32), after reciting section 32 of the Act of 1857, and that it sometimes happened that a decree for dissolution of marriage is obtained against a husband who has no property on which the payment of any gross or annual sum can be secured, but who, nevertheless, would be able to make a monthly or weekly payment to the wife during their joint lives, proceeds to enact by section 1, "In every such case it shall be lawful for the court to make an order on the husband for payment to the wife during their joint lives of such monthly or weekly sums for her maintenance and support as the court may think reasonable," with power to the court to discharge or modify the order if the husband afterwards become unable to make the payments.

By rule 94 of the Rules in Divorce and Matrimonial Causes (December, 1865) "alimony pending suit, and also permanent alimony, shall be paid to the wife or to some person or persons to be nominated in writing by her and approved of by the court as trustee or trustees on her behalf."

before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, but since the passing of that Act it cannot be said that the wife contracts as agent for her husband in respect of the costs incurred by her solicitors in her suit for dissolution of marriage, and therefore the husband is now not liable for such costs. The wife is now capable of contracting with her solicitors, and her contract is to be deemed to have been made with respect to, and to bind, her separate property. The fact that the separate property was subject to a restraint on anticipation does not prevent it being charged with the payment of the solicitor's costs. In re Keane, Lumley v. Desborough, 19 W. R. 1025, L. R. 12 Eq. 115, is an express decision to that effect. [COTTON, L.J.—But there have been recent decisions of the Court of Appeal that property with a restraint on anticipation cannot in any way be charged.*]

Byrne, Q.C., in reply.—Though the sum secured to the wife under section 32 may not be alimony in the strict sense of the term, it is given on the same principle as alimony—viz., to prevent the wife becoming destitute: Fisher v. Fisher, 10 W. R. 122. But, assuming that this is property which could be charged under the Solicitors Act, this is not a case in which such a charge ought to be given, as the husband is primarily liable for these costs. [COTTON, L.J.—You did not argue that point in the court below, nor in your opening here, but, under the circumstances of the case, we will allow you to deal with it in reply, giving the other side liberty to reply finally.] The power given to the judge to declare the solicitors' costs a charge on property recovered is discretionary.

He referred also to Greer v. Young, 31 W. R. 930, 24 Ch. D. 545, and D'Oechsner v. Scott, 24 Beav. 239, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 91.

Barnard, in reply on this point.—This question was raised, if not argued, before Butt, J., and he exercised his discretion and gave us this charge. Section 28 of the Solicitors Act gives the judge power to make such order as he may deem just and proper as to how the costs are to be paid.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Butt, J., giving the solicitors who formerly acted for the plaintiff, the petitioner in the divorce suit, a charge for their costs on an annual sum which, under an order of the judge in the divorce suit, had been secured to the wife as a provision for her after a decree for dissolution of marriage had been made.

It was first argued on behalf of the appellant that this annual sum of £130 secured to the wife was not property, and, therefore, that the judge had no power, under section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, to charge it with the solicitors' costs as "property recovered or preserved" through the instrumentality of the solicitors. No doubt it looked at first sight as if the order under which this sum was secured was only an order for alimony, and if that were so this sum so secured could not be charged, as it has often been held that alimony is not property capable of being charged under this section of the Solicitors Act. But it appeared on examination that this sum could not be considered as alimony, as it was not, and could not be, given under that rule of the Rules in Divorce and Matrimonial Matters by which alimony is given, but was given under the power contained in section 32 of the Act of 1857.

No doubt in regulating the amount of the sum to be secured to the wife under this section the court has regard to many of the same circumstances which it regards when granting alimony—viz., what is requisite for the maintenance of the wife, and what the means of the husband are; but the sum secured under this section is secured to the wife as her property, and cannot be subsequently, at the discretion of the judge, increased, or diminished, or withdrawn altogether as alimony can, but is subject only to whatever limitations are expressed in the deed or instrument by which the sum is secured. I therefore agree with the learned judge below in considering that he had jurisdiction to charge under the Solicitors Act this sum "as property."

But then it was urged here, if not in the court below, that under the circumstances of the case the court ought not to have made this charging order. Now, although in my opinion if the solicitors make out a case primâ facie that they could not in any other way get payment of their costs, it would be right to give them this charge; yet I think they must make out such a case primâ facie, and the case of Greer v. Young I think shows that.

It was said on behalf of the solicitors that the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, had rendered the wife solely liable for these costs, and had relieved the husband from the liability to pay them. But under that Act a contract entered into by a married woman is to be deemed to have been made with reference to, and to bind, her separate estate only, "unless the contrary be shown." There was some slight evidence to show that here the married woman had some separate estate under her marriage settlement. We have looked at the settlement, and find that there was a provision amounting to a restraint on anticipation on what was her separate property. The fact, therefore, that all her separate property was unalienable prevents the presumption arising that a contract was made with reference to her separate estate. In my opinion, therefore, the solicitors have not made out a primâ facie case of inability to get payment in other ways sufficient to justify the charging order made by Butt, J., and that accordingly it must be discharged, and the appeal must be allowed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Assuming the deed by which this sum was secured to the wife to have been executed, I agree with the view expressed by Cotton, L.J. The sum is not alimony, and there is, therefore, a distinction between this case and the cases as to alimony which have been cited. This is a sum given under section 32 of the Act of 1857, and its object is not to provide a maintenance for the wife during the continuance of the matrimonial tie, nor does it depend from time to time on the discretion of the court. It seems to me, on considering this section, that the sum secured to the wife under it, is really property within the meaning of the Solicitors Act, because it is not thereby settled on her so as to be inalienable by her, or so as to defeat the effect of the Solicitors Act, and the fact that the sum secured may be a gross sum as well as an annual sum shows that the sum secured was intended to become the wife's for all intents and purposes, subject only to the limitations of the deed to be executed by order of the court.

But the court is not bound to make a charging order under the Solicitors Act except it thinks the order is a just and proper one to make, and in my opinion that would not be so unless the court is satisfied that all other means to have the costs satisfied have been exhausted. That has not been done here. The husband is primarily liable for the costs. It was said that the wife must be deemed to have entered into a contract to pay the costs out of her separate estate; but it is impossible to suppose that to be the true character of the contract, as the only separate property which the wife had was restrained from anticipation by the terms of her marriage settlement. The cases of Steedman v. Poole, 6 Ha. 193, and Spring v. Pride, 12 W. R. 893, 10 Jur. N. S. 647, seem to me to be authorities which show that the words used in the settlement amount to a restraint on anticipation. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal succeeds on the ground that the solicitors have not made out a primâ facie case sufficient to satisfy the court that the order was a just and proper one.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. [The Lord Justice stated the facts of the case, and continued:—] There are four kinds of payment which may be ordered by the Divorce Division to be paid to the wife:—(1) alimony pendente lite; (2) permanent alimony on judicial separation; (3) a gross or annual sum which, on a dissolution of marriage, the court may order to be secured to the wife under section 32 of the Act of 1857; (4) monthly or weekly payments under section 1 of the Act of 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 32) which, on a dissolution of marriage, the court may order the husband to pay if he has no property on which a gross or annual sum could be secured. We have to do with the third class of payment, which may be either a gross sum or an annual sum. It seems to me this is essentially different from alimony, and from the other classes of payments, and I cannot regard it as other than property of the wife, and, therefore, that it might be charged under the Solicitors Act.

We have, then, to consider who is liable to pay the solicitors' bill. It is said that the wife is liable, and that is put as the result of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 1, sub-sections (2) and (3). It is said that the married woman here had some separate property, but it turns out that the separate property she had was inalienable, and that fact repels the inference that there was a contract by her with reference to her separate property, and shows the contrary. We have, therefore, a case where the husband is primarily liable for the costs, and, therefore, the result of the order of Butt, J., is that what is a debt of the husband's is to be paid out of the sum which the husband has been ordered to provide for the wife. I should be unable to come to that conclusion until it were shown that all reasonable resort to other means of payment had been made. But here the solicitors have not sued the husband. Primâ facie the debt is a debt due by the husband, and the contrary has not been shown to us by the solicitors, they have not made out to our satisfaction that they had no means other than this of getting paid. The appellant must have the costs here and below.

Married woman—General power of appointment by will—Power exercised—Liability of property for her debts.

In cases not within the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the exercise, by the will of a married woman, of a general power of appointment, whether the power be exercisable by deed or will, or by will only, does not make the property appointed liable to engagements entered into with her on the credit of her separate estate.

Adjourned summons.

By an indenture of mortgage of the 28th of March, 1881, in consideration of an advance of £1,000 made by the mortgagees to Sydney Charles Dyne Roper, he covenanted to repay the same with interest thereon until payment, and his wife, Annie Caroline Christina Roper (the testatrix in this cause), with intent to bind her separate estate, covenanted for the payment of the interest to the mortgagees. The mortgaged premises comprised, inter alia, a policy of insurance on the life of Mrs. Roper for £1,000, to which she was absolutely entitled for her separate use, according to the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, and which she thereby assigned to the mortgagees as security for the advance, with a declaration that, notwithstanding as between Mr. Roper and Mrs. Roper, the latter might be a surety only for the former, yet, as between the mortgagees and Mrs. Roper, she and the said policy moneys should be deemed a principal debtor and security respectively for the principal, interest, and other moneys intended to be thereby secured.

At this date the only property to which Mrs. Roper was entitled for her separate use, without restraint on anticipation, was some household furniture and effects of the value of £200, and this policy of insurance, but she had a general power of appointment by will over two sums, of £10,000 and £2,400 respectively, under her grandfather's will.

By an indenture of the 10th of May, 1881, this mortgage was transferred to the present mortgagees, and Mrs. Roper "with the intent to bind her separate estate" thereby covenanted with the transferees for the payment of the interest on the mortgage debt.

On the 22nd of September, 1884, Mr. and Mrs. Roper executed a separation deed, by which Mrs. Roper covenanted with her husband that she would pay the interest on (inter alia) the £1,000 mortgage debt due from him to the mortgagees, and would pay the premiums necessary for keeping on foot the policy of insurance.

On the 10th of July, 1887, Mrs. Roper died, leaving her husband surviving. By her will, dated the 31st of May, 1873, she exercised her power of appointment in favour of her infant daughter, and bequeathed all her money, property, and effects unto her executors upon trust to pay her debts, &c., and hold the balance upon trust for her daughter.

The sum payable on the death of Mrs. Roper under the policy of insurance was received by the mortgagees, and applied in part satisfaction of the moneys owing to them on the security of their mortgage.

This was an originating summons taken out by the infant daughter of Mrs. Roper, by a next friend, in order to determine whether any and what part of the estate of Mrs. Roper (other than and besides the policy money), or any property which had been appointed by her in exercise of her general power of appointment, was, or might become, liable for the payment of the principal or interest owing on the above indenture of mortgage; and to what extent her estate was entitled to be indemnified for such payments against the mortgaged premises and against her husband personally.

The respondents to the summons were the executors of Mrs. Roper, her husband, and the mortgagees, who consented to be bound by the decision of the court on the application, subject to their costs being provided for.

Freeman, for the summons.

Borthwick, for the executors, admitted that by the separation deed the testatrix had made herself liable, as between herself and her husband, for the interest on the mortgage debt, but, as to the principal, claimed that her estate was entitled to be recouped by him.

Gaselee, for the mortgagees, contended that the exercise of her general power of appointment by Mrs. Roper made the appointed funds liable for her debts as part of her assets, and that those funds were, therefore, liable for the mortgage debt.

L. Field, for Mr. Roper.

Freeman replied.

The cases relied on are all referred to in the judgment.

The Court held that as between Mrs. Roper and her husband her estate was only security for the £1,000, and was entitled, therefore, to be indemnified by her husband to that extent. On the question whether the property appointed by her will was liable to the mortgagees for the amount due on the mortgage,

Cur. adv. vult.

June 27.—Kay, J.—In 1881 Mrs. Roper, being entitled to separate property, joined with her husband in a mortgage to secure £1,000 lent to him, and, "with the intent to bind her separate estate," covenanted to pay the interest, and assigned a policy on her life for £1,000.

I have decided that she joined in this deed merely as surety for her husband.

In the same character she concurred in a deed of transfer of this and previous mortgages by her husband, and entered into a covenant with the transferees for payment of the interest. Afterwards she separated from her husband, and by a deed of the 22nd of September, 1884, she covenanted with him out of her separate estate to pay the interest upon the aforesaid mortgage debts. She died on the 10th of July, 1887, leaving her husband surviving. At the respective dates of the mortgage and transfer her only separate property as to which she was not restrained from anticipation was some furniture worth about £200, and the before-mentioned policy upon her life for £1,000. But she had, under the will of her grandfather, a general power of appointment over a sum of about £10,000, such power being exerciseable only by her will. She had a similar power over another fund of £2,400 in the event of the infant plaintiff dying under twenty-one unmarried. She made her will dated the 31st of May, 1873, by which she exercised her powers, appointing in effect the whole of the funds to the plaintiff upon attaining twenty-one or marrying, subject to an annuity of £250 which she gave to her husband on certain conditions. The question is whether the funds so appointed have become liable to satisfy her obligations under her covenants with the mortgagees.

The Married Women's Property Act, 1882, commenced on the 1st of January, 1883.

On the 25th of March, 1881, it was decided in Pike v. Fitzgibbon, 29 W. R. 551, 17 Ch. D. 454, that the only separate estate of a married woman which could be made liable for her engagements was such as she had "at the time of contracting the debt or engagement." Section 1, sub-section 4, of the Act of 1882 altered this by providing thus: "Every contract entered into by a married woman with respect to and to bind her separate property shall bind, not only the separate property which she is possessed of or entitled to at the date of the contract, but also all separate property which she may thereafter acquire." Grammatically this plainly refers only to contracts made after the commencement of the Act, otherwise the words would have been "which she was or is possessed of," &c. Moreover, it is part of a section which increases the future capacity of a married woman to make contracts. To hold that it was intended to alter the effect of contracts already made would, in my opinion, be an unreasonable and violent construction which the court ought not to adopt without any express words. I therefore hold that this case does not come within that provision of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. If it did the question would be whether the fund appointed ever was the separate property of the married woman. It was held in Ex parte Gilchrist, 34 W. R. 709, 17 Q. B. D. 521, by all the judges of the Court of Appeal, following many previous authorities, that such a power, although general, and even if exerciseable by deed or will, is not itself property at all.

But it is argued that, although the power itself is not property, yet that the exercise of such a power makes the property assets of the appointor, and accordingly the property thereby appointed became liable for her debts. There is no doubt that in the case of a man who has a general power of appointment and exercises it by will in favour of volunteers, the property so appointed will be considered as assets for the payment of his debts. And this doctrine was applied by Lord Hardwicke in Lord Townshend v. Windham, 2 Ves. sen. 1, to the exercise of a general power, even when exercised by deed so as take effect on the death of the appointor, his lordship saying, at p. 11, "In respect of his creditors it must be considered as part of his estate at the time of his death, he having executed it so as to gain the interest to himself, and attempted to pass it at the same time to his daughter; the court will not suffer it; saying he has been guilty of a fraud as to them, being indebted at the time." This decision proceeded upon the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5. In Holmes v. Coghill, 7 Ves. 499, Sir W. Grant treats the doctrine as settled, where the appointment by will has been actually made, and at p. 502 there is a note of the decree in Bainton v. Ward, before Lord Hardwicke, in a case where such a power was exercised by will, and it was thereby declared that the fund appointed was to be considered part of the testator's personal estate, liable to the satisfaction of his debts.

But does this law apply to the case of a married woman? It would be strange if before the Married Women's Property Act of 1882 the law was that only the separate property which a married woman had at the time should be liable, to the exclusion of separate property acquired afterwards, but that, nevertheless, the exercise by will of a general power of appointment would make the appointed fund, which never was her separate property, liable. Even if it could be said to become her separate property by the appointment, this would only be at her death, long after the engagements were entered into, and, therefore, according to Pike v. Fitzgibbon, the appointed property could not be made liable. Suppose she had a general power to appoint by deed or will, and exercised it by deed to take effect from her death, would Lord Hardwicke's decision, to which I have referred, apply, and make the appointment void against her creditors, or rather make it an appointment for their benefit under 13 Eliz. c. 5? Or, suppose she survived her husband, and exercised the power by will after his death, would the property then become liable for her engagements during coverture? I think not, and these illustrations make the fallacy apparent. A married woman could not contract debts like a person completely sui juris, her engagements only bound her to the extent of her separate property at the time which might be reached by judgment and execution. It follows that when she exercised the general power, whether by deed or will, she had no debts which could be made available against it. In Vaughan v. Vanderstigen, 2 W. R. 293, 599, 2 Drew. 165, 363, where a married woman exercised a general power of appointment by will, it was held that the property was not liable for her engagements, because (p. 184) "a contract for the payment of money made by a married woman having separate estate, though called a debt, is only a debt sub modo." This was followed by Lord Romilly in Hobday v. Peters, 8 W. R. 512, 28 Beav. 354, where the power of appointment was by deed or will, but was exercised by will. The same point was decided in Blatchford v. Woolley, 11 W. R. 478, 2 Dr. & Sm. 204, and Shattock v. Shattock, 14 W. R. 600, L. R. 2 Eq. 182. The last case was dissented from in the judgment of the Privy Council in The London Chartered Bank of Australia v. Lempriere, 21 W. R. 513, L. R. 4 P. C. 572, upon the ground that Norton v. Turvill, 2 P. Wms. 144, Sockett v. Wray, 4 B. C. C. 483, Heatley v. Thomas, 15 Ves. 596, and Johnson v. Gallagher, 9 W. R. 506, 3 De G. F. & J. 513, had established that when a married woman, having a power of appointment by deed, gave a bond, that bond was payable out of the fund which was subject to the power. But it has recently been pointed out in In re Hastings, Hallett v. Hastings, 35 W. R. 135, 584, 35 Ch. D. 94, that these decisions proceeded upon a misapplication of Norton v. Turvill, which really decided that the bond was an exercise of the power of appointment—a doctrine which, as Turner, L.J., states in Johnson v. Gallagher, is now exploded. In In re Harvey's Estate, 28 W. R. 73, 13 Ch. D. 216, Hall, V.C., held that when the power was only by will, and was exercised, the property was liable for the appointor's debts. This last case seems to have been followed in Hodges v. Hodges, 30 W. R. 483, 20 Ch. D. 749.

In Mayd v. Field, 24 W. R. 660, 3 Ch. D. 587, the power was by deed or will, and, subject thereto, the property was settled to the separate use of the married woman for life, and if she survived her husband, which happened, to her absolutely. During her coverture she exercised her power by will. The property was treated by the late Sir George Jessel, M.R., as though it was altogether the separate property of the married woman—that is to say, that the corpus of property, which is settled to the general appointees by deed or will of a married woman, and in default of appointment to her separate use during her life, and if she survive her husband to her absolutely, was treated as her separate property in case she should so survive. Would it be her separate property if she did not survive, in which case the limitation was, I understand, to other persons? The separate use during her life would only enable her to bind her life interest; an engagement, though by bond, would not be an exercise of her power; the reversion, which was contingent on her surviving her husband, was not limited to her separate use. The cases relied on by the Master of the Rolls proceed upon a misapplication of the earlier decisions, which treated the bond of a married woman as an exercise of her power to appoint by deed. With respect to this it was decided by Lord Cottenham in Owens v. Dickenson, Cr. & Ph. 48, that a contract in writing of a married woman to pay a sum of £210 could not be treated as the execution of a power to appoint "by any deed or other instrument in writing," Lord Cottenham saying, "Now that document alone, within the authority of cases which have been decided, would have been operative upon her separate estate, but not by way of the execution of a power, although that has been an expression sometimes used, and, as I apprehend, very inaccurately used, in cases where the court has enforced the contracts of married women against their separate estate. It cannot be an execution of a power, because it neither refers to the power, nor to the subject-matter of the power, nor, indeed, in many of the cases has there been any power existing at all. Besides, as it was argued in the case of Murray v. Barlee, 3 My. & K. 209, if a married woman enters into several engagements of this sort, and all the parties come to have satisfaction out of her separate estate, they are paid pari passu; whereas, if the instruments took effect as appointments, they would rank according to the priorities of their dates. It is quite clear, therefore, that there is nothing in such a transaction which has any resemblance to the execution of a power." It was with reference to this decision that Turner, L.J., said in Johnson v. Gallagher, at p. 519, "The doctrine of appointment seems to me, however, to be exploded, and it is scarcely less clear that the transactions do not create any lien or charge on the separate estate," and he decided, as is well known, that the separate estate of a married woman is made liable for her engagements simply by a process of equitable execution—a decision which has settled the law upon the point, and has been acquiesced in ever since.

My opinion is that in cases not within the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, whether the power of appointment be by deed or will, or by will only, an appointment by the will of a married woman does not make the property appointed liable to engagements entered into with her on the credit of her separate estate. What may be the law as to cases falling within that Act I express no opinion save this, that to make property appointed by the will of a married woman liable to her engagements under that Act, it seems necessary to hold that the appointment by her will makes the property appointed her separate property, because it is only "all separate property which she may thereafter acquire" which is by that Act rendered liable.

In this case the powers of appointment were only by will, and, as the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 1, sub-section 4, do not apply, in my opinion the property appointed by her will is not subject to her engagements made during her coverture.

Bjorkman v. Kimberley. (a.)

Will — Construction—"Clear value"—Appointment—Residue—Gift of residue of specified fund—Legacy duty—Testamentary expenses.

The testatrix, in exercise of a general power of appointment under her marriage settlement, appointed that the trustees of the settlement should stand possessed of so much of the trust funds as should be "of the clear value of £1,000," in trust to pay the same to the trustees of her will, upon trust to pay the same to O. J. Vernon. After several other appointments in similar language, the will contained an appointment of "all the residue of the said trust funds." There was no direction for payment of debts, duty, or expenses, and no other property was disposed of.

Held, that the interposition of other trustees did not affect the question; that the word "clear" showed that the rule by which an appointment of the residue of a fund is held to be a gift of a definite sum, not of residue in the ordinary sense, did not apply; and that all the outgoings on the prior appointments must be discharged out of the part of the fund appointed as residue.

Adjourned summons.

The question was whether probate and legacy duty and testamentary expenses on certain portions of a trust fund appointed by the testatrix were payable out of those portions or out of the residue of the fund.

Under her marriage settlement the Hon. Mrs. E. E. Currie was entitled to a power of appointment over two sums of £10,256 3s. and £10,301 9s. 9d. to such person or persons, for such intents and purposes, in such proportions, and generally in such manner as she should by will or codicil direct.

(a.) Reported by H. C. Roper, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

She made her will on the 12th of April, 1871, and after reciting the power of appointment, in exercise of that power directed and appointed that from and after the death of her husband, or from such other time as her will should become operative or take effect in possession or relation thereto, the trustees of the settlement should stand possessed "of so much and such parts of the said trust funds as shall be of the clear value of £1,000 sterling in trust to pay and transfer the same into the names or name of John, Earl of Kimberley, and P. W. Currie" upon trust to pay or transfer the same to C. J. Vernon, but if he should die in her lifetime, then to his children. The testatrix then proceeded to appoint further specified sums forming part of the said trust funds in similar language, and directed and appointed that the trustees of the settlement should "stand and be possessed of all the residue of the said trust funds in trust to pay or transfer the same into the names or name of my trustees or trustee" upon trust for the plaintiff for life, and then for her children; and she appointed Lord Kimberley and P. W. Currie executors.

By a codicil of the 4th of January, 1872, the testatrix revoked one of the appointments made by her will, and directed and appointed that the trustees of the settlement should stand possessed of "so much of the trust funds as shall be of the clear value of £400 sterling in trust, to pay or transfer the same into the names or name of my trustees or trustee" upon trust to pay the same to the Archbishop of Westminster for the time being; and of so much as "shall be of the clear value of £50 sterling" in trust for other persons. There was no direction in the will or codicil for payment of debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses, or duty, nor any disposition of other property.

The testatrix died in 1873, and her husband in 1887. The whole of the trust funds subject to the settlement had been transferred to the trustees of the will, and they paid the above-mentioned pecuniary legacies, amounting to £5,050, and they also paid out of the funds appointed as residue, brokerage £20, legacy duty £298 14s. 7d., probate duty £663, law charges £132 5s. 2d., and £1,584 9s. 8d. as legacy duty on the residue.

The summons was taken out by the plaintiff to decide whether the trustees of the will were entitled to deduct these sums from the residue which had been appointed to her.

Ince, Q.C., and A. Young, for Mrs. Bjorkman, the residuary appointee.—This is not a gift of residue in the ordinary sense, and each of these legacies must bear its own proportion of the expenses. Ince, Q.C., replied.

Kay, J.—Mrs. Currie, a married woman, had under a settlement a general power of appointment over trust funds comprised in the settlement. She made her will, dated the 12th of April, 1871, whilst still a married woman, and after reciting the settlement she exercised her power of appointment and made no other disposition of any property at all. She exercised her power in this way. [His lordship referred to the will, and continued:—] There is no direction for payment of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, or legacy or probate duty, and if it were not for what I am going to point out it would seem primâ facie to be a case within the decision in Page v. Leapingwell—namely, a case in which certain definite portions of a definite fund are given to certain persons and then the residue of that fund is given to somebody else, and the doctrine of that case is that the sum thus described as residue is as much a definite sum as any other part of the fund, and that it is not residue in the ordinary sense. But in this case we have in each gift before the gift of residue the words "clear value," and the question is, What is the meaning of those words? The words of the gift are:—[His lordship read them, and continued:—] I think the interposition of her own trustees has nothing to do with the matter at all. It is just the same as if she had directed the trustees of the settlement to stand possessed of these funds upon these trusts. It is said that the word "clear" only means clear of expenses which the trustees of the settlement would have had the right to deduct. But is that so? The fund will not be clear if it is to be subject to probate and legacy duty and the testamentary expenses of the testatrix, but it will fall far short of £1,000. Could she possibly mean to clear it of one deduction and not of another? I am reading her will, and I must take it to mean that C. J. Vernon is to take a sum of the clear value of £1,000. That was her intention, and I have no right to say she meant to clear it of one thing more than another. I must take her to have been aware that there would be other things which might come out of this legacy under the appointment, and because she made this appointment, and in this way disposed of it. But for this direction that it should be clear it would not come to the hands of the appointee of the clear value of £1,000. I read the word clear as expressing an intention that each of these sums should come to the respective appointees clear of any outgoings, not merely under the settlement, but those to which it would otherwise be subject under the provisions of her will. That includes probate and legacy duty and testamentary expenses. Out of what are these outgoings to come? She does not speak of the residue as a clear fund, but she gives it simply as residue. Therefore, where the appointor of a fund gives £1,000 to one person and the residue of the fund to another, and directs that the £1,000 shall be clear, it can only be done by reducing the residue. Whether the word "residue" in this will is to be construed as meaning residue for all purposes I do not now decide. It may be that the word clear may throw upon this which is called residue the payment of debts and testamentary expenses, but yet that it does not include a lapsed share of the fund. There might be a very good argument on that point, but it does not arise here. I see on the face of the will that it was her intention that each sum should be clear of these payments, and that the residue should be reduced accordingly.

Now let me see what the authorities are. The early case of Haynes v. Haynes is an instance that the word clear is sufficient to exonerate a legacy from the payment of duty and so on.

It is said that Day v. Turnell is an authority for holding that the word "clear" must be confined to clearing the share of expenses under the settlement, and that, when the fund came into the hands of the trustees of the will, it then for the first time became liable to probate and legacy duty and testamentary expenses, and that the word "clear" does not mean clear from those duties. But that case seems to me to have nothing to do with the matter. Higgins covenanted to pay to the trustees of a settlement, during his life or within twelve months after his death, £10,000 free from all deductions whatever. He died without payment, and his executors paid it. The Crown claimed succession duty, and the question was whether the trustees of the settlement could recover that, not from the covenantor, but from the executors, and it was held that they could not, because the covenant had been actually performed, so far as the covenantor was concerned, in paying the £10,000, and the liability did not attach till afterwards. It was not the case of a will directing that a sum should be paid clear, and in which the word "clear" must mean clear of everything payable under the will, it was a covenant by the settlor with the trustees, and the succession duty never attached at all till the £10,000 came into the hands of the trustees. That has nothing to do with the will before me. I must hold that, by force of the word "clear," the part of the fund appointed as residue must pay all the outgoings which might otherwise come from these particular appointed shares. The costs must come out of the residue.

Barton v. North Staffordshire Railway Co. (a.)

Company—Forged transfer of stock—Statute of Limitations—When time begins to run—Executors joint holders of stock—Right of one to transfer—Estoppel of one joint holder—Right of other to sue.

One of two executors and trustees of a will sold out certain railway stock, which stood in their joint names as executors, by means of deeds of transfer to which he forged the name of his co-executor and trustee. In an action by the latter to compel the railway company to replace the stock,

Held, that the claim was not barred by reason of more than six years having elapsed since the date of the transfers, as time began to run, not from that date, but from the refusal of the company, when the forgery was made known to them, to treat the plaintiff as shareholder.

Held, also, that stock registered in the names of two executors could not be transferred by one of them, nor was such a transfer good as to one moiety of the stock.

Held, also, that the fact that one of the two joint owners of the stock was estopped from denying the validity of the forged transfers did not prevent the other from maintaining the action.

Trial of action.

The action was brought by the trustees of a will to have it declared that certain transfers of stock in the defendant company were invalid on the ground that the signatures of one of the alleged transferors to the deeds of transfer was forged; and for an order on the company to register the plaintiffs as the owners of such stock. On the evidence the court came to the conclusion that the forgery was established.

The stock in question formed part of the estate of S. Barton, of which he had appointed his widow, Ann Barton, and his son, T. Barton, to be trustees and executors. They both proved the will shortly after S. Barton's death in 1870, produced the probate to the railway company, and had the stock registered in their names as executors of S. Barton. The dividends were received by T. Barton, who accounted for them to the persons entitled thereto. In 1885 Ann Barton discovered that at various dates between 1880 and 1882 the whole of the stock had been transferred by T. Barton by means of transfers to which he forged her signature. In July, 1886, T. Barton absconded, and in December the action was brought by Ann Barton and a new trustee who had been appointed in place of T. Barton.

The company, by their defence, as to such of the transfers as had been made more than six years before action brought, pleaded the Statute of Limitations; also that the execution of the transfer deeds by one of the two executors was sufficient to transfer the stock, or to pass one moiety thereof; and the further question is dealt with in the judgment, whether the fact that T. Barton would have been estopped from saying that the transfers were nullities affected the claim by Ann Barton.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 15.—Kay, J., after stating his conclusion from the evidence that Ann Barton's signature to the deeds of transfer had been forged by T. Barton, went on to say:—The real claim of the plaintiffs is to be treated by the railway company as shareholders. They say, and I agree with the contention, that the forged transfers must be considered as nullities. One defence raised by amendment is a plea of the Statute of Limitations. The actual plaintiffs are Ann Barton and Mrs. Ashe, who was appointed her co-trustee by the deed of the 1st of July, 1886, in the place of T. Barton. This suit was instituted on the 10th of December, 1886, more than six years after most of the attempted dealings with the stock. It is settled that after a partnership has ended any claim on simple contract by one former partner against the others in respect thereof is, prima facie, subject to be barred after the expiration of six years: Knox v. Gye. On the other hand, while a partnership is continuing there is no authority for suggesting that a claim between the partners is affected by the statute, and the opinion of Lindley, L.J., is to the contrary: Lindley on Partnership, 4th ed., p. 966. In a case of exclusion time would begin to run from the act of exclusion. B has been argued in this case that if a partner does not draw his share of profits or act as partner for six years, he, at the end of that time, loses all remedy against his co-partners, and therefore practically ceases to be a partner. And it is urged that, this being the case as to a partnership, the analogy ought to be followed in railway companies and other trading corporations, and that a shareholder who makes no claim for six years has no remedy in respect of his share against the company. If this be so, any such company might direct that after six years' silence a pen should be drawn through the shareholder's name on the register, and he would practically cease to be a member of the corporation. And, in answer to a question from the court, the argument was pressed to this extent. Such a conclusion shows that there must be a fallacy in the premises. I know of no authority for saying that a partner who does nothing for six years loses all remedies against his co-partners. Time only begins to run against him from an act of exclusion. If the analogy be applicable, there must be a similar act in the case of a shareholder to enable the company to avail itself of the statute against him. Nothing of the kind took place here until the resistance by the company to the claim made in this action. The cause of action is, not the invalid transfers of the shares in question, but the refusal of the company, when the forgery was made known to them, to treat the plaintiffs as shareholders. It is an elementary principle that time does not begin to run until there is a complete cause of action, and there was no complete cause of action in this case until such refusal.

In Davis v. The Bank of England there is a judgment of Best, C.J., in which the question of the Statute of Limitations in a similar case is considered. The facts of that case somewhat resembled the present. Certain sums of Consols and other Government securities standing in the name of the plaintiff had been sold under forged powers of attorney. The plaintiff sued the Bank of England in an action on the case for permitting the transfer without his authority, and for refusing to pay him dividends. The action was brought within six years from the date of the sales, so that no decision on the question of the Statute of Limitations was necessary, but in the judgment Best, C.J., said: "We cannot do justice to the plaintiff unless we hold that the stocks are still his. Another consequence of the stocks being considered as transferred will be most alarming to those who live at a distance from London, and receive their dividends by attorney—namely, that their claim to compensation, in case their stocks should be transferred without their authority, may be barred by the Statute of Limitations." Later on he says: "If the plaintiff's action had been founded on the concealment of the forgeries, it could not have been supported, but the action is founded on the refusal of the bank to pay on demand the dividends of the plaintiff due on stocks belonging to him," and judgment was given for the plaintiff accordingly.

That decision was reversed in error upon the ground that there was no allegation in the declaration and no finding in the verdict that the bank ever had received the dividends from the Government, but the judgment of Best, C.J., has not been considered as affected by such reversal: Coles v. Bank of England and Sloman v. Bank of England.

Then it was suggested that, Thomas Barton and Ann Barton being co-executors, one of them alone could have transferred the stock which was registered in the names of both. No authority for this proposition was cited, and I am clearly of opinion that, whatever the powers of executors may be as to other property vested in them in that character, they have no such power as to railway shares or stock, which are governed by the Companies Clauses Act. With respect to these their rights and liabilities as between themselves and the company are the same as those of other shareholders, and the company is expressly exonerated by section 20 from being bound to see to the execution of any trust. The next argument was that if they are to be treated as joint holders of the stock the transfers must be good as to one moiety, because it is not denied that they were executed by Thomas Barton. This was answered by the late Vice-Chancellor of England in Sloman v. The Bank of England. If the transfers were good as to one half the other half would remain in the names of the two, and he might then transfer one moiety of that, and so on until the residuum was infinitesimal.

Another consideration, which was not pressed at the bar, but which I cannot overlook, is that it may be said that this action is practically brought by Thomas Barton, as one of the co-plaintiffs. Mrs. Ashe has been appointed a trustee in his place. Of course she is not executrix of Samuel Barton, but she and Ann Barton are suing as co-trustees of the will, and, as far as the legal interests in this stock are concerned, the suit may be said to be the same as a suit by or in the names of Thomas and Ann Barton. One of two joint owners having forged the name of the other to transfers, the two then come and say those transfers are nullities. Doubtless they are; but could Thomas Barton be heard to say so, and, if not, how does this estoppel affect Ann Barton? I apprehend that the answer is that in equity Ann Barton has sufficient interest to enable her to sue, making Thomas Barton a defendant. Of course, if he were here, the company might have remedies against him personally—criminal and civil. But at the suit of Ann Barton they could not deny that the stock had not been validly transferred. This seems to have been taken for granted in more than one case.

In Sloman v. Bank of England Government stock standing in the names of two trustees was sold by one of them under a forged power of attorney. The bill was filed by the other trustee and the beneficiaries, suggesting that the only remedy was in equity, for if an action had been brought it must have been in the joint names of the two trustees, one of whom had fraudulently sold the stock. It was held by the Vice-Chancellor of England that relief could be had in equity, because the other trustee could say against the bank: "Stock stood in my name, and I have not authorized the transfer of it. You are responsible to me"—that is to say, "You must make the account stand as it ought to have stood."

And in Taylor v. The Midland Railway, where stock of the Midland Railway Co. standing in the names of Taylor and Bright was attempted to be transferred by Bright by a deed of transfer to which he forged the name of Taylor, after Taylor's death his legal personal representatives were held entitled to recover his share of the stock against the railway company. And this was affirmed in the House of Lords (10 W. R. 382, 8 H. L. Cas. 751), and it was distinctly decided that there was a right to sue in equity, even if the right at law was gone by the death of Taylor in the lifetime of Bright.

It was suggested that the pleadings should be amended by allowing a counter-claim, on the ground that the money for the purchase of the shares was properly paid to Thomas Barton as one of two executors. The answer is obvious. The money was not paid by the railway company, but by the purchasers of the shares. They are not parties, and I am not dealing with their rights in any way. Another answer is that, if the railway company could make any claim to this money, that claim must be made against Thomas Barton, not against the estate of the late Samuel Barton. The claim must proceed upon an admission that the money was obtained by forgery and fraud. How could the estate be made liable for it? I cannot permit such an amendment. The defence as actually framed denies the forgery, and also pleads that the loss has been occasioned by the negligence of Ann Barton. This latter point was not insisted on at the bar, and, I think, properly, for it seems to me that no such case of negligence is established by the evidence. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs have made out their case and are entitled to a declaration that the alleged transfers were invalid by reason of the forgery of the name of Ann Barton as a person executing the same, and the railway company must be ordered to register the plaintiffs as owners of the shares. No doubt the matter deserved the closest investigation, and it was quite natural that the railway company should desire to have it formally tried. But the present plaintiffs are, I think, free from all blame, and, as my opinion upon all the points raised is in their favour, I think they are entitled to judgment, with costs. I observe that the costs were given to the plaintiff in Sloman v. The Bank of England.

WARING v. SCOTLAND. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Agreement for sale of "interest in a lease"—Title shown to an under-lease.

A vendor agreed to sell "all his interest in the lease held by him of Verulam Church." It turned out that the vendor only had a title to an under-lease for a term less by three days than the term granted by the original lease.

Held, that the purchaser could not, on that ground, refuse to complete.

Madeley v. Booth, 2 De G. & Sm. 718, distinguished.

Further consideration.

This was the further consideration of an action by a vendor to enforce specific performance of an agreement to purchase a lease.

By the agreement, which was dated the 15th of August, 1885, the committee of Verulam Church, Kennington-road, Surrey, agreed to purchase from Dr. Waring "all his interest in the lease held by him of Verulam Church for the sum of £550." The purchasers refused to complete the contract, and this action was brought by Dr. Waring for specific performance of the agreement.

The plaintiff, by his statement of claim, alleged that he held the property "for a term of ninety-three years and a quarter from the 25th of December, 1824, under a lease dated the 24th of March, 1825."

At the trial of the action an inquiry was directed whether a good title could be made to the premises comprised in the agreement, and the further hearing of the action was adjourned.

The chief clerk found that a good title "can be made to a derivative term of ninety-three and a quarter years from the 25th of December, 1824, less three days, created by an indenture dated the 5th of June, 1841, and transferred by an indenture dated the 4th of August, 1846."

The deed of the 5th of June, 1841, was a mortgage of the property by way of underlease for the original term, less the last three days thereof, and the mortgagee afterwards sold the property under his power of sale.

D. L. Alexander, for the plaintiff.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Gregson, for the defendants.—A vendor of a lease who only shows a title to an underlease cannot enforce specific performance: Madeley v. Booth, 2 De G. & Sm. 718. No doubt in Camberwell and South London Building Society v. Holloway, 28 W. R. 222, 13 Ch. D. 754, Jessel, M.R., expressed his disapproval of Madeley v. Booth. The latter case, however, has never been overruled, and is a binding authority.

Alexander in reply.—The vendor in the present case only agreed to sell "his interest in the lease"; he did not agree to sell the lease. This case is, therefore, distinguishable from Madeley v. Booth.

NORTH, J.—I am of opinion that, by reason of the use of the words "all the interest of the vendor in the lease held by him," the present case is distinguishable from Madeley v. Booth. I therefore overrule the purchasers' objection to the title.

COOKE v. COOKE. (a.)

Will—Construction—Appointment—Absolute interest—Void restriction—Settlement—Infant—Ratification.

By three marriage settlements made in 1834 power was given to the intended husband and wife, or the survivor of them, by deed or by will, to appoint the settled property among the children of the intended marriage. There were three daughters, one unmarried and two married. The wife died without having joined in making any appointment, and the husband, by his will, appointed the property among the three daughters equally, subject to the proviso that the share of any daughter who should be unmarried at his decease should be held in trust for her for life for her separate use, and after her decease, as to capital and income, in case she should leave children, in trust for such persons as she should appoint, and in default of appointment or if she should not leave issue upon trust in favour of the other children. The unmarried daughter remained single at her father's death.

Held, that she was entitled to her share absolutely, the proviso being void for remoteness and inseverable.

By one of the three settlements made in 1834, to which the father and mother of the intended wife, the intended husband, and the intended wife—who was then an infant—were parties, the father and mother of the intended wife agreed, and the intended husband covenanted, that the husband and wife would, on her attaining twenty-one, convey the wife's reversionary freehold to the trustees upon the trusts of the settlement. In 1836 the husband and wife—the latter having attained twenty-one—conveyed the freehold to the trustees.

Held, that, for the purpose of the rule against perpetuities, the real estate was settled and the power of appointment conferred in 1834.

By a settlement dated the 31st of March, 1834, and made in consideration of the marriage then intended, and shortly afterwards solemnized, between Isaac Allen Cooke and Mary Ann Cole Wathen, an infant, a third share of two sums of £700 and £4,000 Consols to which Mary Ann Cole Wathen was entitled in reversion, and also two sums of £2,000 each, and an annuity of £[illegible] from her father, were settled in trust, after the death of the intended husband and wife, to pay the same, and all dividends, interest, and annual proceeds, "unto the children or to all or such of the children of the said intended marriage, and in such parts, shares, and proportions, if the appointment shall be in favour of more than one, and

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

at such ages or times, and with such provisions for maintenance, with such restrictions, and generally in such manner and form as they, the said Isaac Allan Cooke and Mary Ann Cole Wathen, his intended wife, or the survivor of them, shall by any deed or deeds, instrument or instruments in writing, duly executed in the presence of and attested by one, two, or more credible witness or witnesses, or the survivor of them, by his or her last will and testament, duly executed in the presence of and attested by one, two, or more credible witness or witnesses, limit, direct, or appoint the same."

By another settlement of the same date, George Wathen and Sarah, his wife, the father and mother of the intended wife, in consideration of the intended marriage and of the settlements agreed and declared, and Isaac Allan Cooke, the intended husband, consented, promised, and agreed with the trustees of the settlement, that in case the marriage should take place, they, Isaac Allan Cooke and Mary Ann Cole Wathen, would, immediately after Mary Ann Cole Wathen should have attained the age of twenty-one years, convey and assure to the trustees, subject to the life estates therein of George Wathen and Sarah, his wife, the moiety or other the part or share of Mary Ann Cole Wathen of and in certain freehold and leasehold hereditaments upon the trusts of the settlement, which included a power of appointment similar to that in the previous settlement.

By another settlement of the same date, and made in consideration of the same marriage, certain personal property of Isaac Allan Cooke was settled upon trust for the intended husband and wife successively for life, with a power for the husband and wife by deed, or the survivor by deed or will, to appoint the corpus among the children of the intended marriage in terms similar to those of the power of appointment contained in the first-mentioned settlement, and set out above.

Mary Ann Cole Wathen, although under age, was expressed to be a party to and executed each of the three settlements. The marriage took place in 1834, and Margaret Cooke, the eldest child, was born on the 16th of March, 1835.

Mrs. Cooke attained twenty-one; and by an indenture dated the 5th of October, 1836, indorsed on the first of the three settlements she and her husband assigned to the trustees of the settlement her reversionary third share in the two sums of £700 and £4,000 to be held upon the trusts of the settlement.

Also by another indenture of the same date indorsed on the second settlement, Mr. and Mrs. Cooke granted and assigned to the trustees of the settlement her reversionary freehold and leasehold property respectively, to be held upon the trusts of the settlement.

Mrs. Cooke died in January, 1863, leaving three children of the marriage, Margaret Cooke, Agnes, the wife of Arthur Richard Lewis Whish, and Georgina Mildred, the wife of Maitland Moore Lane. No joint appointment among the children of the marriage was made by Mr. and Mrs. Cooke under the powers given by the settlements.

Isaac Allan Cooke died in 1874, having by his will, dated the 21st of September, 1872, provided as follows: "Now in exercise of the power so reserved to me by the said three several indentures respectively, and of any other power or powers respectively enabling me in this behalf, I hereby direct and appoint that all and singular the said freehold and leasehold hereditaments and premises, and the moneys and the securities representing the same if sold, and all other the said moneys, stocks, funds, and securities comprised in the said three several indentures, or either of them, shall go to and be vested in my three surviving children of the said marriage—namely, Margaret Cooke, Agnes, the wife of Arthur Richard Lewis Whish, and Georgina Mildred, the wife of Maitland Moore Lane, in equal shares and proportions, subject, nevertheless, as to the share of either of my said children who may be unmarried at the time of my decease, to the proviso and declaration next hereinafter contained, that is to say: Provided, and I hereby expressly declare, that in case either of my said three surviving children shall be unmarried at the time of my decease, the share of such unmarried child shall be held by the trustees or trustee of this my will upon trust to pay the income and annual proceeds thereof from the day of my decease unto such unmarried child during her life for her separate use, independently of any husband with whom she may intermarry, without power of anticipation, for which income and annual proceeds her receipt in writing shall be sufficient discharge; and from and after the decease of such unmarried child, as to as well her share and the income and annual proceeds thereof, in case the said unmarried child shall die leaving issue, upon trust for such person or persons, and for such purposes, as such unmarried child, covert or sole, shall by will appoint. And in default of appointment upon such trusts and with such power equally in favour of my other children or child as shall correspond with the preceding trusts and power in favour of such unmarried child; but if such unmarried child shall die without leaving issue, then upon the same trusts and with the same power as are hereinbefore declared in the event of the said unmarried child dying leaving issue and without having exercised the power of appointment in that case given."

This was an originating summons by Margaret Cooke for, among other things, a declaration that she was absolutely entitled as one of the appointees under her father's will to one-third of the property comprised in the settlement. The two other daughters of the testator with their husbands and the surviving trustee of the settlement were the defendants.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff takes an absolute interest under the appointment, the limitation cutting down the interest being void for remoteness; and the contingent life interests of the other daughters, being inseparably mixed up with the void limitation, are also void: Morgan v. Gronow, L. R. 16 Eq. 1, 21 W. R. Dig. 176; Berrie v. Howitt, W. N., 1867, p. 128. If, as has been suggested, the settlement of the real estate of Mrs. Cooke must be considered to date from the 5th of October, 1836, when the property was granted to the trustees by her after attaining twenty-one, and after the birth of the plaintiff, then the limitation cutting down her estate would not be void for remoteness. But the settlement was only voidable at the date of its execution, not void, and, on being confirmed by Mrs. Cooke when of age, took effect from the 31st of March, 1834: Smith v. Lucas, 30 W. R. 451, 18 Ch. D. 531; Burnaby v. Equitable Reversionary Interest Society, 33 W. R. 639, 28 Ch. D. 416.

Cookson Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Townsend, for the two other daughters.—The contingent life interests of the other daughters are separable from the limitation, and are valid: Whittell v. Dudin, 2 Jac. & W. 279; Carver v. Bowles, 2 Russ. & My. 301, 306; Churchill v. Churchill, 16 W. R. 182, L. R. 5 Eq. 44; Jarman on Wills, 4th ed., p. 872; Carr v. Atkinson, 20 W. R. 620, L. R. 14 Eq. 397; Webb v. Sadler, 21 W. R. 394, L. R. 8 Ch. 419; Slack v. Dakyns, 23 W. R. 118, L. R. 10 Ch. 35; Williamson v. Farwell, 35 Ch. D. 128, 35 W. R. Dig. 151. The settlement of the wife's real estate must be regarded as taking effect from the 5th of October, 1836. The wife being a married woman who could not contract could not confirm it on that date; but the conveyance of that date by her was a conveyance de novo: Morgan v. Gronow; Berrie v. Howitt; Buckmaster v. Buckmaster, 35 W. R. 25, 35 Ch. D. 21.

George Foster Cooke, for the surviving trustee.

North, J.—There are two points for decision in this case. The first is as to the construction of the will of Isaac Allan Cooke, the surviving husband, who, by his will, recites the powers he had under the three settlements, and then proceeds:—[His lordship read the terms of the appointment set out above to his three daughters absolutely, and continued:—] Stopping there, there would be no question that the effect of that appointment was that the daughters took in equal shares absolutely. But it is said that what follows cuts down the effect of that gift in respect of the plaintiff's share. What follows is this:—"Subject nevertheless as to the share of either of my said children who may be unmarried at the time of my decease to the proviso and declaration next hereinafter contained." That is the only qualification imposed upon the previous absolute gift. The testator had three daughters, one unmarried and two married; and I think he was there referring to the possibility, not only of the unmarried daughter remaining unmarried, but also of one or more of his daughters being a widow or widows, and that he conceived the possibility of something happening which would render it desirable that the subsequent direction should apply to the share of any daughter unmarried at the time of his death, and there is this contingent provision possibly applicable to all or any of the shares. Unless the contingency happens the shares remain absolute. The proviso is as follows:—[His lordship read the proviso set out above in the testator's will as to the share of either of the daughters who may be unmarried at his death.] The testator proceeds in a particular event to impose a restriction on the enjoyment of the shares. It is not disputed that the effect of the restriction would be to tie up the shares longer than the rules against perpetuity allow. That being so, what becomes of the property in the case of the plaintiff's share? Is it undisposed of; or do the trusts of the other children's life interest take effect; or does the gift to the three in equal shares and proportions prevail so that the plaintiff gets her share absolutely? In my opinion the last is the right construction. A few cases have been referred to out of a very large number on this point. The rule, as I understand it, is, that where there is an absolute gift followed by an attempt to limit the effect of that gift, which limitation for some reason cannot take effect, the original gift will take effect; but if on the true construction there is no original gift, independently of the void limitation, you cannot sever the gift into two parts, and the whole gift fails.

I do not think it worth while to refer to the cases. But Whittell v. Dudin is one of those cases which has been recognized as an authority by the subsequent cases, including Lassence v. Tierney, 1 Mac. & G. 551, in which the Lord Chancellor refers to Whittell v. Dudin as a case in which a rule had been expounded, and says: "Carver v. Bowles, 2 Russ. & My. 301, and Kampf v. Jones, 2 Keen, 756, which was founded upon it, were cases of the execution of powers in which there were absolute appointments within the powers and attempts to modify the enjoyment beyond the powers; and it was held that the absolute appointments were to prevail."

In the present case I do not doubt that the testator did not intend the plaintiff to take absolutely under the first gift, because he goes on to engraft on the gift to her subsequent limitations, but as those limitations are illegal they cannot be allowed to prevail, and the absolute gift to her must take effect, unaffected by them.

That disposes of the case in respect of all the property except the funds representing Mrs. Cooke's interest in the freehold. As to that, the matter stands in this way. The settlement was made in 1834, and the plaintiff was born in 1835. Mrs. Cooke, having attained twenty-one, ratified the settlement in 1836. The settlement itself was not a covenant to settle after-acquired property, but it was an agreement by the father and mother of the intended wife, in consideration of the intended marriage and the several settlements, and a covenant by the intended husband that in case the marriage should take effect the husband and wife would, immediately after she should attain twenty-one, convey her freehold reversionary property to the trustees of the settlement. Therefore they were dealing, not with after-acquired property, but with property which at that time did belong to the lady, who was an infant, but was under no incapacity except infancy. It is said that that settlement of freeholds was absolutely void. I know of no ground for saying so. To hold that it was would be to go against Smith v. Lucas. The settlement was valid unless avoided by her afterwards. It was voidable, but it never was avoided. It remained binding until 1836, when she executed a deed in which her husband concurred, and which was duly acknowledged, and was intended to be a confirmation of the settlement, whatever the legal effect of it was. That may depend in some respects on its terms, but no one can read it without seeing that the very thing they did intend to do was to confirm the settlement.

In my opinion the estate was bound already by the agreement, which was voidable and not void, and Mrs. Cooke did, by confirming it, do everything that was required to make the settlement binding. I think that she could make a conveyance in favour of the trustees just as much as to anybody else, and I hold that for the purpose of the rule against perpetuities the power over the real estate was conferred at the date of the marriage settlement.

But it is said that at the time the confirmation was made the wife was under coverture, and could not confirm the original settlement, and could only by deed duly acknowledged convey her real estate. That I do not understand. The argument seems to be that she could deal with her real estate in favour of anybody, subject to this—that the only persons to whom she could not convey were the trustees to whom she had agreed to convey.

Chan. Div. Stirling, J. March 7, 8, 15.

Roots v. Williamson. (a.)

Company — Shares — Transfer — Inchoate legal title — Pre-existing equitable title.

The plaintiff, a married woman living apart from her husband, purchased, out of moneys belonging to her for her separate use, 175 shares in the W. L. A. Co., which were transferred to, and registered in the name of, the defendant W., who held as trustee for the plaintiff for her separate use.

In February, 1886, W. executed a transfer of seventy-five of the plaintiff's shares to the defendants H. and A., leaving blanks for the date and the consideration, which he sent to them, together with the certificates of the shares as a security for a debt due from his firm.

On the 5th of May the defendants H. and A. filled in the blank for the consideration with five shillings, and that for date with the 4th of May; and, on the 6th of May, the transfer, together with the certificates, was sent to the company for registration. Immediately on the receipt of the transfer, the manager of the company wrote to the plaintiff informing her of the fact that thereupon instituted the present action to restrain the defendants H. and A. from dealing with the shares.

The deed of settlement by which the company was originally constituted provided (clause 5) that no person claiming to be the proprietor of any share by transfer should be entitled to be treated or recognized as such unless and until he should have been registered in the register of shareholders as the proprietor of the shares; (clause 6) that no person should be entitled to be registered in the register of shareholders as the proprietor of any share unless and until he should, by the execution of settlement or some deed referring thereto, have undertaken all the liabilities, duties, and obligations of a shareholder in respect of such share; and (clause 14) that it should be essential to the legal validity of a transfer that the deed by which it was effected should be deposited or left at the office of the company.

Held, that the defendants H. and A. had not shown a legal title in themselves, or (as between themselves and the company) an absolute and unconditional right to be registered as shareholders in the place of the defendant W., but that their title was inchoate only, and therefore insufficient to defeat the prior equitable title of the plaintiff.

Trial of action.

The plaintiff was a married woman living apart from her husband.

In 1876 she purchased, for the sum of £496, part of her separate estate, 175 shares of £10 each in the Whittington Life Assurance Co., and the shares were registered in the name of A. M. Waller, as trustee for the plaintiff, for her separate use.

The Whittington Life Assurance Co. was originally formed under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, but was subsequently registered under the Companies Act, 1862.

In March, 1880, Waller, at the request of the plaintiff, transferred the shares to Williamson as trustee for the plaintiff for her separate use.

On the 12th of April, 1881, the plaintiff gave to Williamson the following written authority:—

"I hereby authorize Mr. G. S. Williamson, of East Dulwich, to dispose of the whole or part of the 175 shares he holds on my behalf in the Whittington Life Assurance Co.

(Signed) "E. M. Roots."

On the 9th of August, 1883, Williamson, at the request of the plaintiff, gave to her an I O U for £496, the original price of the shares.

Williamson was a member of the firm of Williamson & Nelson, who carried on business in Wood-street, in the City of London, and in January, 1886, the firm were indebted on a current account to the defendants Hodgkinson & Arnold to the amount of £200.

Early in February, 1886, Williamson executed a transfer of seventy-five of the plaintiff's shares to Hodgkinson and Arnold, which he sent to them with the certificates of the shares as security for the debt of his firm.

The transfer was in a printed form, and was substantially in accordance with the forms required by the deed of settlement, except that the final clause was omitted and it contained no reference to the deed of settlement.

The blanks for the date and the consideration were not filled up.

On the 6th of April, 1886, the plaintiff wrote to the manager of the company a letter stating that Williamson held the shares in trust for her, and asking whether the shares could be transferred either to herself or to her daughter. To this the manager replied on the 29th of April to the effect that the shares must be transferred by Williamson and could not be transferred to the plaintiff, but might be transferred to her daughter.

On the 4th or 5th of May the defendants Hodgkinson and Arnold executed the transfer, the blanks for consideration being filled up with 5s., and that for date with the 4th of May, and on the 6th of May Messrs. Fernyhough & Ashe, who were brokers in Manchester and acted on behalf of Hodgkinson and Arnold, sent the transfer along with the certificates to the company for registration.

Immediately on receipt of the transfer the manager of the company wrote on the 7th of May to the plaintiff informing her of the fact, and on the same day he wrote to Fernyhough & Ashe to the effect that he had notified the plaintiff of the transfer, and awaited her reply or action before submitting the transfer to the board for approval.

On the 10th of May the plaintiff commenced this action to assert her title to the shares. The action was originally against Williamson alone, and on the 3rd of May an injunction was obtained against him. Subsequently the company were made parties, but on the 20th of May proceedings were stayed against them upon their undertaking not to register the transfer and to deal with the shares and certificates as the court should direct. Hodgkinson and Arnold were then added as parties, and on the 27th of May an interlocutory injunction was obtained restraining them from dealing with the seventy-five shares and from completing or allowing to be completed any transfer of or dealings with the said shares or any portion thereof except to the plaintiff.

4. "That every person who shall from time to time be or appear registered as the proprietor of any share in the register of shareholders to be kept for the purposes of the company pursuant to the said Act shall, unless and until his share shall, by operation of law or otherwise conformably to the provisions herein contained, become vested in some other person, be treated and recognized by the company, so far as is consistent with the provisions of the said Act, as the lawful and rightful proprietor of such share, although in fact he may have been improperly so registered, and no other person claiming or entitled to be the proprietor of such share shall have any claim against the company in respect thereof, but only against the person who shall be registered and his representatives."

5. "That no person claiming to be the proprietor of any share, whether by original subscription, purchase, transfer, operation of law, or otherwise, shall be entitled to be treated or recognized as such as between himself and the company, or to transfer his share, unless and until he shall have been registered in the register of shareholders aforesaid as the proprietor of such share; provided, nevertheless, that this provision shall not operate so as to release any person from any agreement or engagement on his part to become the proprietor of share in the company or from any liability or obligation in respect of any agreement or engagement."

6. "That no person other than the legal personal representative of any deceased shareholder, or the husband of any deceased shareholder, or the husband of any female shareholder, or the assignee of any bankrupt or insolvent shareholder, shall be entitled to be registered in the register of shareholders as the proprietor of any share unless and until he shall, by his execution of these presents or some deed referring thereto, have undertaken all the liabilities, duties, and obligations of a shareholder in respect of such share."

13. "That the company shall in no case be in anywise bound to notice any trust, lien, charge, incumbrance, or equitable right or interest affecting any share distinct from the legal title thereto."

14. "That" (with certain exceptions) "every transfer of shares shall be effected by deed which, when executed, shall be deposited or left at the office and remain in the custody of the company, and such deed shall be according to the form A. contained in the schedule hereto or to the like effect."

Form A. was as follows:—

This indenture, made between of the one part and of the other part, witnesseth that in consideration of the sum of paid to me by the said , do hereby transfer to the said shares, numbered , in the undertaking called "The Whittington Life Assurance Co.," to hold unto the said , his executors, administrators, and assigns (or successors and assigns), subject to the several conditions on which I hold the same at the time of the execution hereof; and I, the said , do hereby agree to take the said shares subject to the same conditions and to the provisions of the deed or deeds of settlement of the said company.

As witness our hands and seals the day of .

Signed, sealed, and delivered by the above-named in the presence of .

By clause 121 it was provided (inter alia) as follows:—"The word shareholder shall be taken to mean any person who shall or may become a proprietor or owner of any share in the company either by subscription, purchase, or bequest, marriage, operation of law, or other means whatsoever, and whose names shall for the time being be registered in the register of shareholders hereinbefore mentioned as the present proprietor of such share."

Cur. adv. vult.

March 15.—STIRLING, J. (after stating the facts as above, continued as follows:—) The question to be decided is whether the title of the plaintiff to the seventy-five shares, or that of the defendants Hodgkinson and Arnold is to prevail. Under the circumstances which I have stated the plaintiff had unquestionably in the first instance a clear equitable title to the shares registered in the name of Williamson. That title was, however, liable to be defeated by a legal title obtained through transfer; and it might also be defeated by such conduct or representations on the part of plaintiff as, to use the words of Lord Cairns, "would operate and cause to forfeit and take away the pre-existing equitable title": Shropshire Union Railway Co. v. Reg.

It has been contended for the defendants Hodgkinson and Arnold that the documents of the 12th of April, 1881, and the 9th of August, 1883, have the effect of creating in their favour and as against the plaintiff such a prior and countervailing equity. I am unable, however, to see how this can be. These defendants did not deal with Williamson on the faith of these documents; and even if they had so done I do not think they were entitled by virtue of them to take the shares as a security for the antecedent debt of Williamson. There is a wide difference between taking the shares as security for an advance and taking them as security for an antecedent debt. In the former case Williamson would be presumed to be acting on behalf of the plaintiff and within the scope of his authority; in the latter he would, primâ facie at least, be taken to act on his own behalf, and contrary to the authority conferred on him by the plaintiff.

The real question is, Whether Hodgkinson and Arnold have, by the transfer, acquired such a legal estate as to defeat the pre-existing equitable title of the plaintiff? It was contended, in the first place, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the transfer was materially altered after the execution of it by Williamson, and so became void, and ceased to be a deed within the meaning of the clauses of the deed of settlement relating to transfer. I think it unnecessary to express any opinion on this point, and assume (without deciding) that the transfer was a valid and effectual deed when it was sent to the company on the 6th of May, 1886. It was further contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendants Hodgkinson and Arnold had not, at the time when notice of the plaintiff's claim was given to the company, and have not since had, and have not now, a complete legal title to these shares, and both in support of, and in opposition to, this contention the case of The Société Générale de Paris v. Walker was much relied on. In that case the articles of association provided (26) that shares should be transferable only by deed executed by the transferor and transferee, and duly entered in the register of transfer; and (32) that a person should not be registered as the transferee of a share until the instrument of transfer, duly executed, had been left with the secretary to be kept with the records of the company. In advising the House of Lords Earl Selborne says:—"The courts below both thought, and I agree with them, that there was not, as against the respondents, any sufficient evidence of a delivery of the completed transfer by James Montgomery Walker. But, even if there had been such evidence, I should not myself have considered a merely inchoate title by an unregistered transfer equivalent for the present purpose to a legal estate in the shares. Such a transfer might, indeed, give a legal right of action against the company if they, without just cause, refused to register it; it might also be a good foundation for an application to a competent court to rectify the register. But it could not, under the 26th article of association of the Tramways Co. confer (while unregistered) a legal title to the shares themselves; nor do I think that the fact of its execution, and of a claim having been made to register it before the company had notice of the prior equitable title, would necessarily make it the duty of the company, after receiving such notice, to register it, or of a court to compel them to do so, and thereby to effect a transfer till then incomplete. If, indeed, all necessary conditions have been fulfilled to give the transferee, as between himself and the company, a present absolute unconditional tional right to have the transfer registered before the company was informed of the existence of a better title, the case might have been different."

In reading this passage the provisions of the articles of association of the company are doubtless to be borne in mind. So reading it, I think it may be inferred that the following propositions are sanctioned by his lordship's authority. 1. A merely inchoate title by transfer is not equivalent for the purpose of defeating a pre-existing equitable title to a legal estate in the shares. 2. The title by transfer is to be deemed inchoate only (within the meaning of the last proposition), if not until a complete legal title is acquired, at all events unless and until all necessary conditions have been fulfilled to give the transferee, as between himself and the company, a present absolute and unconditional right to have the transfer registered before the company was informed of the existence of a better title. 3. A company having notice of a prior equitable title is not necessarily bound to act upon a transfer which confers an inchoate title, only so as to effectuate a fraud till then incomplete. Lord Blackburn's speech in the same case is also of importance. [His lordship read the passage commencing, "Lindley, L.J., in the present case says," and ending, "After the receipt of that notice nothing which they did could have affected the prior right of the respondents."]

It would seem, therefore, to be his lordship's opinion that a company receiving a transfer for registration are not bound to act on it at once, even though in order, but are entitled to a reasonable time to make inquiries, and that if, before the expiration of such reasonable time, notice is given to them of the existence of a prior equitable title, they are not necessarily bound to proceed further. The inference seems to be that until the company have in some way shown their acceptance of the transfer the legal title is incomplete. Lord Watson concurs; Lord Fitzgerald does not consider it necessary to decide the point; the Lord Chancellor (Lord Halsbury) concurs with Lord Blackburn. The case of Nanney v. Morgan, recently decided in the Court of Appeal, has an important bearing on the question at what point the legal title to shares becomes complete. That case was decided with reference to shares in a company governed by the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, but the ratio decidendi throws some light upon the present case.

The leading judgment was delivered by Cotton, L.J., who says:—[His lordship quoted the passage at p. 353 commencing with the words "If the effect of a transfer of shares" and concluding with the words "trustees of the marriage settlement"]. Sir James Hannen concurs without adding any observations. Lopes, L.J., at p. 356, says: "the transferor, until the delivery of the deed of transfer to the secretary, is subject to all the liabilities and entitled to all the rights which belong to a shareholder or stockholder, and, in my opinion, until the requisite formalities are complied with, he continues the legal proprietor of the stock or shares subject to that proprietorship being divested, which it may be at any moment by a compliance with the requisite formalities." The reasoning on which this judgment is based seems to show that the transfer is not complete until everything has been done which is necessary to put the transferee into the position of the transferor, or possibly a narrower view might be that, where the transfer has to be left with the company it does not take effect until the officers of the company have examined it and accepted it as properly left. This would seem to agree with what is laid down by Lord Blackburn in the speech to which I have referred.

I have now to apply the principles derived from these, the most recent and important authorities, to the present case, and must consider whether the defendants Hodgkinson and Arnold have shown a legal title in themselves or (as between themselves and the company) an absolute and unconditional right to be registered as shareholders in the place of Williamson; and for this purpose I must refer to the clauses of the deed of settlement. The form A. given in the schedule to the deed of settlement as the form in which, according to clause 14, every transfer of shares is to be effected, differs from that which was executed in this case, and concludes "and I, the said (transferee) do hereby agree to take the said shares subject to the same conditions and to the provisions of the deed or deeds of settlement of the said company," and I am of opinion that under clause 14 it was essential to the legal validity of a transfer that the deed by which it was effected should be deposited or left at the office of the company. Further, clause 5 provides that no person claiming to be the proprietor of any share by transfer shall be entitled to be treated or recognized as such unless and until he shall have been registered in the register of shareholders as the proprietor of the shares; and clause 6 provides that no person (with certain exceptions unnecessary to be regarded) is to be entitled to be registered in the register of shareholders as the proprietor of any share unless and until he shall, by the execution of the deed of settlement or some deed referring thereto, have undertaken all the liabilities, duties, and obligations of a shareholder in respect of a share.

First of all, then, have the transferees acquired the legal title to the shares which the transferor had? The answer must be in the negative, for by clause 5 no person claiming to be the proprietor of a share shall be entitled to be treated as such, as between himself and the company, unless and until he shall have been registered in the register of shareholders as the proprietor of the share. This makes registration in the register of shareholders essential to the completion of the title, and brings the case almost within the very terms of Société Générale de Paris v. Walker.

The same conclusion may be arrived at in another way. As I have said, clause 14 renders it, in my opinion, essential that the transfer should be left at the office of the company. But, regard being had to clauses 5 and 6, I think it is not enough that it should be so left. The officers of the company charged with the duty of receiving the transfer must examine it and ascertain whether it complies with the requirements of the deed of settlement, and if it does not it is their duty to reject it, and I think it follows both from what is laid down by Lord Blackburn in the case of Société Générale de Paris v. Walker, and by the Court of Appeal in the case of Nanney v. Morgan, that it is not until this has been done and the transfer has been accepted by the company as a proper transfer that it becomes effectual as between the company and the transferee. Now there is no controversy that matters remain as they stood on the 7th of May, 1886, and that the transfer has not been accepted by the company as a proper transfer, and the company are not bound to accept it so as to effectuate a fraud which is still incomplete.

Lastly, let us apply the alternative test used by Lord Selborne in Société Générale de Paris v. Walker—viz., whether on May 6, 1886, the defendants Hodgkinson and Arnold had acquired "an absolute and unconditional right to be registered as shareholders." Now the transfer executed by Williamson does not refer to the deed of settlement. No offer to execute the deed of settlement has been made by Hodgkinson and Arnold, nor have they executed that deed. By virtue of clause 6 they are, therefore, not entitled to be registered on the register of shareholders as the proprietors of the shares, and by virtue of clause 5 they are not entitled, as between themselves and the company, to be treated or recognized as the proprietors of the shares. Their title, therefore, is inchoate only, and therefore it is insufficient to defeat that of the plaintiff.

I ought, perhaps, to refer to the case of Dodds v.

Hills, upon which much reliance has been placed by the defendants during the course of the argument. In that case a sole trustee of shares executed a transfer of the shares and delivered it with the certificates to a mortgagee who had no notice of the trust, but who afterwards received notice of the trust, and then got the transfer registered by the company. And the case may, therefore, be cited as an authority for the proposition that, where a person having an inchoate title completes his title by getting in the legal estate, he will not, as an ordinary rule, be deprived in favour of a person having only an equitable title of the advantage he has thereby obtained. But in the present case the company had notice of the breach of trust before the transfer was sent to them for registration (which does not appear to have been the case in Dodds v. Hills), and the legal title never was completed. This distinguishes the present case from Dodds v. Hills, and it is, therefore, unnecessary for me to consider whether all the propositions laid down by the Vice-Chancellor in that case are entirely consistent with the more recent decisions.

I accordingly hold that the title of the plaintiff to these shares must prevail, and that there must be judgment against Williamson, with costs.

Pledge — Validity — Delivery to pledgee — Document regulating the rights of the pledgee—Contract for pledge—Delivery not contemporaneous with advance—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 3, 4—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 8, 9.

In order to make a valid pledge, it is not necessary for delivery of possession to be contemporaneous with the advance of the money; it is sufficient if the money is advanced on a contract that the goods shall be delivered and the goods are in fact afterwards handed over under the contract. But until the goods are so handed over, there is no valid pledge, delivery being an essential part of a pledge.

Reeves v. Capper, 5 Bing. N. C. 136, followed.

Where there is a valid pledge, the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882, have no application, although a document regulating the rights of the parties may have been subsequently executed.

The handing over of the key of a warehouse or room must, in order to amount to constructive delivery of goods stored in the warehouse or room, be made under such circumstances that it in fact passes full control over the goods.

A. agreed to advance money to B. on the security of goods to be deposited in a room of which A. was to have control. B. hired a room, deposited the goods in it, and placed a key of it at the disposal of C., who was also employed by B. to make a list of the goods in the room, which list was apparently, to some extent at any rate, intended for the convenience or benefit of A. On the day the goods were deposited B. wrote to A. to inform him of the deposit and the proposed list, and added that C. "has the key, which I place entirely at your disposal."

Held, that there was, under the circumstances, a good constructive delivery of possession of the goods to A., notwithstanding the fact that B. subsequently continued to have access to the room, and exercised various acts of control over the goods.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DEANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Trial of action.

This action was brought by James Hilton against Mildred Anna Rosalie Tucker, as administratrix of the estate of her father, Stephen Isaacson Tucker, for a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to possession of a collection of portraits, prints, and effects stored in a certain room in Oxford Mansions, Oxford-street, as security for principal and interest moneys due to him under two bonds for £1,250 each. The plaintiff also asked for an account, a sale of the property, and other subsidiary relief.

It appeared that in the month of November, 1883, the plaintiff had agreed, at S. I. Tucker's request, to make him an advance upon the security of some title deeds, but before this agreement had been acted on it was arranged between the parties, at Tucker's instance, that in lieu of the deeds a collection of prints and other articles belonging to him should be deposited, as security for the money to be advanced, in a room to be taken by Tucker for the purpose, but to be under the plaintiff's control.

On the 19th of the same month Hilton made a first advance to Tucker of £1,250, for which a bond was given the next day. Tucker then took a room in Oxford Mansions, a portion of which building is occupied by the Archæological Society, of which both parties were members; the collection was moved into the room, and on the 21st of December Tucker wrote to the plaintiff as follows:—

"21st December, 1883.

"Dear Hilton,—The collection was moved in to-day, and I have arranged with Larking (R.A.) to spend, subject to your approval—for I thought it would be better for you to have one already, in a sense, under your control—a certain time in the room every day in making a list. This I will afterwards edit into a perfect catalogue. . . . Larking has the key, which I place entirely at your disposal. STEPHEN I. TUCKER."

On the 24th of December the plaintiff made a further advance of £1,250 to Tucker, a bond for which was given on the 11th of January, 1884. On the same day Tucker wrote the following letter to the plaintiff:—

"London, 11th January, 1884.

"Dear Sir,—You having advanced to me the sum of £2,500 on two bonds for £1,250 each executed by me, I hereby request and authorize you to retain possession of my collection of engraved portraits, prints, and all other property now deposited by me in a certain room in Oxford Mansions, Oxford-street, the key of which room is at present in your possession or power; and I hereby acknowledge your right to retain possession of such portraits, prints, and property until the whole sum is paid, with interest at five per cent., from the dates of the bonds respectively. STEPHEN I. TUCKER.

"Somerset H."

The plaintiff did not take physical possession of the property, or have sole possession of the key till after Tucker's death in January, 1887. Tucker, on the other hand, was in the habit of going to the room and exercising various acts of control over the goods up to the time of his death, and was stated by one of the witnesses, who had been steward or superintendent of the house, to have removed two of the pictures on one occasion.

It was stated on behalf of the plaintiff that after Tucker's death a clerk, representing the defendant, had attempted to take forcible possession of the property and threatened to break into the room.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and J. Bradford, for the plaintiff.—We are pledgees. Where possession has been acquired, and a document regulating the rights of the parties is then drawn up, it is not a bill of sale. The test seems to be whether possession has been acquired before the document is executed: Ex parte Hubbard, 35 W. R. 2, 17 Q. B. D. 690. We had possession given us on December 21, 1883, and the letter which is alleged to be a bill of sale was not written till the 11th of January, 1884.

Barber, Q.C., and Aldred Rowden, for the defendant.—The plaintiff had no key, and never exercised any act of possession till after Tucker's death. Tucker paid the rent and retained the control of the room and its contents. The evidence is, upon the authorities, wholly insufficient to establish the case that possession was given. In In re Cunningham, 33 W. R. 387, 28 Ch. D. 682, the document was subsequent to deposit. To make a good pledge there must be an immediate transfer. An agreement to pledge is a "licence to take possession of personal chattels as security," or an "assurance of personal chattels" within section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. At the date of the letter of January, 1884, the plaintiff had not possession as a fact. It has never been decided how far delivery of a key is delivery of possession, and we submit that the mere delivery of the key of a room without more does not pass a special property in chattels stored there, such as is necessary to make a valid pledge. To hold that there is a good pledge where possession is not given till after the money has been advanced, would open a very wide door to fraud of the character the Bills of Sale Acts were intended to prevent. No property, general or special, in chattels, can pass in law, except by (1) pledge, (2) bill of sale. Unless the advance and possession are contemporaneous, there is no pledge. Ex parte Hubbard merely shows that if there is a real transaction of pawn, it is not upset by the fact that there is a document.

They also referred to Ex parte Close, 33 W. R. 228, 14 Q. B. D. 386; Ex parte Parsons, 34 W. R. 329, 16 Q. B. D. 532: Ancona v. Rogers, 24 W. R. 1000, 1 Ex. D. 285; Meyerstein v. Barber, 15 W. R. 173, L. R. 2 C. P. 38; and Coote on Mortgages, 5th ed., vol. 1, p. 640.

Henn Collins in reply.—I am now in possession. There was an agreement for a pledge, and if that was followed by possession while the agreement was still subsisting, then there was a valid pledge, though not till delivery of possession: Reeves v. Capper, 5 Bing. N. C. 136. The mere fact that there is a document does not affect the pledge, if what happens afterwards is consistent with the agreement.

He also referred to Ellis v. Hunt, 3 T. R. 464; Chaplin v. Rogers, 1 East, 192; Whitehead v. Clifford, 5 Taunt. 518; and North Central Wagon Co. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 34 W. R. 430, 32 Ch. D. 477.

Kekewich, J.—It would not be right to describe this as a bill of sale case. If it is a bill of sale case there is no bill of sale which has been or can be registered, so that the mere statement of the case in that way implies the plaintiff's failure. The plaintiff's case is that there has been a pledge of the goods, and the defendant's case is that there has been no pledge. What constitutes a pledge is almost common knowledge, but I will take, as a description, the words of Bowen, L.J., in the case of Ex parte Hubbard, where he says, "There is another entirely distinct transaction, which was known to the Romans, and has been long familiar to English law, the transaction of a pawn or pledge, where there must be a delivery of the goods pledged to the pledgee, but only a special property in them passes to him, in order that they may be dealt with by him, if necessary, to enforce his rights, no general property in the goods remaining in the pledgor." A pledge, therefore, consists in the delivery—at least, that is an essential part of the transaction. In Meyerstein v. Barber, Willes, J., said, "With respect to a pledge, according to the law of this country, a mere contract to pledge even specific goods, and even although the money is actually advanced upon the face of the contract, is not sufficient to carry the legal property in the goods."

It is not necessary for me to examine either of the Bills of Sale Acts of 1878 and 1882, as they do not deal with parol contracts or pledges, which are left to be dealt with by the common law. As I understand the cases they go the length of deciding that if you have a pledge by contract and delivery, it can now be enforced, irrespective of the statutes or the decisions on them. The question is, therefore, whether there is here a pledge of that character. As to the bargain, there is no doubt that the plaintiff, in the autumn of 1883, agreed to make certain advances to Tucker on the security of some title deeds, and that the security was afterwards changed, with the plaintiff's consent, for that of the prints and goods in question. No money was advanced till the 19th of November, 1883, when the first advance of £1,250 was made, a further advance of £1,250 being made about a month later. Before the first advance there was no delivery of the goods—that is common ground—but about the date of the second advance there was delivery of possession, which was practically contemporaneous with that advance. There was, therefore, a contract binding in honour, but whether it was also binding in law is what I have now to decide. Such a contract might have given rise to a legal or equitable right to specific performance such as was referred to on the authority of Lord Westbury in Holroyd v. Marshall, 11 W. R., at p. 172, 10 H. L. Cas., at p. 209, but was not sufficient to pass either a general or a special property in the goods, which remained vested in Tucker. They were afterwards dealt with in a very peculiar manner. Having been, up to December 21, 1883, under the control of Tucker, they were not then delivered, in the ordinary sense, to the lender, but they were deposited in a house selected merely because part of it was occupied by the Archæological Society, of which society both parties were members. A room was taken there by Tucker for the purpose of depositing them, and he was the tenant of it, and paid the rent and expenses of keeping it in order—so that in no sense was it Hilton's room. The key, or keys—for there seem to have been two—were kept hung up in the porter's or steward's office in the way that is usual in the case of flats, so that the tenant can get it from time to time when he wishes to go into his room. If the case stopped there I should hold that possession was not given at that time. But there is more. Mr. Tucker, in his letter of the 21st of December, 1883, refers to the collection having been moved in on that day, and refers to the arrangement that a list should be made; but then he goes on to say: "Larking has the key, which I place entirely at your disposal." The key was there, and it is immaterial whether it was in Larking's physical possession, or in that of the superintendent or steward of the rooms, or that it was also at the disposal of Tucker. Then, as to two of the pictures having been carried away, it certainly shows some control over the room on the part of Tucker, but I do not think any importance is to be attached to the fact, as out of such a large collection it is quite possible that one or two might have been removed by Mr. Hilton's permission, or they might have been taken wrongfully, though I do not for a moment impute that. This state of things went on till the 11th of January following, when Tucker wrote the letter that is said to be a bill of sale which ought to have been registered. [His lordship read the letter of the 11th of January, 1884]. I admit Mr. Barber's contention that authority to retain does not necessarily imply that possession had already been given, but the letter goes on "the key of which room is at present in your possession or power." To my mind that is a statement by Tucker quite consistent with the previous letter. Is there anything inconsistent with Hilton's possession in Tucker's access and control? No doubt it would have been more satisfactory if the plaintiff had had exclusive control of the goods. But assuming the bona fides of both parties, it seems to me quite consistent with the honesty of the transactions that Tucker should have retained some control over the property. I do not rely upon the fact of the key having been handed over. Several cases were cited as to the effect of such delivery, but when examined they all merely go to this—that in order to amount to constructive possession, the delivery of the key must have been made under such circumstances that it really does pass full control over the goods, as in the case of timber in a warehouse—it being clearly impossible to hand over such goods bodily. The key, then, is a symbol where it is practically impossible to give possession of the property itself. I think that runs through all the cases.

But then I have to decide that question of law, whether the delivery must be actually contemporaneous with the advance in order to make a valid pledge. I do not mean in such a case as where the delivery is made an hour, or even a day, after the advance, but where, as here, it is made a month after, but then made in pursuance and fulfilment of the contract under which the advance was made. Until delivery there is nothing but a contract. I am not aware of any authority to the effect that the advance and delivery must be contemporaneous—so long as the delivery is made in fulfilment of the contract—and Reeves v. Capper is an authority the other way. Mr. Barber says that case would not be decided in that way now, but, even if that be so, it is binding on me till overruled. However, irrespective of that case, I cannot understand why actual delivery must be contemporaneous with the advance. It seems to me the transaction may be divided into two parts, though the lender has no remedy till he has actually got the goods. I think there is a very small opening for fraud in holding that if money is advanced on a contract that goods shall be delivered, and then the goods are handed over pursuant to the contract, there is in the result a valid pledge. I think the plaintiff is entitled to the relief he asks, and to add his costs to his security.

Solicitor and client—Fiduciary relation—Investment on insufficient security—Misrepresentation—Negligence—Statute of Limitations—Trustee and cestui que trust.

Where money is received by a solicitor for a client to be invested on a particular mortgage selected by the client, or on a mortgage to be selected by the solicitor, but subject to the client's approval, the solicitor, in the absence of special circumstances, is not responsible on the footing of a trustee for the sufficiency of the security, but is only liable as a solicitor for negligence, if proved, and in that case is not excluded from the benefit of the Statute of Limitations. But where the money is received to be invested at the solicitor's discretion, and the client takes no part in the selection, the solicitor is liable, on the footing of a trustee, if the security turns out to have been insufficient and such as a trustee would not have been justified in investing on.

There is nothing improper in a solicitor advising a client who owes him money to sell or mortgage property and allow the solicitor to receive the purchase or mortgage-money and retain out of it the amount owing to himself from the client; and it makes no difference that the purchase or mortgage-money is paid or advanced by another client acting upon the solicitor's advice. But such a transaction, if challenged, will be closely scanned to see whether the solicitor has acted in good faith and with due regard to his client's interests.

A small piece of land included in a mortgage for £5,000 was sold, and the mortgagee, being advised in good faith by her solicitor that the remaining land was a sufficient security for her money, and being herself reluctant to break into her investment, allowed the price (£230) to be received by the owners of a second mortgage, in which the solicitor himself had an indirect interest, as being responsible to clients for the money advanced on it. The security turned out insufficient for the first mortgage.

Held, that the solicitor had not by his conduct constituted himself a trustee for his client the first mortgagee, so as to be liable to make good to her the loss of the sum of £230.

Trial of action.

This action was brought to make the defendant, James Watson, a solicitor, liable, both personally and as executor under the will of William Watson, his father, in respect of an investment of £5,000 on the security of a mortgage which had turned out to be insufficient.

It appeared that William Watson and James Watson, who were solicitors carrying on business in partnership at Hull and Hedon, in Yorkshire, under the style of Watson & Son, had, for many years prior to 1877, been in the habit of acting, when required, as solicitors for the plaintiff, and this continued down to the death of William Watson, which occurred in January, 1879, after which James Watson, in partnership with Robert Carrick, still continued to act for her, when required, till recently.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Dooby, was an elderly widow lady residing in the neighbourhood of Hull, and about the year 1867 she had purchased or acquired a property called Ganstead, situated in the same locality, which she sold in 1876 for £10,250. William Watson acted as her solicitor in this sale, and it was completed and the money paid on the 6th of April, 1877. At that time Watson & Son had two clients named Charles and William Marsdin, each of whom owned land, and it was now suggested for the plaintiff that these two properties, which adjoined each other, were to be regarded as forming two parts of one farm, the part owned by William containing the homestead. Charles Marsdin had agreed to sell his part to his brother William for £6,800, and the sale was completed somewhere about the same time as the sale of the plaintiff's estate of Ganstead. Both Charles and William Marsdin were largely indebted to the Watsons' firm up to the time of these transactions. Of the £10,250 realized for the Ganstead property, £5,250 was paid into the plaintiff's account at Smith's bank at Hull, but the remaining £5,000, as to which the dispute arises, was retained by Messrs. Watson to be invested for the plaintiff, who stated that she trusted them implicitly to find a safe and proper investment for it. The money was invested on the security of a mortgage of the land purchased by William Marsdin from his brother Charles, and the inference drawn from the evidence at this point by the learned judge was that the plaintiff knew and approved of such investment.

(a.) Reported by R. H. Deane, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was admitted by the defendant James Watson that a prior mortgage on the property was (no doubt, partly out of the plaintiff's £5,000) paid off to himself and a Mr. Robinson, who were practically trustees of it for the firm, but he stated that the money, or part of it, secured by that mortgage really belonged to clients of theirs who had entrusted it for investment to the firm as their solicitors, though there might be a contingent liability for it on the part of the firm.

No valuation had been procured for the purpose of the mortgage, though the land had been valued for the sale from Charles to William Marsdin. In June of the ensuing year, 1878, an acre or two of the mortgaged land was sold for £230, and the plaintiff alleged that in consequence of Messrs. Watson having untruly represented to her that the mortgage was a perfectly good security for her principal money, she allowed the £230 to be received by Thomas Robinson and James Watson as the persons entitled to a second mortgage on the property, and that in that second mortgage the Watsons themselves were the persons beneficially interested. But it was stated by the other side that the money secured belonged to clients of the firm.

The defendant William Marsdin subsequently presented a petition for liquidation of his affairs by arrangement, and all his interest in the mortgaged property afterwards became vested in the defendant W. J. Clegg as official receiver in bankruptcy, but William Marsdin himself died after the statement of claim was delivered, and Clegg did not appear.

The plaintiff claimed an account on the footing of wilful default of the sum of £5,000 received by the defendant Watson and his firm from her for investment, and a declaration that he was liable both personally and as executor of William Watson to make good any deficiency in the mortgage money. In the alternative she asked for a declaration that James Watson was liable personally and as executor of William Watson to repay her the £230, the proceeds of the sale of June, 1878, with interest at five per cent. till payment. She also claimed against William Marsdin, the mortgagor, an account and payment, and a sale of the mortgaged land, and application of the proceeds towards payment of what should be found due.

Seward Brice, Q.C., and Butcher, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff trusted Watson & Son implicitly, and left the finding of an investment entirely in their hands. They represented that the security was a proper one, which it was not, and they put themselves, by their conduct, in the position of trustees. As to £3,000 out of the £5,000, they never put it into the mortgage at all, but applied it in paying Marsdin's debt to themselves. The plaintiff did not discover till 1884 that her security was only on the part of the farm bought from Charles Marsdin, which was almost unlettable without the other. The ledger shows that no money passed on the sale to William or on the mortgage by him—there were only paper entries, and the firm retained the money in payment of the debts to themselves. They were so guilty of negligence as solicitors, and as advising the plaintiffs financially. They omitted to obtain a valuation of the land: Ingle v. Partridge, 34 Beav. 411; Fry v. Tapson, 33 W. R. 113, 28 Ch. D. 268. As to the "confidence and trust," we rely on Smith v. Pococke, 2 W. R. 285, 2 Drewry, 197, and Craig v. Watson, 8 Beav. 427; and where there is a fiduciary relation or express trust the Statute of Limitations cannot be set up as a bar: Burdick v. Garrick, 18 W. R. 1171, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 233; Banner v. Berridge, 29 W. R. 264, 18 Ch. 254; Flitcroft's case, 31 W. R. 174, 21 Ch. D. 519. It was owing to the defendant's wrongful conduct that the negligence was not discovered sooner: Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. North-Eastern Railway, 36 W. R. 158, 4 Ch. D. 845.

They also referred to Blair v. Bromley, 5 Hs. 542, and Brooksbank v. Smith, 2 Yo. & Coll. Ex. Cas. 58.

Barber, Q.C., Warmington, Q.C., and Warrington, for the defendant James Watson.—If the defendant is held liable on these facts, solicitors will be liable in every case where they receive the purchase-money arising from a sale for investment, which is certainly what they have to do in the ordinary course of their business without being money scriveners. If you are to raise the relation of solicitor and client to that of trustee and cestui que trust, you must show very special circumstances, and there are no such here. In Smith v. Pococke the circumstances were very strong. In Craig v. Watson the solicitor took the security in his own name, and executed a deed declaring himself a trustee, and in Burdick v. Garrick there was a deed expressly constituting the solicitors trustees. [KEKEWICH, J.—The difficulty is the comment on that case in Banner v. Berridge, where Kay, J. (on p. 264), applies the doctrine to a mere depositee.] That goes beyond the case commented on, and, besides, we are not a depositee. Howell v. Young, 5 Barn. & Cress. 259, shows that the Statute of Limitations runs from the time of the negligence and not from the time of its discovery. There are here none of the incidents necessary to constitute a trust. As to the omission to get a valuation, of course that would have been negligence in trustees. Messrs. Watsons' bonâ fide belief in the goodness of the security was shown by their taking a second mortgage on the property. The conclusion from the facts is that the £5,000 was placed in the Watsons' hands to be invested on the particular mortgage of William Marsdin's farm. No doubt Messrs. Watson were, in the first instance, instructed to look out for a security, but that was before they had the money. On the whole case we submit that the relation that existed between them and the plaintiff was only that of solicitors and client, and not that of trustees and cestui que trust; that there was no negligence, and, if there was, the Statute of Limitations is a complete bar, and that it is no answer to say that the negligence was not discovered till less than six years before action.

They also referred to Mare v. Lewis, 4 Ir. Rep. Eq. 219, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 1; In re Hindmarsh, 8 W. R. 203, 1 Dr. & Sm. 129; Watson v. Woodman, 24 W. R. 47, L. R. 20 Eq. 721; and British Mutual Investment Co. v. Cobbold, 23 W. R. 487, L. R. 19 Eq. 627.

Seward Brice replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—This case promised at one time to be more fruitful in questions of law than it is now likely to be, as far as I am concerned, and it also presents considerable difficulty as to the facts. It is a case of large importance to the parties concerned, and also raises questions of importance to practising solicitors and their clients. One fact is prominent in the foreground, that in 1877 the plaintiff, Mrs. Dooby, employed the firm of Watson & Sons as solicitors, or Mr. William Watson, a member of that firm, as solicitor, to sell the Ganstead estate, and receive and invest the proceeds of the sale; and he did sell it and did receive the purchase-money, and dealt with it in two parts. As to one part there is no question, but as to the other part arises the question with which I am now concerned. The £5,000 of which the part in question consisted was invested on a particular mortgage—viz., of land belonging to William Marsdin. There is no doubt that Mrs. Dooby placed the utmost confidence in Mr. William Watson for the carrying out of these purposes, as was natural, and as most clients, male and female, do in the solicitors on whose experience and integrity they rely. The money was invested on this mortgage, and the security turns out to be insufficient. If Mrs. Dooby's confidence in Mr. Watson was misplaced, if the business was not well done, if Mr. Watson failed to use proper care and diligence in ascertaining that the security was a good one, or even if he did not manage to know what he ought to have known about it, he became liable for negligence. The transaction, however, took place more than six years before this action was commenced, and the action as an ordinary action for negligence is, therefore, barred by the Statute of Limitations. If any excuse were wanted for dismissing it on that ground there could surely be nothing worse in the public interest than the digging up of such matters after the principal actor in them is dead, and unable, therefore, to give his account of what took place. As an ordinary action of negligence, then, it fails, but it is said there were in this case exceptional circumstances which take it out of the Statute of Limitations. The plaintiff's counsel hesitated to impute fraud openly, but they hinted at it, and they argued that the conduct of Mr. Watson in concealing the true state of affairs by his misrepresentations was such that the statute had no application unless six years had passed since the plaintiff might, with reasonable diligence, have discovered the negligence complained of, and that Mrs. Dooby was not made aware of the circumstances from which the negligence was inferred until she consulted her present solicitor. If those circumstances had any real existence, they would only be useful as a ground for giving relief of a different character—that is, as tending to show that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust was established, in which case the plaintiff would have been entitled to relief quite apart from the ground of negligence. I may, therefore, pass over these circumstances now except so far as they can be held to have constituted the relation of trustee and cestui que trust, which would itself be sufficient to exclude the statute.

That, then, is the real question, Whether that relation was established? It is true enough that there was a trust in one sense, as there is in almost all the relations of life. But in a court of equity the term has a technical and defined meaning. First, there must be a person—the trustee—who is to hold the property in trust for someone; secondly, there must be property which is held in trust; and, thirdly, there must be a person or persons in trust for whom the property is held before we get the relation of trustee and cestui que trust. Let me now examine the relation in which Mrs. Dooby stood to Mr. Watson in 1877. Putting aside the case where a solicitor is intended to make a profit or commission on investments—where, in fact, he acts as a money scrivener—the position of a solicitor with reference to money intrusted to him for investment varies in different cases, and I apprehend the cases fall into three classes—(1) where a solicitor receives the money in order to invest it on a particular mortgage, either selected by the client independently or upon the solicitor's advice; (2) where the solicitor receives the money in order to find a mortgage for it, subject to the client's approval; (3) where the solicitor does far more, and the client, for some reason or other, takes little or no part, the onerous duty and responsibility of selecting a good mortgage being left entirely in the solicitor's hands—a responsibility which is beyond the ordinary duty of solicitors, and which many of them prefer not to undertake. In cases (1) and (2) the solicitor is responsible only for negligence which falls within the Statute of Limitations. In case (3) he is responsible for selecting a good mortgage, and it has been a serious question here whether Mr. Watson is not responsible for having selected a bad mortgage.

I must notice one other matter before coming to the facts. Mr. Brice said that Mr. Watson's interests conflicted with his duty to his client. He was solicitor for William and Charles Marsdin as well as for Mrs. Dooby, and in 1877 both the Marsdins were indebted to his firm, and, to put the matter shortly, the result of the whole transaction was that Mr. Watson's firm was in a far better position after than before that transaction. It may be that the money did not go as a whole to pay off the debts due to them from the Marsdins, but certainly there was an advantage to the firm from the transaction. But now, would there have been anything improper in Mr. Watson going to Charles Marsdin and saying, "You owe us £3,000; you have got a farm—sell it, and let us receive the purchase-money and pay off your debt," or going to William Marsdin and saying; "You owe us money; mortgage your farm, and let us receive the money and pay off your debt"? I apprehend it would have been a perfectly straightforward course of conduct, and I think it makes no difference that Mrs. Dooby's purchase-money was also paid into the solicitor's hands, and never went out of them, but was placed to Marsdin's credit, and employed to pay his debts. It is only fair to say, however, that this is not exactly what really occurred here, as shown by the evidence, for the sale of Charles Marsdin's farm to his brother was not the Watsons' doing, so that the case is not so strong against them. No doubt there were the three clients and the indebtedness, and therefore it is right to look narrowly into the transaction. Mrs. Dooby wanted to invest £5,000 at that time, and then Mr. Watson became aware of the sale to William Marsdin, and that the money was wanted on mortgage. I have to infer from the evidence whether the proposed mortgage was discussed with Mrs. Dooby. She is clear that she heard nothing of it till some time later, but, then, as she herself said, she is getting on in years, and while I give perfect credit to her evidence, I cannot set her memory against documents. Mr. James Watson produced his father's diary which shows, as solicitors' diaries ought to show, precisely what occurred. Mr. Watson did see Mrs. Dooby twice, and went into the matter thoroughly with her, and we find on each occasion a reference to the particular mortgage. Am I to infer that he, intending fraud, wrote down a charge against himself of retaining £5,000? Moreover, a memorandum was discovered in Mr. Watson's handwriting which I must hold to have been made contemporaneously with the matters referred to in it, and in it he again charged himself with £5,000 retained for Marsdin's mortgage. That being so, what was the position? Mr. Watson was asked by Mrs. Dooby to find an investment for £5,000, and he did find one, and she knew and approved of it.

My conclusion is that the relation existing was No. (1)—the particular mortgage was found before anything was settled or the money in hand, and was then approved by Mrs. Dooby. There was a trust, but it was fully performed when the mortgage deed was executed.

But then it was said that Mr. Watson had represented that the mortgage was on the entire farm, including the homestead, and land of William Marsdin's not purchased from his brother. There is not, however, the slightest ground shown on the evidence for this allegation. There in 1878 a small piece of the land was sold for £230—a high price—which was received by the second mortgagee, and this is made a ground of complaint against the solicitors, because they had told Mrs. Dooby that the mortgage was safe. There may have been an error of judgment, but the fact was, as she said in her evidence, she did not wish to break in upon her mortgage for £5,000. One thing more—it was said that Mr. Watson did not take proper precautions to ascertain the value of the land, and cases were cited where trustees have been held liable for such an omission. Mr. Coulman's valuation was for a different purpose, and if anything depended on it I should not excuse Mr. Watson's diligence in that matter. But I am not disposed to decide the point, as it could only have reference to the question of negligence. If there was a trust the point would be very important, but my conclusion of fact being that the plaintiff approved of this mortgage, and that there was accordingly no trust in the sense contended, for it ceases to be so. I have therefore very little to say about the cases. To my mind the one case that is most useful is Craig v. Watson, but it is impossible to read Lord Langdale's judgment without seeing that he considered the solicitor there did act with some sinister object of his own, and took a low view of the duty of a solicitor.

Smith v. Pococke was also a case of improper conduct and fraud, and has, therefore, no application here. Burdich v. Garrick merely shows that the doctrine of trustee and cestui que trust ought to be extended to many cases to which primâ facie it might not have been thought applicable. The Irish case (Mare v. Lewis) only applies the law to the facts there mentioned, and the Vice-Chancellor makes some observations on trusts for general investment which may require reconsideration hereafter, but, not being directly in point now, may be passed by. The other cases cited on the question of the Statute of Limitations were useful and instructive, but they all tend to one point—where you find property intrusted to a solicitor for investment there is a trust, and that excludes the statute. Mr. Watson was not a trustee in that sense. The action, therefore, fails against him, and he must have his costs. As against the other defendants or defendant the plaintiff is entitled to the relief she asks and to add her costs.

Action dismissed as against the defendant Watson. Judgment for plaintiff as against the other defendants.

Solicitor—Privilege—County Courts Acts, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 101), s. 18, and 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), ss. 5, 34.

Where a solicitor, as plaintiff in an action upon a bill of costs commenced in the High Court, recovers less than £20, he becomes subject to the provisions of section 5 of the County Courts Act, 1867, as to costs, and any privilege which he may have had of bringing the action in the High Court is taken away by section 18 of the County Courts Act, 1849, which is incorporated into the County Courts Act, 1867, by section 34.

Appeal from an order of Charles, J., at chambers, allowing the plaintiffs costs on the High Court scale.

The plaintiffs were solicitors who had brought an action against the defendant in the High Court for a bill of costs. The action was, upon the delivery of a defence and counter-claim by the defendant, remitted to the county court. The defendant did not appear, and judgment was given for the plaintiffs for £22, subject to taxation of the bill. On taxation the amount recoverable was reduced to £19. Upon an application by the plaintiffs at chambers Charles, J., certified for costs on the High Court scale, from which order the defendant now appealed.

Scarlett, for the defendant.—No privilege attaches to the plaintiffs as solicitors to bring their action in the High Court. They are subject to the provisions of the County Courts Act by section 18 of the County Courts Act, 1849, and having commenced their action in the High Court they are not entitled to High Court costs upon recovering less than £20.

Dickens, for the plaintiffs.—Section 18 of the Act of 1849 only took away the privilege of solicitors in respect of their being sued, not where they themselves sue; and it only applies to cases for which the county courts were specially created, not to actions on the bills of costs, upon which a solicitor is still entitled to sue in the High Court. The judge exercised his discretion rightly, and this court ought not to interfere with that discretion.

Scarlett, in reply.—The court is entitled to review the judge's discretion: Taylor v. Cass, 17 W. R. 861, L. R. 4 C. P. 614.

Wills, J.—I am clearly in favour of the defendant on the point of privilege. Section 34 of the Act of 1867 incorporates the former Act of 1849. By section 18 of the Act of 1849 no privilege is to exempt a solicitor from the provisions of that Act or of the Act of 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95) for the more easy recovery of small debts. One of the provisions of the Act of 1867, with which the earlier Acts are to be read, is that, under section 5, where less than £20 is recovered in an action commenced, as this was, in the High Court the plaintiff shall not be entitled to recover costs unless the judge shall allow such costs. We cannot change the material words of the Act. Upon the merits, however, of the case we think the judge exercised his discretion rightly in allowing such costs, as the defendant, after delivering a counter-claim, did not appear, and practically had no defence.

Grantham, J., concurred.

Bond v. Evans. (a.)

Inn—Offences—Suffering gaming—Connivance—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 17.

An innkeeper kept a skittle-alley on his premises. He put up a general notice that no gaming was permitted in the alley, and he placed one O. in charge of the alley, with express directions not to allow gaming. Two men were found by constables playing cards for money in the alley in the presence of O. and to his knowledge.

Held, that the innkeeper was rightly convicted of "suffering gaming to be carried on upon his premises" under section 17 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

Case stated by stipendiary magistrate.

The appellant Bond, the licensee of an inn called the George and Dragon, at Longton, Staffordshire, had been charged by the superintendent of police with "suffering gaming to be carried on upon the premises" within the terms of section 17 of the Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94).

The material facts were as follows:—

There was a skittle-alley on the premises of the George and Dragon Inn, in which a general direction was posted against permitting gambling in the alley. A potman, named Owen, was put in charge of the skittle-alley by the appellant, who had expressly ordered him not to allow any gaming in the alley. The constables entered the alley and found two men playing cards for money. Owen was present. Appellant did not know that the men were gambling, and they were doing so contrary to his express orders to Owen. The magistrate held that there was connivance on the part of the appellant within the meaning of Bosley v. Davies, 24 W. R. 140, 1 Q. B. D. 84, and that it was not necessary to prove actual knowledge by the appellant to secure his conviction (Redgate v. Haynes, 1 Q. B. D. 89, 24 W. R. Dig. 141), but that, Owen being present and knowing of the gaming, connivance by the servant amounted to connivance by his master.

(a.) Reported by Spencer L. Holland, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellant now appealed against this decision.

Grain, for the appellant.—The words "to suffer" gaming in section 17 of the Licensing Act, 1872, must imply some knowledge on the part of the licensee. Here he had none. The findings are all in his favour on this point: Newman v. Jones, 17 Q. B. D. 132, 34 W. R. Dig. 105; Somerset v. Hart, 32 W. R. 594, 12 Q. B. D. 360.

Green, Q.C., and Lawrence, for the respondents.—The master is responsible for the servant's connivance: Bosley v. Davies, 24 W. R. 140, 1 Q. B. D. 84; Mullins v. Collins, 22 W. R. 297, L. R. 9 Q. B. 292. In Newman v. Jones the person conniving was not anyone under authority of the master. Here the licensee delegated his authority, and must be responsible for that delegation: Cundy v. Le Cocq, 32 W. R. 360, 13 Q. B. D. 207.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 12.—Manisty, J.—The cases in point are somewhat conflicting, and may be said to run very fine. The Act of Parliament is intended to provide for offences against public order, and it is specially important to consider the language of sections 17 and 13, as the latter throws light upon the construction of section 17. Section 13 uses the word "permit" in reference to certain offences instead of "suffer" as in section 17. Section 13 came before the courts in Cundy v. Le Cocq, and that judgment has an important bearing upon this case. That case decides that actual knowledge by the innkeeper was not an element in certain offences against public order.

In sections 14 and 16 the phrases are "knowingly permit" or "knowingly suffer." Then comes section 17 using the word "suffer" and omitting the word "knowingly." In the former statutes for preventing gaming the word "knowingly" was used. Here it is left out. The old statutes are repealed and this statute is substituted, omitting the word "knowingly." The responsibility of suffering gaming upon the premises is left entirely upon the licensee, in spite of his being shown to have given orders against any gaming. That is the decision in Redgate v. Haynes, and is very much in point here. That case, taken together with Cundy v. Le Cocq, must be binding upon us here. The case of Somerset v. Hart, relied on by the appellant, is distinguishable because here Owen was put in charge of the premises. I cannot reconcile all the passages in the judgments in that case, and I should prefer to be bound by the earlier cases. In Newman v. Jones the decision turned upon whether the appellants were liable as trustees of a club. On the whole I do not think that these two last cases were intended to overrule the earlier cases, and I therefore come to the conclusion that the conviction was right and must be upheld.

Stephen, J.—I am of the same opinion, though perhaps on somewhat different grounds. I take the cases in order of time, and the doctrine works out as follows:—In Mullins v. Collins a servant's wilful ignorance was held sufficient to make the master responsible. In Redgate v. Haynes the connivance of a hall-porter was held sufficient to make his mistress responsible. These cases were previous to Somerset v. Hart, where the facts were somewhat peculiar, and it was held that the case did not come within the earlier cases. I do not think that it can be said to militate against the earlier decisions. I do not consider Cundy v. Le Cocq to be of so much importance as my brother Manisty, but on the authority of Bosley v. Davies and Redgate v. Haynes I think that this conviction must be affirmed. I attach no great importance between the words "permit" and "suffer." The licensed person is bound to prevent gaming, otherwise he must be fined.

Collision — Stern light — Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 2, 11—Merchant Shipping Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.

Semble, a vessel at sea carrying at her stern after sunset a white globular light, so placed as to throw its light from right astern to more than two points forward of the beam on each side of the vessel, and of such a character as to be visible at a distance of more than a mile, will, under the provisions of the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1873, be deemed in fault for coming into collision with another vessel approaching in such a direction that the collision might by possibility have been contributed to by the white light at the stern, being thus carried so as to overlap the range of the side lights.

This was an action of damage in rem instituted in the Liverpool District Registry on behalf of the owners of the cargo of the American ship E. F. Sawyer against the steamship Palinurus and her freight to recover the damages sustained in a collision between the two vessels in the English Channel before sunrise on the 22nd of November, 1887.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19.—Hannen, P.—The first question to be considered is, What were the respective courses of these two vessels at the time when the one became visible to the other? I pass over the evidence as to the position of the vessels with regard to the shore, as it does not affect the question in dispute. For the sailing vessel it is alleged that her course was about S., she being close hauled on a light E.S.E. wind, making about two knots, and that she sighted the masthead light of the defendant ship about three points on her starboard bow at a distance of about four miles, and that after ten minutes the red light of the steamer became visible. Several alterations of the steamer's lights after this are stated in the pleadings, and deposed to by the chief officer of the E. F. Sawyer, but they are not spoken to by the pilot of The E. F. Sawyer when he states positively that the red light was never shut out from him, and that the steamer's lights gradually got broader, until, shortly before the collision, the red light was a little abaft The E. F. Sawyer's beam. The pilot of The E. F. Sawyer states that the only report made to him was "a bright light on the lee." On the part of The

(a.) Reported by C. F. Jemmett, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Palinurus it is alleged that a white light was seen at a distance of about one mile, when her course was N.E. by E.½E., and she was making six or seven knots an hour. The Palinurus ported slightly, and her engines were put to slow, and so continued till the loom of The E. F. Sawyer carrying the white light appeared ahead, and that immediately afterwards a dim green light was seen slightly on the port bow.

We see nothing in the evidence which leads us to doubt the accuracy of the statement of those on board The Palinurus as to her course, and I am advised that, assuming this to be correct, if she had been seen three points on the starboard bow of The E. F. Sawyer, at a distance of about four miles, instead of The Palinurus's lights getting broader, they would have closed in, and she would have passed across the bows of The E. F. Sawyer to the southward of the place of the collision. Having regard to the evidence of the pilot of The E. F. Sawyer, we do not accept the statement of the chief officer of that vessel as to the shutting in and the reopening of the red light of The Palinurus. If the case for The E. F. Sawyer as to the courses and bearings of the two vessels were correct, it would follow that The Palinurus never could have seen the stern light of The E. F. Sawyer, and it has been contended she never did see it until after the collision. No light other than the stern light which could have been taken for a light on The E. F. Sawyer has been shown to have existed. We are satisfied that the white light seen by those on board The Palinurus was the stern light of The E. F. Sawyer, a light which was fixed over her stern, and that it was first seen half a point on the port bow of The Palinurus.

The next question which arises is, How was it that the green light of the E. F. Sawyer was not seen until immediately before the collision? This must be accounted for in one of three ways—either that there was not a good look out on The Palinurus, or The Palinurus must have been behind the range of the green light and shot suddenly into it, or it must have been an imperfect light, not showing the proper distance. We see no reason to doubt that there was a good look out kept on The Palinurus. The white light was seen by the pilot of The Palinurus at the distance of a mile, and he acted in reference to it by porting half a point and slowing the engines of The Palinurus to half speed shortly afterwards. The pilot is confirmed by the second officer of the same vessel, the look out man, and the man at the wheel. Secondly, as to the point whether The Palinurus was behind the range of the green light and suddenly shot into it, that theory has not been put forward by the counsel for The E. F. Sawyer, and it is manifestly inconsistent with the plaintiffs' account of the courses and bearings of the two vessels. I mention it in order that it may be seen that it has not escaped our attention; but there are no materials on which to base an opinion that this was the cause of the green light of The E. F. Sawyer not having been sooner seen by The Palinurus. There remains only the third theory, that the green light was imperfect. That there was a green light it is admitted, and there is a strong body of evidence produced for the purpose of proving that it was a good light. On the other hand it is admitted that the green light was not seen from The Palinurus till after the loom of The E. F. Sawyer became visible. A painful duty is imposed on me of deciding whether the evidence from The E. F. Sawyer is to be relied upon, and I have come to the conclusion that it is not. The light had been burning thirteen hours without having been trimmed, and although it might not have required trimming, the probability of its burning dimly is greater after such a lapse of time. It is also unfortunate that this lamp, to which it is alleged attention was called immediately after the collision, was cut away from the screen with which it had fallen on The Palinurus, and was thrown overboard by one of the crew of The E. F. Sawyer. The reason given that it had taken fire may have been the true reason, but it is none the less to be regretted that so important a piece of evidence should be destroyed. I come to the conclusion, in which the Trinity Brethren concur, that the green light of The E. F. Sawyer was not a proper and sufficient one, and that this was the cause of the collision. I am advised, and I think, that the manœuvres of the steamer were proper and seamanlike.

A question has been discussed in this case which, in the view I take of the facts, it is not necessary to determine, but, having regard to its importance, I think it well to give my opinion, if only by way of warning for the future. It has been contended on the one side that it is contrary to the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea for a vessel to carry a fixed stern light; on the other side it has been argued that it is not unlawful so to do. I abstain from saying that to carry a fixed stern light is contrary to the regulations, but it is to be remembered that the object of carrying a stern light is to warn overtaking vessels. So that if the stern light is carried in any way other than is necessary in order to give such warning, it is, in my opinion, an infringement of the regulations. If, for instance, the stern light is above the taffrail, so that it is visible all round, it is then misleading and illegal. Again, though it be below the taffrail, if it is visible over a greater area than is necessary for the guidance of overtaking vessels, I am of opinion that it is misleading and illegal. The area over which the stern light is visible ought never, either in whole or in part, to coincide with the areas of the side lights, and, if the stern light is a fixed light, it ought, at any rate, to be so screened as to prevent these areas overlapping. In the present case I have no doubt that the stern light of The E. F. Sawyer was visible over a portion of the area of the green light of that vessel, and this was calculated to mislead those on board The Palinurus. A white light can always be seen at a greater distance than a green light, and so, before the green light becomes visible, an approaching vessel which sees a white stern light may be led to suppose it is overtaking another vessel and to act accordingly, when in fact it is approaching at a right angle. I pronounce The E. F. Sawyer alone to blame for the collision.

preferential right to dividend, or such priority in the distribution of assets, or subject to such postponement of dividend, or in the distribution of assets, as the company might by special resolution direct, but "save as specified in any such resolution, all new capital shall be subject to the same provisions in all respects as if it had been part of the original capital"; (2) that the net profits of each year should belong to the holders of shares, and be divided pro rata upon the whole paid-up share capital of the company, and that a dividend might be declared payable thereout on the shares in proportion to the amounts paid up thereon. New capital was created by the company by the issue of new shares (called preference shares), entitling the holder thereof "to a dividend after the rate of five per cent. per annum upon the amount for the time being called up thereon, and taking precedence of . . . all dividends and claims of the holders of ordinary shares in the company," but the company did not exercise, in respect of these new shares, any of the other powers given it by the articles.

Each preference share so issued was of £10, and the whole amount on each preference share had been paid up; each ordinary share was also of £10, but only £3 10s. thereon had been paid up when the company was wound up. The whole undertaking of the company was sold under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, and the company was wound up voluntarily. The purchase-money paid for the undertaking of the company gave a large surplus after payment of all liabilities of the company and after the return of their capital to the shareholders.

Held, on a summons taken out by the liquidators, that this surplus was to be divided amongst all the shareholders (preference and ordinary) in proportion to the sums paid up on their shares, and not according to profits.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.

Appeal from North, J.

In August, 1872, the Bridgewater Navigation Co. was incorporated under the Companies Acts. The memorandum of association stated the capital of the company to be £500,000 divided into 500 shares of £1,000 each, but by resolutions passed and confirmed at extraordinary general meetings of the company held in October, 1872, it was resolved that the capital, instead of being divided into 500 shares of £1,000 each, "shall be and is hereby divided into 50,000 shares of £10 each"; and that the capital of the company "shall be increased by the creation of 80,000 new shares of £10 each, amounting in the aggregate to £800,000." In 1874, by resolutions passed at extraordinary general meetings of the company, the original articles of association were annulled and new articles framed.

The following are the material clauses in the new articles:—

Clause 3 (which is identical with clause 4 of the original articles).—"The company may, by resolution, &c., . . . increase its capital . . . by the creation of new shares of such amounts per share and in the aggregate as such resolution shall direct, and any new capital so created may carry such preferential right to dividend or such priority in the distribution of assets, or be subject to such postponement of dividends, or in the distribution of assets, as any resolution of a general meeting passed previously to the issue of any such new capital shall direct. But, save as specified in any such resolution, all new capital shall be subject to the same provisions in all respects as if it had been part of the original capital mentioned in the memorandum of association."

Clause 88 (identical with clause 92 of the original articles).—"No dividend shall be paid except out of the profits of the company arising from the business of the company as shown upon the balance-sheet which shall from time to time have been examined and passed by the auditors."

Clause 85.—". . . The entire net profits of each year shall belong to the holders of the shares of the company and be divided pro rata upon the whole paid-up share capital of the company, and the directors may . . . declare a dividend to be payable thereout on the shares in proportion to the amounts paid up thereon."

On April 27, 1880, a resolution was passed that there should be issued "30,000 new shares of £10 each on the following terms and conditions—namely, the new shares to entitle the holders thereof to a dividend after the rate of five per cent. per annum upon the amount for the time being called up thereon, and taking precedence of, and priority over, all dividends and claims of the holders of the ordinary shares of the company."

These 30,000 new shares, hereinafter referred to as the "preference shares," were all subscribed for, and the full amount of each was paid up in cash, and the holders thereof, during the continuance of the company, regularly received five per cent. per annum thereon out of the profits of the company, which were also sufficient to pay an annual dividend averaging about eight per cent. to the holders of the ordinary shares, of which 100,000 shares of £10 each had been issued, upon which £3 10s. per share had been paid up.

The whole of the undertaking of the Bridgewater Navigation Co. was purchased by the Manchester Ship Canal Co. under statutory powers for the sum of £1,710,000, and by special resolutions passed in August, 1887, it was resolved that the Bridgewater Co. should be wound up voluntarily. After payment of all debts and liabilities of the company and repayment to the shareholders of their paid-up capital there remained a surplus of about £850,000.

On January 16, 1888, on a summons taken out by the liquidators to have the mode of distribution of this surplus determined as between the holders of preference and the holders of ordinary shares in the company, North, J., decided that the surplus was to be distributed amongst all the shareholders (preference and ordinary) in proportion to the amounts paid up on their shares. The holders of ordinary shares appealed.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the appellant, T. H. Birch, who had been appointed to represent the ordinary shareholders.—Our first contention is that this surplus should be distributed among the shareholders in the proportion in which they are entitled to the profits of the company as a going concern, and, therefore, that the preference shareholders are only entitled to a return of their capital, plus five per cent. thereon up to the day on which their capital is returned, but are entitled to nothing more, and any other good thing enures for the benefit of the ordinary shareholder, the preference shareholder having bargained away his share in the profits for the preference: Robinson v. Ashton, 23 W. R. 674, L. R. 20 Eq. 25; Watney v. Wells, 15 W. R. 627, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 250; that was the principle of distribution adopted in Binney v. Mutris, ante, p. 129, 12 App. Cas. 160; Somes v. Currie, 1 K. & J. 605, 3 W. R. Ch. Dig. 76; and see Lindley on Partnership, 5th ed., p. 403. It is also the proper principle according to the reasoning of the judgments in Sheppard v. Scinde, &c, Railway Co., ante, p. 1, though the actual decision there, under the circumstances of the case, was distribution according to the amount paid up. Again, as an alternative contention, we say that as this is a winding up, the calls unpaid on the shares should be treated as called upon and then divided: In re Hodges' Distillery Co., Ex parte

Maude, 19 W. R. 119, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 51, otherwise there would be no settled principle of distribution.

The point raised in the court below on behalf of the ordinary shareholders, that the issue of preference shares was ultra vires, was expressly abandoned on the appeal.

Rigby, Q.C., Buckley, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the respondent, G. H. Schofield, who had been appointed to represent the preference shareholders.—The result of the articles and resolutions is that the preference shareholders have the exclusive privilege of getting five per cent. before the others get anything, but that in all other respects the rights of both classes stand on the same footing. This surplus, though a profit, is not a profit arising from the carrying on of the business; it arises from the undertaking itself, and is, in fact, "capital profits." Neither Watney v. Wells nor Robinson v. Ashton decide that a surplus arising in this way is to be divided as profits. Binney v. Mutrie does not touch this case, as there it was provided by the partnership articles that the business itself, and not merely the profits, should be divided in certain proportions, and in Somes v. Currie the distribution was determined by the special circumstances of the case. When the contract is silent, as it is here, as to the division of capital profits, the principle is that distribution must be proportionate to contribution: Sheppard v. Scinde, &c., Railway Co. The fact that distribution takes place in a winding up makes no difference. Section 133, sub-section 9, of the Act of 1862, is only applicable for the purposes of making calls either for the purposes of the business or to provide for debts and liabilities, but here there are no liabilities and there can be no carrying on the business, which is dead.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., in reply.—There must be some definite principle for distribution of surplus assets in a voluntary winding up under the Act of 1862. Distribution according to the amount paid up is not founded on any principle, but depends on mere accident. The principle must be either (1) distribution in the proportion that the shareholders are entitled to share profits—i.e., profits as a going concern—or (2) distribution in proportion to the shareholders' share in the capital of the company. Section 133 (1) of the Act of 1862* shows that distribution† under a voluntary winding up is to be "according to the rights and interests in the company" of the members, and where the articles are silent on the point the common law principles of partnership must govern, and the words "according to their rights and interests in the company" must mean "according to their shares"—that is, according to their subscribed shares: Griffith v. Paget, 25 W. R. 821, 6 Ch. D. 511; Oakbank Oil Co. v. Crum, 8 App. Cas. 65, 31 W. R. Dig. 37. Each share of the ordinary shareholders in the capital of the company is a £10 share, not a £3 10s. share. The utmost the preference shareholders can ask for, is the capitalized value of five per cent.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and S. Arthur Sampson, for the liquidator.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 15.—COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of North, J., as to the division of a sum of money paid to the Bridgewater Navigation Co., which is being wound up voluntarily under extraordinary circumstances, as the assets of the company are sufficient, after payment of all liabilities and after returning to the shareholders the amount paid up on their shares, to leave a very large surplus.

There were two classes of shareholders in the company—viz., the holders of ordinary shares of £10 each, of which £3 10s. only was paid up and no more had ever been called for, and the holders of preference shares, also of £10 each, but on which the whole amount has been paid up. The question is, How, as between these two classes, the surplus assets is to be distributed? North, J., decided that the surplus should be divided among all the shareholders in proportion to the amounts paid up on their shares. The holders of the ordinary shares have now appealed from that.

The question has arisen in the voluntary winding up of the company under the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, and I will at once refer to the material sections of the Act. [The Lord Justice read section 133, sub-section (1), and continued:—] On the construction of that sub-section alone it might be said that the surplus assets should be divided per share—i.e., that each share was to have its aliquot proportion, not according to the amount paid up thereon, but according to the shareholders' respective rights and interests in the company; but that can hardly be the true meaning of the sub-section, for an earlier section—viz., section 109, which applied to the case of a winding up by the court or under the supervision of the court—provides that the court shall adjust the rights of the contributories amongst themselves, and distribute any surplus that may remain amongst the parties entitled thereto. It can hardly be that those two clauses should be contradictory, so that where the winding up was by the court, or under the supervision of the court, the surplus assets should be distributed in a different way from that adopted in a voluntary winding up. In my opinion the two sections must be read together, and, therefore, there cannot be attributed to section 133, sub-section (1), a direction to divide the property per share. The effect of that is that it is left, in the one case, to the court, and in the other to the liquidator, to divide the assets among the parties entitled thereto.

What ought to be done in the present case? The first contention of Sir Horace Davey was that the preference shareholders are entitled to nothing more than five per cent. on their shares, and that all the profits beyond five per cent. should go to the ordinary shareholders; and, secondly, if that were not so, that the utmost the preference shareholders would be entitled to receive was the capitalized value of the five per cent.

To determine this question it is necessary to look at the articles and the resolutions under which the preference shares were issued. [The Lord Justice then read the articles and resolutions set out above, and continued:—] In my opinion, having regard to these articles and resolutions, it would be wrong to say that the preference shareholders can get nothing more than five per cent. on their shares. No doubt these surplus assets are profits in one sense, but not profits arising from the carrying on the business of the company as a going concern. In my opinion, therefore, the provision that the preference shareholders were to have a five per cent. preferential dividend out of the profits, and that all the rest of the profits were to go to the ordinary shareholders, does not apply to such profits as these, arising from the augmented value of capital of the company obtained by a beneficial sale of its undertaking; the provision as to the five per cent. preferential dividend not being intended to apply, and not applying, to what takes place after the carrying on the business has stopped. It would be a violation of the articles to hold otherwise. These two contentions, therefore, put forward on behalf of the ordinary shareholders, cannot prevail. Then it was said that, there being a winding up, provision should first be made for a call of £6 10s., the amount unpaid on the ordinary shares, and then that the whole should be divided equally, and the case of Sheppard v. Scinde, &c., Railway Co. was distinguished, on the ground that it was not a case of a winding up under the Companies Act, 1862, as this is. Where there is any deficiency of assets, and any power to make calls exists, the ordinary course is to make the calls, and, if that is not actually done, to treat it as done, and to deal with the remainder of the assets on that footing. But that principle only applies where there is some deficiency, and in my opinion none of the cases of that class throw any light on a case like the present one. I think that here there ought to be a distribution in accordance with the order made by North, J. All the shareholders are now to be treated as shareholders having equal rights, and the articles of the company indicate that profits are to be divided in accordance with the sums paid up on each share. The proper mode of distribution of this surplus is to divide it among all the shareholders in proportion to the sums paid up by them respectively. The same principle was acted on in Sheppard v. Scinde, &c., Railway Co., though the case itself was not exactly similar to this. One cannot lay down any definite rule as to the distribution of assets in partnerships generally and without having regard to the contract contained in the articles in each particular case. I do not express any opinion as to the principle cited to us from Lindley on Partnership, 4th ed., vol. 1, p. 679.

* Section 133 (1) of the Companies Act, 1862, enacts:—"The property of the company shall be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu, and, subject thereto, shall, unless it be otherwise provided by the regulations of the company, be distributed amongst the members according to their rights and interests in the company."

† Section 109 enacts:—"The court shall adjust the rights of the contributories amongst themselves and distribute any surplus that may remain amongst the parties entitled thereto."

FRY, L.J.—This case is an unusual one, if not unique. This is not a case of there being any deficiency of assets, but, on the contrary, of there being l'embarras des richesses: The question arises in the voluntary winding up of the company, under section 133, as to the distribution of surplus assets, after returning the amount of paid-up capital, according to the rights and interests of the members of the company; there is an apparent contradiction between section 133 (1) and section 109, but it is only apparent, and there is no real discrepancy between them, because the members of the company are the persons entitled thereto.

It is, therefore, incumbent on us to inquire what are the rights and interests of the members in this company. There were two classes of shareholders, and the difference between them is of a twofold character—first, as to dividend and the rights of priority; and, second, as to the amount paid up on the shares. Does the first difference—viz., that the preference shareholder should receive five per cent. dividend in priority—make any difference for the present purpose. [The Lord Justice read article 3 of the later articles, and continued:—] By this article power is given to the company to create new capital carrying preferential rights to dividend—which means, I think, annual dividend—and carrying such priority in the distribution of assets as the company may direct, with power also to postpone the payment of dividends or the distribution of assets, but except in so far as these powers are acted on the preference and the ordinary shareholders are placed in the same position. Now a resolution has been passed creating new shares, with a right of dividend at the rate of five per cent. on the capital paid up thereon in priority to the right of dividend of the ordinary shareholders. That resolution relates only to dividend, which I think means annual dividend. The other powers have not been exercised, and, therefore, except only in the right to a preferential annual dividend at the rate of five per cent., no difference is created by that preference. The second point of difference is the amount required to be paid up on the shares. Then article 85 of the later articles says that dividends are to be paid on the shares in proportion to the amounts paid-up thereon; and, therefore, the amounts paid-up being unequal, the right to dividend is unequal. How, therefore, ought this surplus fund to be distributed? The shares are all of one nominal amount, and the right to vote in respect thereof is the same in all, but the right to dividend is unequal, it is according to the amount paid up on the shares. Which of these rights is the determining, the guiding right as to distribution? Clearly, in my opinion, it is the right to dividend which must determine the right of distribution.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely concur with the rest of the court in their view as to the proper mode of distribution, and will only add with reference to the case of Sheppard v. Scinde, &c., Railway Co., that, though it differed in many respects from the present case, the decision involves the same principle on which we are now acting.

Bankruptcy — Married woman trading separately—Marriage settlement—Life estate—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1, sub-section 5; s. 19.

A married woman who traded separately from her husband was adjudicated bankrupt in respect of her separate property pursuant to section 1, sub-section 5, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Under her marriage settlement she was entitled to a life estate in certain property for her separate use, but without any restraint on anticipation.

Held, by Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ. (Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting), that her life estate vested in the trustee in bankruptcy, as the claim of the trustee did not "interfere with or affect the settlement" within the meaning of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the trustee claiming under and not against the settlement.

Appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court reversing an order of the judge of the Brentford County Court, whereby he directed the trustee in bankruptcy to pay to the bankrupt the net rents received by the trustee from the tenants of certain freehold property, and directing an account.

The bankrupt was a married woman who carried on a trade separately from her husband. Previously to her marriage she executed a marriage settlement, by which she conveyed certain freehold houses belonging to her to a trustee upon trust to pay the rents and profits to her during her life for her sole and separate use, but without any restraint on anticipation, and after her decease upon trust for such person or persons as she should, whether covert or sole, by deed or will appoint, and in default of any such appointment upon trust for her children.

On the 6th of May, 1884, the settlor was adjudged bankrupt,* and the trustee in bankruptcy received the rents from the tenants of the houses included in the settlement. The county court judge made an order for repayment by the trustee of the net rents to the bankrupt, but the Divisional Court (Cave and A. L. Smith, JJ.), feeling themselves bound by the judgments in In re Armstrong, 17 Q. B. D. 167, which were reversed by the Court of Appeal on a different ground (34 W. R. 709, 17 Q. B. D. 521), reversed the order, but gave leave to appeal.

The bankrupt appealed.

Ribton, for the appellant.—A married woman's bankruptcy under section 1, sub-section 5, is a qualified bankruptcy—that is, it only extends to her separate property. But the effect of section 19 is to exclude separate property comprised in a marriage settlement, as nothing in the Act is to "interfere with or affect" any marriage settlement. That means that neither the provisions of a marriage settlement nor the rights of the parties under it are to be affected: In re Whitaker, 35 W. R. 217, 34 Ch. D. 227. Every kind of separate property would come within section 1, sub-section 5, but separate property under a marriage settlement is by section 19 taken out of the operation of the former section.

He referred to Smith v. Whitlock, 34 W. R. 414; In re Stonor's Trusts, 32 W. R. 413, 24 Ch. D. 195; Beckett v. Tasker, ante, p. 158, 19 Q. B. D. 7; In re Armstrong, 17 Q. B. D. 167, 34 W. R. 709, 17 Q. B. D. 521; and Hancock v. Hancock, ante, p. 417, 38 Ch. D. 78.

Yate Lee, for the trustee.—The trustee does not seek to "interfere with or affect" the settlement; he wishes to take the property under the settlement. Section 19 means that where any property would have been bound by a settlement but for the provisions of this Act, then nothing in the Act is to prevent the property being so bound. The restriction contained in section 19 must be applied to all the sections of the Act, and not alone to the bankruptcy section. If the contention of the bankrupt is correct, it would exclude the interest of a woman under a marriage settlement from the provisions of section 1, sub-section 2, and sections 4, 12, 13, and 14. Section 20, as to the liability of a married woman to maintain her husband, is similar to section 13 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, but the construction contended for by the other side would cut down that liability in the case of property coming to her under a marriage settlement. In re Whitaker was a case where the property, but for section 19, would not have been brought within the settlement.

He also referred to In re Queade's Trusts, 33 W. R. 816; Scott v. Morley, ante, p. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120.

Ribton replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 23.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case a married woman carried on a trade separately from her husband, and in respect to that trade was made a bankrupt under section 1, sub-section 5, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. The question raised is whether her life interest in certain property under her marriage settlement passes to her trustee in bankruptcy, and that depends upon the true construction of section 19. In my opinion it is impossible to understand that section unless one considers the purview and objects of the statute. One of the main objects, though, of course, not the only object, of the statute seems to me to have been to provide for the case of married women of limited means, who may have to employ their talents and industry in earning their living, and whose means might be taken by their husbands for their own purposes. The Legislature contemplated that a married woman might carry on a trade separately from her husband, in this respect showing that they were thinking not so much of wealthy people as of persons of limited means who would have to employ their skill and labour in a trade. You would not expect in the case of such persons an elaborate settlement with clauses against anticipation. Property is settled upon a woman, either by an ante-nuptial or a post-nuptial settlement, to provide means for her subsistence and thus to keep her from want. Therefore, in a statute which has for its object the protection of married women's property, I should expect that the Legislature would not deprive a married woman of the protection which she had before the Act. I can understand, if a married woman engages in a trade, the Legislature refusing to protect any property which has not been settled upon her. They may well say that everything except that which is settled upon her for her subsistence by a marriage settlement, whether it was originally her property or not, is to be subject to bankruptcy. The Act, without doubt, is a most difficult one to construe, and some of the provisions appear to be founded upon no intelligible principle. But when the sections are examined, the main object of the Act appears to me to be, as I have said, the protection of married women who earn their own livelihood.

Then by sub-section 5 of section 1 a married woman carrying on a trade separately from her husband is to be subject to a limited bankruptcy. I should expect that out of that wreck something would be saved to prevent her from starving. I should expect that property settled upon her by a marriage settlement would not be subject to bankruptcy. There is ample property to go into bankruptcy without it. Accordingly section 19 provides that nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with or affect any settlement. The word "affect" seems to me to have a different meaning from "interfere with," and refers to the meaning and interpretation of the settlement. With regard to the words "interfere with," it is said that to take away every advantageous effect of a settlement is not to interfere with it, but to leave it intact. That point seems to me to be too minute and too fine for the affairs of real life. In my opinion you interfere with a settlement if you do away with or diminish its ordinary and natural result or effect. It is clear to me that if this life estate passes to the trustee in bankruptcy the ordinary and natural result and effect of the settlement is interfered with. Section 1, sub-section 5, would make this life estate subject to the bankruptcy. The Act therefore brings it within the bankruptcy laws. Then section 19 provides that nothing in the Act is to interfere with or affect any settlement, referring, as I think, to a marriage settlement. In my opinion those words take a marriage settlement out of the operation of the Act. I can give no other meaning to the section than that. It is exactly what I should have anticipated the Legislature would have done. Property comprised in a marriage settlement which has been settled upon a married woman as a protection against want is not to be touched. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that this life estate was not subject to bankruptcy, and that the appeal ought to be allowed.

LINDLEY, L.J., read the following judgment:—The question in this case turns on the construction of section

* 45 & 46 Vict. c. 75, s. 1, sub-section 5:—"Every married woman carying on a trade separately from her husband shall, in respect of her separate property, be subject to the bankruptcy laws in the same way as if she were a feme sole."

Section 19.—"Nothing in this Act contained shall interefere with or affect any settlement or agreement for a settlement made or to be made, whether before or after marriage, respecting the property of any married woman," &c.

19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, taken in connection with section 1, sub-section 5, of the same Act.

Mrs. Armstrong carried on a trade separately from her husband, and thereby became in respect of her separate property subject to the bankruptcy laws as if she were a feme sole: see section 1, sub-section 5. She committed an act of bankruptcy, and was thereupon adjudicated bankrupt. But, as decided by this court (34 W. R. 709, 17 Q. B. D. 521), her bankruptcy only affected her separate property, and did not affect property over which she had only a power of appointment, and which, in default of appointment, would belong to other people. On her marriage in 1881 some property was settled on her for life for her separate use with remainders over. There was no clause in the settlement restraining her from anticipation.

The question now arises whether this life estate has passed to her trustee in bankruptcy, or whether she is entitled to enjoy it notwithstanding her bankruptcy. The trustee claims it under the Bankruptcy Act, and he is entitled to it under that Act, unless his title is excluded by section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. It is contended for Mrs. Armstrong that if it had not been for section 1, sub-section 5, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the trustee could not have claimed her life interest, and that his claim thereto, being based on that section, is one to which effect cannot be given without interfering with or affecting her settlement contrary to section 19. It was further contended on her behalf that the effect of section 19 is to render it necessary to distinguish separate property to which a married woman is or becomes entitled under some settlement or agreement for a settlement and separate property to which she is or becomes entitled in some other way; and that, whilst section 1, sub-section 5, applies to a married woman's unsettled separate property, it does not apply to separate property which she takes under a settlement.

If the Act is examined it will be seen that it not only makes that to be separate property which was not so before in the absence of some agreement or trust to that effect, but the Act also annexes to separate property consequences which were not before incident to it or not incident to it to the same extent as under the Act—for example, see section 1, sub-sections 3 and 4. In extending the rights of married women care has also been taken to protect their creditors, and in some cases to extend the rights of the creditors against the separate property of married women with whom they have dealt. Now it will be observed that section 19 does not say that nothing in the Act shall interfere with or affect the incidents annexed by the Act to separate estate or the consequences which follow its creation. Section 19 refers in the early part of it to settlements, and the words "interfere with or affect any settlement" mean invalidate or render inoperative any settlement. Settlements, creating separate estate are to have the same effect as if the Act had not passed, and, so read, the section is an important proviso on section 2 and section 5. In this case the trustee is claiming under the settlement, not against it; he is not interfering with or affecting it. He claims the life estate created by it, because the married woman entitled to that life estate has done an act which amounts in point of law to an alienation of it. It is true that but for the Act she could not have been made bankrupt, or could not have aliened her life estate in the particular mode in which she has done so. But no alienation of her life estate, be it voluntary or be it involuntary, is an interference with the settlement, nor does such alienation affect it. The second clause of section 19 shows that interfering with a settlement means something different from affecting an estate created by it. The second clause would not be wanted if the construction contended for were correct.

Mr. Ribton's argument is, in truth, open to the objection that it proves too much. Considering that by far the largest portion of separate property is created by settlement, and that his argument, if acceded to, would take all separate property so created out of the operation of the Act, the consequence would be that the Act would have left the old law to apply to settled separate property, and the new to unsettled separate property. Such a construction of the Act would not only lead to the utmost confusion, but would be destructive of one of the main objects of the Act, which was to extend to all married women having separate estate, and to their creditors, the rights enumerated in the various sections. I can find no warrant for drawing any distinction between separate property acquired by settlement and separate property otherwise acquired as regards the consequences attaching to it when acquired. To draw such a distinction would not be to give effect to the statute, but practically to destroy its operations to a very great, and, in my opinion, very alarming extent.

The appeal ought to be dismissed.

I may add that in my judgment section 19 applies to all settlements, whether made before or after marriage, and is not confined to what are properly called marriage settlements, such as that made in this case.

LOPES, L.J., read the following judgment:—I agree with the judgment of Lindley, L.J., and cannot agree with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

Mrs. Armstrong, the bankrupt, under the settlement was entitled to the rents and profits of the houses during her life for her separate use, but expressly without any restraint on anticipation. A power is given to her to appoint the property by deed or will to such persons, for such estates, as she shall think fit. Subject to that the trustee is to hold the property for the benefit of the only child by a previous marriage and the children of the intended marriage. There are other powers. The court has now to deal only with the life interest of the bankrupt. The question is whether the life interest of the bankrupt in these houses is available for the benefit of her creditors, as being her separate property within sub-section 5 of section 1 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. No restraint on anticipation being imposed, the bankrupt has an absolute power of disposition in respect of her life estate. That the life estate is, in the circumstances of this case, separate property and subject to the bankruptcy laws, is beyond question, unless it can be brought within section 19 of the same Act. There being no restriction against anticipation, the words of section 19 applicable are, "Nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with or affect any settlement, or agreement for a settlement, made or to be made, whether before or after marriage, respecting the property of any married woman." It is contended that this limits the meaning of the words "separate property" in sub-section 5 of section 1, and makes those words applicable only to unsettled, as distinguished from settled, separate property; in fact, excluding from the operation of sub-section 5 of section 1 all separate property which is settled, although the married woman has absolute power of disposing of it inter vivos or by will in the same way as a feme sole. It would require strong and unequivocal language to justify such a construction. The Legislature, in my opinion, contemplated nothing so unreasonable. All that is intended is that the provisions of settlements are not by the Act to be invalidated. It is an interference with the provisions of the settlements, not an interference with settled property under settlements over which the married woman has absolute control, that is contemplated. If the trustee here was claiming in derogation of the provisions of the settlement, I could understand Mr. Ribton's contention; but he is really claiming under, and in affirmance of, the provisions—claiming in the same way as any other alienee to whom the life interest was conveyed, the only difference being that the alienation here is the act of the law, and not the voluntary act of the party.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the life interest of the bankrupt in these houses is her separate property within sub-section 5 of section 1, and that section 19 does not prevent that sub-section from applying.

Appeal dismissed.

REG. (ON THE RELATION OF F. K. MUNTON) v. LORD TRURO. (a.)

Middlesex Registry Act—Copyhold estates—Enfranchisement deed—Attesting witness—Execution by grantor or grantee—Commissioners to administer oaths—Masters in chancery ordinary and extraordinary—7 Anne, c. 20, ss. 1, 5, 17—15 & 16 Vict. c. 80—16 & 17 Vict. c. 78, s. 2.

An enfranchisement deed is not a deed merely conveying copyhold estates, but one conveying the freehold, and is therefore not within the exception of 7 Anne, c. 20, s. 17, excluding from registration copyhold estates.

It is not necessary that one of the witnesses attesting the memorial of a deed to be enrolled in the registry under 7 Anne, c. 20, s. 5, shall be a witness to the execution of the deed by a grantor, and it is sufficient if he be a witness to the execution of the deed by a grantee.

A London commissioner to administer oaths in chancery appointed under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 78, s. 2, has power to administer the oath required by 7 Anne, c. 20, s. 5.

This was an appeal from two decisions of two divisional courts (reported 35 W. R. 808, W. N., 1888, p. 91), granting a mandamus directing Lord Truro to receive and register a certain deed in the Middlesex Registry.

The deed in question was an indenture made between the Duke of Northumberland and Earl Percy of the one part, and George Bohn and F. K. Munton of the other part, and was an enfranchisement deed whereby the copyhold lands held by Bohn and Munton were granted to them as freehold. Three points were raised—(1) Whether the estate conveyed by the deed was not one which was exempted from registration under 7 Anne, c. 20, s. 17; (2) Whether the witness required to take the oath of execution may be the witness to the execution of the deed by either grantor or grantee under section 5 of that Act; (3) Whether the oath of such witness may be taken before a London commissioner to administer oaths qualified under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 78, s. 2.

Section 17 of 7 Anne, c. 20 provides that this Act shall not extend to any copyhold estates, &c.

Section 5 of 7 Anne, c. 20, so far as material for this report, provides:—"All memorials so to be registered shall be put into writing in vellum or parchment and brought to the said office, and, in case of deeds and conveyances, shall be under the hand and seal of some one of the grantors, or some or one of the grantees, his or their heirs, &c., attested by two witnesses, one whereof to be one of the witnesses to the execution of such deed or conveyance, which witness shall, upon his oath before one of the said registrars or masters, or before a master in chancery ordinary or extraordinary, prove the signing and sealing of such memorial and the execution of the deed or conveyance mentioned in such memorial, which respective oaths the said registrars or masters and masters in chancery are hereby empowered to administer."

By 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80 the masters in ordinary were abolished.

By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 78, ss. 1, 2, it is provided that:—

(1) The persons now styled masters extraordinary in chancery shall cease to be so styled, and they and all persons hereafter appointed by the Lord Chancellor to execute like duties in England shall be designated "commissioners to administer oaths in chancery in England," and shall possess and exercise all such powers and discharge all such duties as now appertain to the office of master extraordinary in chancery by virtue of any statute or order of the Court of Chancery, or of the Lord Chancellor, or usage in that behalf or otherwise.

(2) It shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor from time to time to appoint any persons practising as solicitors within ten miles from Lincoln's-inn Hall at their respective places of business to administer oaths and take declarations, affirmations, and attestations of honour in chancery, and to possess all such other powers and to discharge all such other duties as aforesaid, and such persons shall be styled "London commissioners to administer oaths in chancery."

The Judicature Act, 1873, s. 77, in effect attached all commissioners appointed under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 78 to the Supreme Court.

The oath of the attesting witness, who was a witness to the execution of the deed by a grantee, had been taken before a London commissioner qualified under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 78, s. 2.

Channell, Q.C., and W. B. Trevelyan (Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., with them), for Lord Truro.—Firstly, this is not such a deed as the registrar can be required to register. 7 Anne, c. 20, s. 17, excludes from the Act copyhold estates. This is a conveyance of a copyhold estate, and therefore not within the Act. Secondly, the witness who has taken the oath of execution was a witness to the execution by a grantee only—that is, a person who is not a necessary party. The witness should be witness to execution by a party from whom estate moves: Jack v. Armstrong, 1 Hud. & B. 727, a decision on the Irish Registration Act, in which similar words are used; In re Stephens, Ir. Rep. 10 Eq. 282, 24 W. R. Dig. 125. Lord St. Leonards says (V. & P., 8th ed., p. 970: "The intention of the Legislature clearly was that no deed should be memorialized the execution of which by the granting party was not proved, because execution by the grantee is by an unnecessary party." But the note is omitted in the later editions of Lord St. Leonards' book. [They also cited Sadlier v. Biggs, 4 H. L. Cas. 435; Davidson's Precedents (1877), p. 197.] On the third point—viz., whether the commissioner before whom the oath was taken was competent to receive the oath required by the Act—the same arguments and cases were urged as in the court below.

R. T. Reid, Q.C. (W. Murray with him), for F. K. Munton, was called upon only on the second point as to the witness.—Section 5, whilst expressly referring to grantor and grantee, does not draw the distinction in regard to the witness required to take the oath. The Irish Act, though similar in the words used in the corresponding section in its preamble, says it was expressly passed to guard against forgeries, and not merely to secure publicity as under this Act.

He also cited Essex v. Baugh, 1 Y. & C. C. C. 620.

COTTON, L.J.—Several points have been argued in this case, of which the first and most important is, whether a deed of the description in this case is one which requires registration. It is submitted by Lord Truro that this deed, being an enfranchisement deed, is not subject to registration under the Act of Anne, which, in section 17, provides that the Act "shall not extend to any copy-hold estates," but this is a wrong construction, for this is not a deed relating to copyhold estates but relating to the freehold, and conveying the freehold to the copyhold tenant, and not merely a conveyance of a copyhold estate, which is all that is excluded by this section of the Act. We have here a conveyance of land with all the mines and minerals thereunder, and any subsequent purchaser would obtain the freehold and not a copyhold interest.

The second point is as to whether the witness to the memorial, who was a witness of the execution of the deed by the grantees, was competent to take the oath required by section 5, it being contended by Lord Truro that, by section 5, the witness to be sworn must be a witness to the execution by a grantor, which was not the case here. Now section 5 says that memorials in the case of deeds and conveyances shall be under the hand and seal of some or one of the grantors, or some or one of the grantees, his or their heirs, executors, or administrators, attested by two witnesses, one whereof to be one of the witnesses to the execution of such deed or conveyance, "which witness shall, upon his oath before one of the said registrars or masters, or before a master in chancery, ordinary or extraordinary, prove the signing and sealing of such memorial, and the execution of the deed or conveyance mentioned in such memorial." But the construction contended for on behalf of Lord Truro is too narrow, and the witness to the execution of the deed by the grantee, though it is not absolutely necessary for the grantee to execute the deed, is sufficient. In this very section a distinction is drawn between the grantor and grantee, and if it had been intended to make a distinction as to the witnesses the section would have said so. Possibly the procedure was adopted to prevent fictitious deeds being placed on the register. My only doubt on this point arose through what was said by Lord St. Leonards in his book on Vendors and Purchasers, 8th ed., p. 970, and to a decision in the Irish courts on the Irish Act. Now the opinion of Lord St. Leonards is worthy of the greatest respect, as he was an eminent lawyer, but it is a remarkable fact that the note on this point is omitted in the later editions of his book. The Irish decision is on the Irish Act, in which similar language is used in the corresponding section, but the preamble of that Act shows that one of its objects was to guard against forgeries, and this probably accounts for the decision. We are not bound by the Irish decision, and so we act on our own opinion, and we think the objection is not good. As to the last point, it is suggested that the person before whom the oath was taken is not a proper person to take the oath. The Act provides (section 5) that the oath is to be taken before one of the registrars or masters, or before a master in chancery, ordinary or extraordinary, and it is said that as they have been abolished it cannot be taken before their practical successors. To determine this we must look to the Act of 1853 alone for our decision. For the Judicature Act does not deprive a London commissioner of any power he had before that Act was passed. Now prior to the Act of 1853 the masters were authorized to take the oath of persons residing in certain circles, and when the masters were abolished the Act of 1853 appointed commissioners in their place, but it is suggested that the duty was originally imposed on the masters as personæ designatæ, and not as part of their office, and therefore did not pass to the commissioners who succeeded them. But I think the Act of Anne gave the powers and duties to those fulfilling the office, and in fact the registrar does not raise the objection in respect of affidavits sworn before commissioners beyond the ten mile radius to which the jurisdiction of country commissioners was limited. Now section 1 gives the powers of masters extraordinary to country commissioners outside the ten mile radius, and section 2 gives the like powers to London commissioners, and section 5 provides that the powers of the Lord Chancellor for the appointment of commissioners to take oaths shall not be limited. The present commissioners are appointed in substitution for the old masters. The appeal therefore fails.

BOWEN, L.J., I concur as to the first and third points, and I only touch on the second because our decision is apparently at variance with the Irish decision on the similar words of the Irish Act. Section 5 of the Act of Queen Anne provides that the oath is to be taken by one of the witnesses who was a witness to the execution of the deed, and it is contended that no one can be such a witness except a person who saw the execution of the deed by the party from whom the estate moves. The section is doubtful, but there are several reasons against this construction. Nothing in the Act says the witness is to be a witness of the execution by the person from whom the estates moves. Now who are the witnesses of a deed executed by more than one party: where there are several grantors and grantees all the witnesses of all the parties are the witnesses to the deed. Now the section says when it speaks of the witness to the execution that the oath is to be taken by one of the witnesses to the execution. This is amply satisfied by producing one of the class. We receive considerable guidance from the preamble of the Act. The object of the Act is "for the publick registry of deeds, conveyances, and wills, and other incumbrances which shall be made of or that may affect" any hereditaments in Middlesex—that is, the object of the Act is to prevent secret conveyances. Publicity and notice to the world of owners of property is the object to be borne in mind in construing the Act. It imposes certain solemnities without which, but for the Act, the deeds would be perfectly valid, on pain of forfeiture. It is, therefore, a penal Act, and therefore no wider construction should be given than necessary for carrying out the object of the Legislature. Here lies the distinction between the Irish case and this case. The object of the Irish Act was to strike at forgery, and not secrecy only. This being the object of the Irish statute, the court might well think they would not secure the entire object of the Legislature without coming to the conclusion they did. As to the opinion of Lord St. Leonards, I have nothing to add to the view expressed by Cotton, L.J.

REG. v. COMMISSIONERS FOR SPECIAL PURPOSES OF INCOME TAX. (a.)

Revenue—Income tax—Claim for repayment—Discovery and proof of over-assessment—"Within or at the end of the year"—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 133.

By section 133 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, "If, within or at the end of the year current at the time of making any assessment under this Act, . . . any person . . . shall find and shall prove to the satisfaction of the commissioners by whom the assessment was made that his profits and gains during such year for which the computation was made fell short of the sum so computed, . . . it shall be lawful for the said commissioners, . . . in case the sum assessed shall have been paid, to certify under their hands to the commissioners for special purposes the amount of the sum overpaid, . . . and thereupon the last-named commissioners shall issue an order for the repayment of such sum as shall have been so overpaid."

In March, 1887, the appellants made a claim for repayment of income tax assessed on profits for the years ending April, 1884, and April, 1885. The general commissioners, after inquiry, granted their certificate. The special commissioners having refused to issue an order for the repayment of the sum, application was made for a mandamus to compel them to do so.

Held, that a mandamus would lie, and that the meaning of the section was that the over-assessment should be found and proved as soon after the end of the year as, by using all reasonable and proper exertions, the applicant could ascertain it.

Per Lord Esher, M.R.—The general commissioners are the final judges as to whether the application has been made in time or not, and their certificate is binding on the special commissioners, who have no power to question their decision.

Per Lindley, L.J.—When a certificate has been granted by the general commissioners, the onus of proving that the application was not made in time is thrown on the Crown, and the mere production of the dates of the application and of the years for which the certificate has been granted is not sufficient ground for disregarding the certificate.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Cave and Grantham, JJ.), ante, p. 671, 20 Q. B. D. 549.

In March, 1887, the Cape Copper Mining Co. (Limited) applied to the general commissioners for income tax for certificates entitling them to a repayment of income tax alleged to have been overpaid in the years of assessment ending respectively April 5, 1884, April 5, 1885, and April 5, 1886. The general commissioners, after due inquiry, granted a certificate for each year. On the case coming before the special commissioners they allowed the claim for 1886, but disallowed the other two. The company then applied to the Divisional Court for a mandamus to compel the special commissioners to order repayment of the overpayments for 1884 and 1885. The Divisional Court differed, Grantham, J., holding that a mandamus should be granted, and Cave, J., that it should not. Grantham, J., having withdrawn his judgment, the Cape Copper Mining Co. appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 23.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the appellant company had been assessed to, and had paid, income tax in respect of the trade carried on by them. They asserted a considerable time afterwards that they had overpaid, and they accordingly applied for a repayment. The case was taken before the general assessment commissioners, and they inquired into the matter, and after hearing the facts came to the conclusion that there had been an overpayment, and they gave a certificate to that effect. If they had jurisdiction to inquire, there is no doubt that the certificate is in proper form. The certificate is then taken by the company to the special commissioners, and they are asked to make an order for the repayment of the money so overpaid. That they declined to do, on the ground that the general commissioners had exceeded their jurisdiction in granting the certificate. Thereupon application is made for a mandamus to compel the special commissioners to make the order.

On the one side objection was taken that a mandamus would not lie against the special commissioners, and on the other it was said that the certificate when once granted was binding on the special commissioners, and that they had no power to say that the general commissioners had acted without jurisdiction. The Divisional Court were divided in their opinion, and, the junior judge having withdrawn his judgment, the decision stands that the mandamus is not to issue.

Now as to the first point I think there is no difference of opinion here that the special commissioners have a public duty to perform, and, therefore, that if this be a proper case for a mandamus, a mandamus will lie. Now is this a proper case? Had the special commissioners any right or power to object to the certificate which had been granted? It may well be that it is no part of the duty of the special commissioners to raise objection to certificates granted by the general commissioners. It may be that it is the duty of the Crown to interfere if the certificate has been improperly granted, and to move to have it brought up and quashed. But I think it is unnecessary to decide that now. The question really depends on the true construction of section 133 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35. The objection is that the appellant company did not find and prove the admitted overpayment "within or at the end of the year current" at the time of making the assessment. It is clear that it was not discovered or proved within the year. Was it, however, found and proved at the end of the year? It is not suggested that the words "at the end of the year" must be read in their strictest sense as meaning the very moment at which the year ends. The contention on the one side is that the words mean at any time after the end of the year, and on the other that they mean as nearly as possible to the end of the year, and that a period must be laid down by the court, and every case brought within it. The section deals with a matter of business, and it must be dealt with in a business-like common-sense way. In my opinion neither of the contentions is entirely correct. There are cases in which the discovery of an overpayment may obviously be made clear in a very short time, but where mercantile people who are engaged in very large transactions are in question it is impossible to say that an overpayment can be discovered with the same ease and speed as in the case of smaller businesses. I think the meaning given to the words must be sufficiently elastic to be reasonably applicable to all cases to which they may apply. I do not think we can say that they mean either at any time after the end of the year or that we can fix an exact period within which they must fall. I think that the discovery and proof of the overpayment must be made in as short a time as, by using all reasonable and proper exertions, the party claiming can possibly have ascertained the fact and amount of the overpayment.

If there is any real delay on the part of the claimant he is too late, but if he has made every exertion which he ought to have made, whether a year or two years have elapsed, he has still satisfied, in my opinion, the meaning of the section if he can show that he could not have found out the overpayment in less time. It must be a matter of inquiry in each case whether all proper exertions have been used. With whom, then, does the decision rest? In my opinion with the general commissioners. It is their duty to decide, first, whether they are satisfied that the discovery of overpayment has been made as soon as possible, and then they have to say whether there has been an actual overpayment proved to their satisfaction. Now can their decision be afterwards questioned? It has been said that their jurisdiction depends upon the proper decision of the first question, and that they cannot give themselves jurisdiction by deciding it wrongly. I have given the matter my careful attention, and I have come to the conclusion that this argument is misleading. No doubt in one sense that formula is right, but it is, I think, inapplicable here. When an inferior tribunal is constituted the Legislature has to consider what power and jurisdiction should be given to it. It may say that if certain facts exist the tribunal will have jurisdiction, but not if they do not exist. Then if that tribunal seeks to exercise that jurisdiction where such facts do not exist they will have no jurisdiction, and cannot give themselves jurisdiction by asserting the existence of such facts. But, on the other hand, if the Legislature entrust them with a jurisdiction over two sets of facts, the one depending upon the other, and give them power to decide whether the preliminary facts exist, the existence of which will entitle them to go further, then they have a comprehensive jurisdiction, and can exercise it as much with regard to the first as with regard to the second set of facts. The Legislature has also to consider in such a case whether an appeal shall be given, and if they grant no appeal there is none. In this case, therefore, I think that the Legislature have given the general commissioners a comprehensive jurisdiction, first, to decide whether the application has been made in time, and, secondly, whether there has really been an overpayment. There is no appeal from their decision on either of these points. In my opinion, therefore, their decision and certificate was final as to both points, and the special commissioners had no power to question their jurisdiction or to refuse to act upon the certificate. Even if I thought that they had not jurisdiction to decide whether the application had been made in time, I think that the Crown have brought forward no facts to show that their decision on this point was wrong. I am, therefore, of opinion that the decision of the Divisional Court as it at present stands, must be reversed, and that this mandamus must go.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns on an examination of a number of sections of the Income Tax Acts, and especially on the true construction of section 133 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35. The real difficulty is as to the meaning of the words "within or at the end of the year." Of course, at the end of the year does not mean when the clock strikes at midnight on the last day of the year. That would be giving to "at the end of the year" the same meaning as "within the year." What construction, then, can we put upon it so that it may be worked in a businesslike manner. The section is applicable to persons engaged in all classes and degrees of business. In this particular case the appellants have offices in this country and mines abroad. It is clear, therefore, that they could not ascertain an overpayment with the same degree of celerity with which it might be discovered by other persons. The company have gone before the general commissioners and have satisfied them both that there has been an overpayment and that they have discovered it within a reasonable time. They have therefore granted the company their certificate. That being so, the special commissioners cannot take up any ground except want of jurisdiction on the part of the general commissioners. If the Master of the Rolls' view is right, that the general commissioners are the final judges of whether the application is in time or not, the special commissioners are bound by the certificate. For my own part I do not think the language of the Act is sufficiently plain to make the general commissioners final judges of what is a proper time. But I think that the certificate throws on the Crown the onus of proving that the application was not made in reasonable time. They have merely produced before us the dates of the application, and I do not think that we should be justified in saying from those alone that the application was made too late. In my opinion the meaning of the section is that the overassessment should be found and proved as soon after the end of each year as is possible, having regard to the facts and circumstances of each particular case. I do not think it means either exactly at the end or at any particular time after the end or even within a reasonable time after the end, unless that implies diligence on the part of the applicant. In this case I think that there are no materials before us from which we can infer that there has not been due diligence in ascertaining the overpayment. I agree, therefore, rather in the view of the section taken by Cave, J., than in that taken by Grantham, J., in the court below, but I think there was no evidence on which the special commissioners could act, and therefore that this money must be repaid.

As to the question of mandamus, I am of opinion that it will lie in this case. It is difficult to draw a precise line, but I think this is not a case for a petition of right. The applicant has to get something before he can apply for the money—namely, an order for its payment.

After looking at the cases cited to us on this point I have come to the conclusion that a mandamus will lie against the special commissioners to compel them to issue an order for the repayment of this money.

Vernon v. Croft. (a.)

Petition — Fund in court — Payment out — Parties — Service — Contingent interests — Stop order — Mortgagees.

Where a contingent interest in a fund in court has been mortgaged and the mortgagee places a stop order on the fund, but the mortgagor dies before his interest vests, the persons ultimately entitled to the fund, upon applying for payment out, need not serve such mortgagee.

A petition was presented for the payment out of court of a fund of £10,000, which had been carried over to a separate account.

All persons having an interest in the fund at the date of the petition appeared at the hearing, and the order was made.

It appeared in the petition that two persons, each of whom had a contingent interest in the fund, had mortgaged their respective interests in the fund and died before such interests became vested interests. Each of the mortgagees had placed a stop order upon the fund. Under these circumstances the registrar objected to draw the order in the absence of the mortgagees.

S. Dickenson mentioned the matter, and submitted that the mortgagees were not necessary parties, inasmuch as the persons through whom they claimed never became entitled.

Chitty, J., directed the order to go.

MORITZ v. STEPHAN. (a.)

Practice—Service of writ out of jurisdiction—Charging order—Breach of contract—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 11, r. 1 (e); ord. 46, r. 1—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14.

Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, does not apply to the case of an action to enforce a charge obtained on shares under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, and consequently leave cannot be obtained to issue a writ for service out of the jurisdiction in such an action.

Motion.

This was a motion for leave to issue a writ for service out of the jurisdiction under ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

The applicant had recovered a judgment for a debt against the person upon whom he wished to effect service, and had also obtained an order, under ord. 46, r. 1, charging certain shares belonging to the debtor with payment of the judgment debt. He now proposed to bring an action to enforce the charge on the shares. The debtor was residing out of the jurisdiction.

Ord. 11, r. 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, provides that service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons may be allowed whenever (inter alia) "(e) The action is founded on any breach or alleged breach within the jurisdiction of any contract wherever made, which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction."

Ord. 46, r. 1, provides that "an order charging stock or shares may be made by any divisional court or by any judge, and the proceedings for obtaining such order shall be such as are directed, and the effect shall be such as is provided by the Acts, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 14 and 15, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, s. 1."

That 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14 enacts "That if any person against whom any judgment shall have been entered up in any of her Majesty's superior courts at Westminster shall have any Government stock, funds, or annuities, or any stock or shares of or in any public company in England (whether incorporated or not), standing in his name in his own right, or in the name of any person in trust for him, it shall be lawful for a judge of one of the superior courts, on the application of any judgment creditor, to order that such stock, funds, annuities, or shares, or such of them or such part thereof respectively as he shall think fit, shall stand charged with the payment of the amount for which judgment shall have been so recovered, and interest thereon and such order shall entitle the judgment creditor to all such remedies as he would have been entitled to if such charge had been made in his favour by the judgment debtor."

E. Ford, for the motion.—By virtue of the provisions of Statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, the charging order entitles the judgment debtor to all the remedies to which he would have been entitled if the charge had been made by the contract of the judgment debtor; and this brings the case within the scope of ord. 11, r. 1 (e), which provides for service out of the jurisdiction in case of breach of contract.

He referred to Piget v. Ede, 22 W. R. 625, L. R. 8 Eq. 118; Liggott v. Western, 32 W. R. 460, 12 Q. B. D. 287.

NORTH, J., after stating the facts and reading section 14 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, proceeded:—That statute enables the judge to order that the shares of a judgment debtor shall stand charged with the payment of the judgment debt and interest, and provides that such order shall entitle the creditor to all such remedies as he would have been entitled to if the charge had been made in his favour by the judgment debtor. The order has been made, and the shares are charged with payment of the amount of the judgment debt. Suppose that the charge had been created by a memorandum by the judgment debtor that the shares should be charged with that amount. The statute says that the creditor shall be entitled to all the remedies to which he would be entitled if the charge had been so created. But that does not make a contract by the judgment debtor to pay the amount of the judgment debt. There is no bargain to pay the amount, or as to the time when it is to be paid, but only that the shares shall be charged with its payment. But to enable me to make the order asked for, I must find that there has been a breach of contract, because ord. 11, r. 1 (e), says breach. Supposing the judgment debtor had charged the shares with the payment of the amount of the judgment debt, where is there any breach? I do not see any breach, and therefore ord. 11, r. 1 (e), does not apply to this case, and I cannot make the order asked for.

In re BLUNDELL.

BLUNDELL v. BLUNDELL. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Trustee—Breach of trust—Solicitor for defaulting trustee—Constructive trustee.

In order to preclude a solicitor from accepting from a trustee payment, out of the trust estate, of costs incurred in the administration of the trust estate it must be conclusively shown that the solicitor, at the time of receiving such payment, had knowledge that the trustee had been guilty of such a breach of trust as to incapacitate him (the trustee) from resorting to the trust estate for the payment of such costs.

Staniar v. Evans, 35 W. R. 286, 34 Ch. D. 470, distinguished.

Adjourned summons.

Thomas Blundell, by his will dated the 21st of April, 1882, appointed T. Harrington, R. Berry, and his son, the defendant G. T. Blundell, trustees and executors thereof, and declared that the defendant should have the option of purchasing his business and the leasehold premises upon which the same was carried on, with the stock-in-trade, &c., at the price of £6,000, or, if he should decline to take it at that sum, at a valuation to be made according to the instructions of his executors. And the testator devised and bequeathed his residuary estate and effects, including his business and leasehold premises, if his said son should not elect to purchase, to his trustees and executors upon trust to sell the same, and, after payment out of the proceeds of certain legacies, to pay one moiety of the residue to his son, the defendant, absolutely, and to invest the other moiety and apply the income thereof for the benefit of his son, J. W. Blundell, and after his death upon trust for his children. The will contained no power to carry on the business.

The testator died on the 14th of September, 1882.

The defendant alone proved the will, and employed Messrs. Bower, Cotton, & Bower, a firm of solicitors, to act for him in the execution of the trust. He did not exercise the option given to him by the will, but by the device of a sale by auction of the business to a nominee of his own, from whom he took it over, succeeded in getting it into his own hands.

Messrs. Bower, Cotton, & Bower had advised the defendant that he could not purchase the business without the leave of the court, and he acted contrary to their advice in attempting to do so.

In November, 1884, an action was brought by the infant beneficiaries against the defendant for the administration of the testator's estate.

The defendant subsequently became bankrupt.

Messrs. Bower, Cotton, & Bower transacted a considerable amount of business in connection with the estate, which was a large one, and received large sums of money from the executor on account of their costs.

This was a summons by creditors who had the conduct of the action, asking that Messrs. Bower, Cotton, & Bower might be ordered to pay into court the moneys so received by them.

W. F. Robinson, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the motion.—Messrs. Bower, Cotton, & Bower are not entitled to retain the moneys paid to them by the defendant in respect of costs. They were aware at the time of such payment that he had committed a breach of trust which would deprive him of his right, as trustee, to resort to the trust estate for payment of these costs, and they cannot, therefore, stand in a better position than the defendant: Staniar v. Evans, 35 W. R. 286, 34 Ch. D. 470.

They also referred to Morgan v. Stephens, 3 Giff. 226, 9 W. R. Ch. Dig. 89.

Buckley, Q.C., and Levett, for Messrs. Bower, Cotton, & Bower.—The case of Staniar v. Evans is not an authority for the proposition for which it is cited. A solicitor cannot be called upon to refund money which has been paid to him in respect of costs unless it can be shown that he has received it under such circumstances as to make him a constructive trustee of it. Here there is no sufficient evidence to show that such was the case.

They referred to Barnes v. Addy, 22 W. R. 505, L. R. 9 Ch. 244; Maw v. Pearson, 28 Beav. 196, 9 W. R. Ch. D. 52; Harries v. Rees, 16 W. R. 91. [Stirling, J., referred to In re Spencer, Spencer v. Hart, 30 W. R. 296.]

Robinson replied.

Stirling, J.—This case, which has been argued at considerable length, involves a question of great importance, not only to solicitors, but to all persons who are employed by trustees to assist them in the discharge of their duties. The case which is put is this: An executor and trustee employs a solicitor to assist him in winding up his testator's estate and in the execution of the trusts of the will. I assume, and it is not disputed in the present case that the employment of that solicitor is proper. In the course of his employment the solicitor requires the trustee to make a payment to him on account of his costs. The trustee does so, and he does so, in point of fact, with the knowledge of the solicitor, out of the trust estate. It is said that the solicitor cannot retain the sum so paid to him out of the trust estate, except upon the terms that, if the trustee, upon the accounts being taken, turns out to be a defaulter, and an order is made against him for the payment of the balance into court, and he fails to do so, the solicitor should be liable to have the same order made against him. That is a very serious proposition. It seems to me that if it is well founded in principle it cannot be confined to the case of a solicitor, but must be extended to those of other persons, such as auctioneers and stockbrokers, who, as we all know, are necessarily employed by trustees, and are in the habit of deducting out of the proceeds of sales of property which they are employed to sell their own commission on the sale.

The first question I have to consider is whether that is a true statement of the law. Now, what is the position of a trustee or an executor who has to employ a solicitor, an auctioneer, or a stockbroker? He enters unquestionably into a contract with reference to the employment of a solicitor or auctioneer or stockbroker in which he himself is personally liable, but by law he is entitled to be indemnified out of the trust estate. What is that right of indemnity? I apprehend that in equity, at all events, it is not a right to be indemnified merely after he has made the necessary payments to the solicitor, the auctioneer, or the stockbroker. In equity he is entitled to be indemnified, not merely against the payments actually made, but against his liability, and that has been repeatedly held. For example, a trustee in whose name shares are standing is entitled to be indemnified by his cestui que trust against calls on those shares, and he is not bound, before having recourse to that indemnity, to pay the calls, but he is entitled to come to this court and ask that he may receive from his cestui que trust personally the amount of calls in order that he may pay them. That equity has been repeatedly enforced in this court. I may refer to the well-known case of Cruse v. Paine, decided by Giffard, V.C., 17 W. R. 45, L. R. 6 Eq. 641, and on appeal by Lord Hatherley, 17 W. R. 1033, L. R. 6 Ch. 441, and the same doctrine is laid down by the late Master of the Rolls and applied under peculiar circumstances in the well-known case of Lacey v. Hill, Crowley's Claim, 22 W. R. 586, L. R. 18 Eq. 182, which arose out of the will of Sir Robert Harvey. It seems to me that that being the rule a trustee has a right to resort in the first instance to the trust estate for making the proper necessary payments to the persons whom he properly employs to assist him in administering that trust estate, and that he is not bound in the first instance to pay those persons out of his own pocket and then recoup himself out of the trust estate.

I think that is in accordance with the authority so often referred to in this argument of Barnes v. Addy. In that case we find from Lord Selborne's judgment that one of the trustees who was made a defendant paid over out of the trust estate to his solicitor a sum of £55, and it was sought to charge the solicitor with that £55. Lord Selborne (at p. 254) says, "It is said he is to be charged with that (though he did not retain or use for his own benefit a single shilling of that money)." That, no doubt, is a distinction between that case and this case, but still, what Lord Selborne says there is none the less applicable to this case, "It is said he is to be charged with that (though he did not retain or use for his own benefit a single shilling of that money) because the authority of the trustees to apply the money in payment of certain costs of a previous suit which had been compromised was not obtained from this court. Now the trustee, Mr. Addy, was, as I have said, at the time, beyond question, the legal owner of the fund. He and Mr. Clark, the deceased trustee, had a right, by the terms of the will, to be indemnified against all costs properly or reasonably incurred in connection with the trust. These costs had been incurred in a suit against them in the name of the present plaintiffs, the Barnes children, by a next friend under the advice of Mr. Parker, the family solicitor, which suit, having proceeded to a certain extent, had been compromised on the terms that all three shares of this fund—the Robinson share, the Barnes share, and the Addy share—should bear their proportion of the trustees' costs. The trustee Addy authorized the sale for that purpose, and the application of the money, and it was so applied; and I am most clearly of opinion, first of all, that there is nothing before us to show that such an application was improper on the part of Mr. Addy, the trustee"; but then he adds, "But, secondly, that if it had been, the solicitor could not possibly have been held on that account responsible." The ground on which the solicitor could not have been held to be responsible appears to be that he simply acted as agent for the trustee. He did not retain the money for his own use, but simply handed it over in payment of the costs incurred. That is an express decision by Lord Selborne that such an application of the fund was not improper on the part of Mr. Addy, and that case, therefore, seems to be an authority for the proposition that a trustee, having properly incurred expenses in administering a trust fund, is entitled to sell a part of the trust estate, and apply the proceeds directly in payment of costs. If, then, it was proper for the trustee to resort to the trust fund for payment of those costs, and to sell a part of the trust estate and apply the proceeds in payment of those costs, how can it be improper for the solicitor to receive them? I fail to see it. And to say that his right to receive and to retain can be affected by the subsequent conduct of the trustee, appears to me to be quite impossible, and it is a proposition for which there is no authority. The only authority cited in support of that proposition is a totally different case — namely, of Stanier v. Evans—from the decision of which, as I understand it, I do not at all differ. As I read that case it is this. There was a suit instituted for the execution of the trust, and by the chief clerk's certificate it was found that there was in the hands of the trustee a balance of £1,500 odd, including a sum of £660. That sum of £660 consisted of some mortgage debts which had been paid to the trustees' solicitors, together with interest, and it remained in the hands of the trustees' solicitors, but there had been no agreement between the trustee and the solicitors that the funds which had come to their hands should in any way be appropriated to the payment of costs. Then it was further proved that the trustee was, with the knowledge of the solicitor, utterly impecunious at the time the order was made for payment in, and there was no probability of his being able to pay in anything whatever.

Under those circumstances North, J., held that the solicitors were liable to pay into court the sum which they had retained in their hands, though a large sum was due to them from the trustee for costs, and the ground upon which he puts his judgment appears to me to be undeniable—that solicitors could not contract with the estate, they had no lien on the estate, they could only get a lien by means of some proper agreement with the trustee. There had been no agreement whatever entered into, the trustee himself was a defaulter, he was unable to make the payment, he could not in any way resort to the trust estate for payment of his costs, because he had already in his hands a large sum which he ought to have applied in payment of those costs, and North, J., held that, under these circumstances, the solicitor could stand in no better position than the trustee. I confess I cannot see how the decision can be quarrelled with in any way. That, however, is not a decision, to my mind, that in every case in which the solicitor of a trustee receives money in payment of costs out of the trust estate, he can stand in no better position than the trustee himself does.

Coming, therefore, to the conclusion that, in a proper case, the trustee may pay costs properly incurred direct to his solicitor out of the trust estate, I have next to consider whether there are any circumstances in this case which will make the solicitor liable, as a constructive trustee, for funds which are so received.

Upon that the case of Barnes v. Addy is again valuable. Lord Selborne (at p. 251) says:—"That is a distinction to be borne in mind throughout the case. Those who create a trust clothe the trustee with a legal power and control over the trust property, imposing on him a corresponding responsibility. That responsibility may no doubt be extended in equity to others who are not properly trustees, if they are found either making these trustees de son tort, or actually participating in any fraudulent conduct of the trustee to the injury of the cestui que trust. But, on the other hand, strangers are not to be made constructive trustees merely because they act as the agents of trustees in transactions within their legal powers—transactions, perhaps, of which a court of equity may disapprove, unless those agents receive and become chargeable with some part of the trust property, or unless they assist, with knowledge, in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees." That doctrine so laid down by Lord Selborne has been expressly applied to solicitors in the Court of Appeal in the case of In re Spencer, Spencer v. Hart. That was an action by the cestuis que trust against their trustees for administration, the solicitors of the trustees being joined as defendants. It was alleged that grossly exorbitant sums had been allowed in the accounts as costs to the trustees' solicitors, and the relief asked as against them was that their bills might be taxed. The solicitors demurred, and it was held that such an action could not be maintained by third parties, cestuis que trust, against solicitors, and that the proper remedy was by petition under the Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 39. Baggallay, L.J., (at p. 297) says:—"Are Messrs. Ansdell & Sons liable to the plaintiff in any other character than as solicitors? The principles on which agents can be made responsible as constructive trustees are very clearly defined by Lord Selborne in the case of Barnes v. Addy." Then he quotes from the head-note of that case in the Law Reports, substituting for the general word "agent" the word "solicitor," and then he goes on: "What is the case here? Are there any allegations sufficient to make them liable as constructive trustees? No; I can find nothing. There are allegations which seem to point to her solicitors having got the trust funds into their hands, but only as solicitors to the trustees. Therefore the allegation is that the trustees themselves had realized the property and received the money; and there is nothing suggesting an improper receipt of the trust moneys by the solicitors. The £700 is stated to have been received by the trustees. Then the only other suggestion is that the trustees had taken credit for £455, which they had allowed the solicitors to deduct as the amount of their bill of costs; but we do not know that that was in any way an excessive sum. If it is, it is open to the cestui que trust to obtain taxation of the bill under the Solicitors Act. Therefore the making of these solicitors defendants as constructive trustees cannot be justified." Then Lindley, L.J. (at p. 298), says:—"Primâ facie, the only persons to sue an agent are his principals, although, no doubt, it might be shown that an agent was so involved in a breach of trust committed by his principal as to stand in the position of a quasi-trustee, and in that case an action might be supported against him."

Therefore it seems to me that that case is a direct authority that you cannot make solicitors liable as constructive trustees except you bring them within the doctrine of the court with reference to strangers who are not themselves trustees, but who are liable in a proper case to be made to account as constructive trustees. What is the general doctrine with reference to constructive trustees of that kind? The general doctrine, I take it, is this: that a stranger to the trust receiving money from the trustee which he knows to be part of the trust estate is not liable as a constructive trustee unless there are facts brought home to him which show that to his knowledge the money is being applied in a manner which is inconsistent with the trust. And that in general terms would come to this, you must make out either that the solicitor was party to a fraud, or that he was party to a breach of trust on the part of the trustee. That appears to me to be in accordance with the decision to which I have referred, and to be further supported by the case which has been referred to of Harris v. Rees.

The real difficulty in this case is, What is sufficient to fix the solicitor with the liability of a constructive trustee? As I have said, he must be either party to a breach of trust or to some fraud, or at all events he must have brought home to him facts which show that the fund is being applied in a manner inconsistent with the trust.

In the present case the trustee and executor, as I have said, was entitled to resort in the first instance to the trust fund for payment of the necessary costs, charges, and expenses incurred by him in executing his trust. Doubtless he might commit acts which would deprive him of the right to resort to those funds. If, for example, he was an utterly impecunious man and he sold out part of the trust estate for the purpose of applying it in payment of a particular set of costs, and he did not so apply the proceeds of sale, but kept them in his own pocket, I apprehend he would be debarred from further resorting to the trust estate for the purpose of paying the same costs. It would be a breach of trust on his part so to do, and if the solicitor, with knowledge of all the facts, received payment of part of the trust estate in satisfaction of a bill of costs, I think it is very possible that he might be held under those circumstances to be a constructive trustee. But this is to be borne in mind, that in all these cases for the benefit of cestuis que trust themselves you are not narrowly to limit the power of the trustee to employ agents to assist him in executing the trust, and mere suspicion or intimation that something was wrong in the administration of the trust will not, to my mind, be sufficient to deprive the solicitor of the right to accept payment of part of the trust estate in satisfaction of costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred.

The general rule with reference to agents is well laid down by Sir John Leach, V.C., in the case of Keane v. Robarts, 4 Madd. 332, which was a case of bankers, and which was approved and followed by the House of Lords in the case of Grey v. Johnson. Sir John Leach, V.C. (at page 357), lays it down thus:—"Every person who acquires personal assets by a breach of trust or devastavit in the executor is responsible to those who are entitled under the will, if he is a party to the breach of trust. Generally speaking, he does not become a party to the breach of trust by buying or receiving as a pledge for money advanced to the executor at the time any part of the personal assets, whether specifically given by the will or otherwise, because this sale or pledge is held to be primâ facie consistent with the duty of an executor." Therefore a solicitor dealing with a trustee, and having no notice of any breach of trust on his part, is clearly entitled to deal with him on the footing that he is executing the trust and is doing nothing which is wrong; and he is not bound, before he accepts payment out of the trust estate, to call upon the trustee to produce his accounts and satisfy himself that he (the trustee) has acted in all respects properly. But suppose that he does know of some breach of trust, can it be held that the mere knowledge of that is sufficient to preclude him from accepting payment? That would be a formidable doctrine, again, not merely to solicitors, but to auctioneers and stockbrokers. Supposing a stockbroker had knowledge that part of a trust fund was improperly invested, and that the trustee might be called upon to make good any loss which was occasioned by that investment, would he thereby preclude himself from deducting his commission upon a proper sale of another part of the trust estate? I think it would be difficult to come to such a conclusion. To my mind, in order that the solicitor may be precluded from accepting payment out of the trust estate, you must bring home to him that at the time when he accepts payment the trustee had been guilty of such a breach of trust as to preclude him altogether from resorting to the trust estate for payment of any of those costs, and that in fact such an application was a breach of trust.

Now if that be the correct view of the law, what do we find in the present case? We find that in this case the executor improperly attempted to acquire, and did acquire, part of the trust estate for his own use and benefit. As regards the conduct of the solicitors, with one exception I cannot see anything which would lead me to cast any blame upon them whatever.

It appears to me that down to the time of the sale by auction, at which this trustee and executor did, through agents apparently, and attempted to acquire a part of the plant for his own use, they acted perfectly properly. They seem to me to have advised him that he could not do so, and that if he desired to acquire the property for his own benefit the only possible mode of doing so was by obtaining the sanction of the court in a suit properly framed for the purpose, and the fact that he had, contrary to their advice, acquired the property seems to have come upon them with the greatest surprise. The letters which passed between the solicitors and the auctioneers and trustee on and after the 19th of October, 1885, appear to me, as far as I can see, to be perfectly bonâ fide letters on the part of the solicitors. They were the first intimation they really had that the trustee was doing something which might be found fault with by a court of equity or by the cestuis que trust. Then, no doubt, at a subsequent period, there is a letter which I have not had explained to my satisfaction. That letter is the one of the 18th of March, 1885, in which they dealt with a certain balance that was remaining in the hands of the trustee in respect of the purchase-money of part of the plant. In that letter they suggest how that balance was to be dealt with in the account which they were on the point of rendering on his behalf to this court, and they suggest that it should be dealt with as a payment made to the auctioneers in the first instance, and afterwards to be paid back by the auctioneers and received by the trustee from them. Why that suggestion was made, or what good it would do to the cestui que trust, I confess I do not understand. But notwithstanding that there is a suggestion that in the accounts part of the transactions should appear otherwise than it really was, I cannot come to the conclusion on the evidence before me that the solicitors were party to any fraud, or that they intentionally joined in any breach of trust whatever. No doubt they had notice at the time when they received the payments, some of which were certainly made to their knowledge, out of the trust estate that the trustee had committed a breach of trust; but I do not think it was brought home to them that they had notice that the transactions were such as to preclude the trustee entirely and altogether from resorting to the trust fund for payment of his costs, or that any such amount as was ultimately held to be recoverable from the trustee could be charged against him. Even at the moment when they entered in the account in this action in April, 1885, there appears by the account they rendered to be a balance in favour of the trustee.

I do not think that the facts are sufficient to justify me in holding that the solicitors were in this case affected with such notice of the position of the trustee with reference to the trust fund that I ought to make them constructive trustees and to fix them with liability to repay these sums which they have received out of the trust estate on account of their costs.

On these grounds I think the application failed, and that the costs ought to follow the event.

Application dismissed.

Will—Direction to purchase annuity after death of life tenant—Death of annuitant before that of tenant for life—Lapse.

A testator bequeathed £1,000 Consols, over which he had a power of appointment subject to the life interest therein of his wife, to trustees on trust, after the decease of his wife, to invest the same in the purchase of an annuity for the life of his nephew, J. D.; but in case his nephew should in anywise incumber the said annuity, or be outlawed, or take the benefit of any Act of Parliament made or to be made for the relief of insolvent debtors, then he should not be entitled to receive the said annuity, but that it should fall into the residue, which the testator gave to his wife. The testator died in 1837, J. D. died in 1853, having been insolvent in 1833, but having, subsequently to that date, done no act to forfeit the annuity. The testator's wife died in 1854, having treated the annuity as lapsed, and bequeathed it to various legatees. No annuity was ever purchased for J. D.

Held, that the fund out of which the annuity was to be purchased had lapsed by the death of J. D. before the death of the testator's widow.

Semble, a forfeiture clause in a will does not take effect if the forfeiture be committed before the date of the will.

Petition.

John Draper, by his will, dated the 6th of December, 1835, after reciting that he had an absolute power of disposition (subject to the life interest therein of his wife, Sarah Jane) over a sum of £9,870 New £3 10s. per Cent. Annuities then standing in the names of the trustees of the will of John Willsheire, bequeathed £1,000 annuities, part of the above-mentioned sum, to John Draper and Henry Soper on trust, after the decease of his wife, to invest the same in the purchase of a Government annuity upon the life of his nephew, John Draper; but in case his nephew should in anywise assign, charge, or incumber the said annuity or any part thereof for the benefit of his creditors, or should be outlawed, or become bankrupt, or take the benefit of any Act of Parliament made or to be made for the relief of insolvent debtors, then his said nephew should not be entitled to receive the said annuity, but that it should fall into the residue of the testator's personal estate. And he gave his residuary estate to his wife. The testator died in 1837.

John Draper, the annuitant, had been insolvent in 1833, but subsequently to the testator's death he did not forfeit his right to the annuity. He died on the 31st of March, 1853, and in February, 1888, Mary Ann Caton took out letters of administration to his estate. The testator's widow died on the 5th of March, 1854, having, by her will, treated the £1,000 annuities as having fallen into the residue under the testator's will and bequeathed it to various legatees. No annuity was ever purchased for John Draper, the nephew.

In 1886 after the death of Sarah Jane Draper the surviving trustee of John Willsheire's will transferred the £1,000 annuities into the names of John Draper and Henry Soper, as trustees of the testator's will. They were paid into court, and it was now represented by a sum of £1,537 15s. 3d. Consols.

The petitioners were Mary Ann Caton and her husband, who claimed two-fifths of this sum as beneficiaries under the will of Sarah Jane Draper.

Decimus Sturges, for parties entitled to the other three-fifths, and the trustees of John Draper's will.

R. J. Parker, for the representatives of John Draper, the annuitant.—The annuitant was absolutely entitled to the fund: Bayley v. Bishop, 9 Ves. 6; Day v. Day, 1 W. R. 402, 1 Drew. 569. No doubt the decision of Malins, V.C., in Power v. Hayne contradicts this, but I submit the earlier cases should be followed. There was no lapse. It is not necessary that the cestui que trust should be able to demand the handing over of the trust fund to him before he can be considered entitled to it.

Kekewich, J.—I have not heard any argument upon the question whether the words "in case my said nephew should be outlawed, or become bankrupt, or take the benefit of any Acts of Parliament made or to be made for the relief of insolvent debtors" can be applied to an insolvency before the date of the will. My present impression is that the words contemplate a future event. It has been strongly argued for the representatives of the annuitant that there was no lapse, and I am bound to express my opinion on this point. If a testator gives £100 to A. B. and A. B. dies in the testator's lifetime there is a lapse. If a testator gives £3 a year to A. B. for life, the same thing necessarily happens. Why it should not happen where a testator directs so much money to be laid out in the purchase of an annuity of so much a year I do not at present see. But that does not give the go by to the argument that the legatee is entitled to the fund which is to produce £3 a year. But I am prepared to hold that the gift of the amount to be applied in the purchase of an annuity is as much a subject of lapse as a gift of any other amount. The real argument is, that this money was never invested in the purchase of the annuity, which of course must have ceased with the life of the annuitant. The legal personal representatives say, "We are entitled to the money which ought to have been invested," and argue that it was intended for the absolute benefit of the annuitant. The testator has been particularly careful in giving this annuity, for he directs that the annuity shall in certain events go over. The case of Day v. Day has been relied on as deciding this very point. No doubt Kindersley, V.C., in that case distinctly held that the donee of a gift of this character was absolutely entitled, and he so held because he thought that the gift over in that case affected the principle upon which the courts have determined that directions to lay out in the purchase of an annuity made it imperative for the party to survive the period when such laying out took place. It seems to me that the real principle on which the courts have held annuitants entitled to the fund is not affected by holding that the residuary legatee may take the interest under such a gift as this. Malins, V.C., in Power v. Hayne, expressed his own opinion on the point, and declined to follow Day v. Day, and my own opinion coincides with that of Malins, V.C., and not with that of Kindersley, V.C. I must therefore hold the petitioners entitled to the sum which they claim.

Q. B. Div. (Cave and Wills, JJ.) June 19.

COLE, Appellant; MILES, Respondent. (a.)

Trespassing on railway—Conviction for—Public right of way at a certain place before making railway—Assertion of right of way over railway at such place—Claim of right—Jurisdiction of justices.

The appellant was convicted by justices in petty sessions—(1) under the 38th section of 45 & 46 Vict. c. ccxiv., for having unlawfully trespassed on a railway in such a manner as to expose himself to danger; and (2) under the 23rd section of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, for having been unlawfully on the railway after receiving warning not to go or pass thereon. There was, prior to the making of the railway, and prior to the Acts of Parliament authorizing the same, a public right of way for persons on foot over the land now occupied by the railway at the place where the appellant crossed, and the appellant went upon and crossed the railway, in the assertion of the right of way which formerly existed, and believing that he was entitled to do so by virtue thereof.

Held, that the conviction on both summonses was wrong—(1) because the claim of the right of way set up by the appellant ousted the jurisdiction of the justices to determine the case; and (2) because there were no provisions in the Act of Parliament extinguishing the right of way, which was consequently still in existence.

Case stated by two justices of the peace for the county of Pembroke, setting forth the facts and grounds upon which the appellant, Alfred Cole, was summarily convicted upon the 28th of January, 1888 (1) Of an offence under the statute 45 & 46 Vict. c. ccxiv., s. 38 (as amended by 46 & 47 Vict. c. 193, s. 50) (Great Western Railway Acts); (2) Of an offence under 32 Vict. c. 119, s. 23 (The Regulation of Railways Act, 1868), as amended by 34 and 35 Vict. c. 78, s. 14.

The appellant was summoned and charged by the respondent, an inspector of the Great Western Railway (1) For having, on the 30th of April, 1887, unlawfully and wilfully trespassed upon the Great Western Railway, in such a manner as to expose himself to danger, or risk of danger; (2) For having been, on the same day, unlawfully upon the said railway, not being there for the purpose of crossing the same at any authorized crossing, and after having received warning not to go or pass on the said railway. The first summons was taken out under the 38th section of 45 & 46 Vict. c. ccxiv., which imposed a penalty upon any person trespassing upon any of the railways of the company in such a manner as to expose himself to danger, or risk of danger, without having received any warning. The second summons was taken out under the 23rd section of The Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, which imposed a penalty, not exceeding 40s., upon any person who shall be or pass upon any railway, except for the purpose of crossing the same at any authorized crossing, after having received warning not to go or pass thereon.

Before the justices it was contended for the appellant (a) That the jurisdiction of the justices was ousted on the ground that a bonâ fide claim of right was set up, and that such bonâ fide claim of right was an answer to each of the charges; and (b) That the original right of way subsisted by virtue of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 74, and otherwise, and that the appellant was entitled to cross the railway, the said right of way not being extinguished.

It was contended for the respondents (1) That the question whether the appellant acted under a bonâ fide claim of right, was immaterial, as the statutes made it an offence to be upon or cross the railway for any purpose, the provisions of the Acts being enacted for the safety of the individual and of the public; (2) That such a claim of right was one which could not possibly exist at law; (3) That a bonâ fide claim of right, to oust the jurisdiction of the justices, must be a claim of right in the nature of title or property; (4) That 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 74, did not apply, as it was not suggested that the company had failed to make any of the bridges or communications which they had been required to make, and the period within which they could be required to make further bridges or communications had long elapsed, and that the alleged right of way was impliedly destroyed by the substitution of other ways and roads, constructed under the company's Acts, and by the provisions of their Acts authorising the company to construct their line at a place which involved the physical destruction of the roadway if any over which the alleged right of way had previously existed.

The justices found—(1) That there was not such a claim of right as to oust their jurisdiction; (2) That the right of way claimed would not be an answer to either charge; (3) That a public right of footway as claimed did exist at the place in question prior to the making of the railway, and that the appellant acted in supposed assertion thereof; (4) That the said right of way was extinguished by the Acts authorising the making of the railway, and that other and reasonable means of access and communication, within a reasonable distance of the place, had been provided by the company.

The appellant was convicted on each of the summonses, and ordered to pay a fine of 1s. and costs.

The question for the opinion of the court was: Whether the justices were wrong in law in so convicting the appellant upon either or both of the said summonses.

Finlay, Q.C., and Asquith, for the respondent, cited White v. Feast, 20 W. R. 382, L. R. 7 Q. B. 353; Corporation of Yarmouth v. Simmons, 26 W. R. 802, 10 Ch. D. 518.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that the conviction in this case was wrong, and must be quashed, and I come to that conclusion on two grounds. The first ground is that there was a question of title here, upon which the justices ought not to have adjudicated. Summonses were taken out against different persons, and amongst others against the present appellant, under two sections of two Acts of Parliament. The first summons was taken out under the 38th section of 45 & 46 Vict. c. ccxiv., which imposes a penalty on any person trespassing upon any of the railways of the company in such a manner as to expose himself to danger, or risk of danger, without having received any warning. Now I understand that section to mean that, where persons are trespassing, wandering where they have no right to be at all, the railway company may summon them before the justices, and the justices may convict them, but there is a proviso at the end of the section, and it seems to me that when a man invokes the benefit of this proviso he raises a question of title, which the justices have no right to go into. I think from what took place here that the jurisdiction of the justices was ousted by the claim of right. I think, in the language of Blackburn, J., in White v. Feast, L. R. 7 Q. B., at p. 358, that "the statute giving summary jurisdiction has the implied restriction as to title, and that the justices must keep their hands if a bonâ fide claim of right is set up." Consider for a moment what would be the legal consequence of holding that a magistrate had a right to decide whether a right of way was stopped or not. By the view taken on the part of the railway company, the company may summon a poor person, and get a decision against him, and, if so, is that decision against the single person to determine the question of right against all others? I cannot think that that can be the intention of the Legislature. I think it was the intention of the Legislature to give to magistrates a power to inflict a small punishment in certain cases where no public claim is set up. I cannot think it was intended that two magistrates at petty sessions should be able to decide on that question against some person without any appeal at all, as they do determine as to questions of fact.

The section under which the second summons was taken out is the 23rd section of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, which imposes a penalty upon any person who shall be upon any railway except for the purpose of crossing the same at any authorized crossing, after having received warning not to go or pass thereon. There, again, it seems to me that the intention of the Legislature was to give magistrates jurisdiction in cases where a person was on the railway without any right whatever. It is quite clear that a question of such importance as that of a public right of way was not intended to be decided, and that without appeal, by two justices sitting at petty sessions.

Now it is found as a fact by the magistrates—I do not think they are the proper tribunal to find any such fact—that there was a public right of way. If so, that right still existed. Now we come to section 46 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which in effect provides that if a line of railway cross any public road, either such road shall be carried over the railway or the railway shall be carried over such road, or (with the consent of two or more justices) the railway shall cross the road (not being a public carriage road) on the level. There is here a clear intention of the Legislature that a road was not to be stopped up by a company by having authority to make a railway across it, but that they must either carry the road over the railway or the railway over the road, unless they get consent to have a level crossing.

It is said by Mr. Finlay that there is at all events an implied provision, although there may be no express one, that a road becomes stopped up by the authority to make a line of railway over it. It is perfectly monstrous to think that justices sitting in petty sessions should have this right to construe Acts of Parliament giving these implied powers. It is said with regard to the second Act, that the justices were authorized to convict, as the person was not crossing at an authorized crossing; it is hardly necessary to do more than state such a contention.

In my judgment, the appellant is entitled to succeed upon the two grounds—first, that the point was not such a one as the magistrates were authorized to take upon themselves to decide; and, secondly, that there are no provisions in the Acts of Parliament having the effect of extinguishing the right of way.

Wills, J.—I am of the same opinion. On the construction of the Acts themselves, it must be made out that the justices had jurisdiction. When questions of title arise, the petty sessions is not the proper tribunal to decide as to that. Upon the two sections which are in question here, substantially it comes to this, that the magistrates are authorized to convict in a case of trespass, but not in cases where a claim of right or title is set up. It seems to me that the magistrates were wrong in convicting at all, and even if they were not wrong in law, they were wrong as to the facts of the case. There is certainly no express provision in the Acts taking away this right of way, but Mr. Finlay says that such a provision must be implied, as it is impossible for the company to exercise their powers unless we consider that these rights were destroyed. I cannot see it in that light. By section 46 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, liabilities were imposed upon railway companies, which, if observed, would protect the public. There is no trace of any intention in these Acts of Parliament that a right of way from A. to B. should be destroyed. Great reliance has been placed upon the case decided by Fry, J. (Corporation of Yarmouth v. Simmons), but it seems to me that that case does not decide anything of the kind suggested here. In that case there was no statute analogous to that dealing with railways. Section 46 of the Act of 1845 says that these rights of way shall be maintained and protected unless otherwise specially provided for by the special Act. It seems to me that the magistrates were quite wrong in the conclusion they have come to on both points. I think, therefore, that this appeal must succeed, and judgment be given for the appellant, but without costs.

Appeal allowed, without costs.

Great Western Railway Co. v. Bunch. (a.)

Railway company — Common carriers — Passenger's luggage in carriage—Delivery to porter—Liability of company.

The plaintiff's wife arrived, with three articles of luggage, at the defendants' station forty minutes before the departure of the train by which she was to travel. A porter took the luggage from her and placed it on a trolley, and labelled two of the articles, she saying that she wished the other article—a Gladstone bag—to be put into the carriage with her, and asking the porter if it would be safe to leave it with him while she went to meet her husband, who was to travel with her, and to get her ticket. The porter replied that it would, and that he would guard the luggage and put it in the train. The train was not then alongside the platform. When she returned in ten minutes with her husband, whom she had met in the station, and who had taken her ticket for her, the bag was missing.

The county court judge found that the porter was negligent in not guarding the bag, and in not being in readiness to put the bag into the carriage.

Held (by Lord Halsbury, C., and Lords Watson, Herschell, and Macnaghten; Lord Bramwell dissenting), that there was evidence to justify the finding of the county court judge, that the bag was in the custody of the railway company for present transit from the time of its delivery to the porter, and that the loss was due to the company's negligence.

Semble (Lord Bramwell dissenting), that, where a passenger's luggage is placed, at his request and with the assent of the company, in the carriage in which he is to travel, the contract is one of common carriage, subject to the modification that, in respect of his interference with their exclusive control of his luggage, the company is not liable for any loss or injury occurring during its transit to which the act or default of the passenger has contributed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley, L.J.; Lopes, L.J., dissenting) reversing a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (Day, J., A. L. Smith, J., dissenting), reported 34 W. R. 574, 17 Q. B. D. 215.

In addition to the facts stated in the head-note, the following particulars will suffice for the purpose of this report:—

The tickets taken by the plaintiffs purported to be "issued subject to the conditions stated on the company's time-bills." Among these were the following:—

"LUGGAGE.—The company will not in any case be liable for luggage taken with the passengers into the carriages, but only when it is properly labelled and placed in a luggage-van. The company will not be responsible for luggage not labelled, or improperly labelled."

A notice to the following effect was also put up in a conspicuous position:—

"Passengers are required to see their luggage duly labelled, as until so labelled it will not be put into the trains, nor will the company assume or incur any responsibility in respect thereof."

"The company's servants have strict orders not to take charge of any luggage or parcels, and if passengers are desirous of leaving them under the charge of the company they must themselves take or see them taken to and deposited in the cloak-room."

The company appealed to the House of Lords.

R. S. Wright replied.

Feb. 24.—Lord HALSBURY, C.—The form in which this question arises for your lordships' decision is one which precludes any consideration of the propriety or impropriety of the decision of the learned county court judge as to any question of fact as to which there was legal evidence before him. I must observe that both the learned judges in the Divisional Court appear to me to have treated questions so conclusively found as nevertheless open to review. It is, perhaps, not surprising that when questions arise upon what either are, or are assumed to be, matters of daily experience, even a judge is tempted to import his own knowledge, and so give a colour to facts which he ought to treat as finally and conclusively decided by the tribunal to whom they have been remitted.

Now, in this case the facts have not been specifically found; but the learned judge has found a verdict for the plaintiffs, and has stated that finding, together with the evidence. If, therefore, it is possible to find a verdict for the plaintiffs upon that evidence, the plaintiffs are entitled to maintain their verdict. It seems to me that the two contentions which have been in debate before your lordships would resolve themselves into a question of fact, upon which there might be a difference of opinion if the facts were here open to review. Your lordships, in the first place, have to ascertain, not from any written instrument, nor from any express words of contract, what were the contract relations between the plaintiffs and the defendants. I confess I should have been better satisfied if some evidence directed to what was the practice of the particular railway company had been before us; but in this, as in other parts of the case, I must content myself with saying that, if there was enough to enable the learned judge to infer what was the practice, and from thence to infer what was the contract, I am not at liberty to review his decision.

There are, of course, some facts which both sides have assumed to be proved, and with respect to which it would be mere pedantry to suggest that they were not formally proved. That the defendants, for instance, were a railway company, carrying on the business of common carriers for hire; that the premises upon which the plaintiffs' luggage was deposited were premises belonging to and in the exclusive control of the defendant company; that the arrangement of the trains; the bringing of them to the platform, the arrangements by which the luggage, whether hand luggage or van luggage, was to be distributed, were all under the superintendence and direction of the defendant company—are all matters as to which no formal evidence is to be found in the report of the county court judge, but are also matters as to which no one has or can suggest any real doubt. I do not think that any of your lordships entertain any doubt that if the plaintiffs' luggage were intrusted to the porter for deposit and custody as distinguished from the physical handing over for the purpose of transit, the defendants would not be liable. The question really in debate is somewhat obscured by the existence of the cloak-room system, and that system, I think, is expressly guarded by the company not permitting any of their servants undertaking the guardianship of any property whatsoever, except under the circumstances and upon the conditions which the company prescribes; but I think the same question would arise, and should be decided upon precisely the same principles, if the company had no cloak-room system, and gave no authority to their servants to receive luggage at all, except as incidentally to their contract of carriage.

It is worthy of remark that Day, J., and Lopes, L.J., upon an assumed state of facts at which I think the county court judge was at liberty to arrive, lay down the law very much as I should agree it ought to be laid down. Day, J., says: "If a passenger requires him (the porter) to delay a reasonable time—while, for instance, a passenger takes a ticket—he (the porter) is responsible during all reasonable time that should elapse between the arrival at the station and the arrival on the platform of the passenger, taking the ticket being allowed for and the little journey to the platform; during all that time he is the agent of the company as bailee of the luggage which is intrusted to him; he is acting in the ordinary discharge of his duty;" and Lopes, L.J., says: "I do not think it is part of the employment of an ordinary porter to take charge of luggage beyond the time usually or reasonably—I should say reasonably—necessary for this transit"; the words of the Lord Justice, "this transit," referring to the transit of the goods from the cab or outside of the station.

The admissions of counsel have rendered it unnecessary to rely upon mere inference in this case as to the question of whether the train had been drawn up to the platform or not; and we must now accept it as a fact that neither the van nor the carriages for the passengers were in a position to enable the hand-luggage or the van-luggage to be placed where they were intended to be deposited for the purposes of the journey.

If I were myself to be drawing inferences as to the reasonableness in point of time of the period of the plaintiff's arrival before the departure of the train by which she intended to travel, I am not certain how I should decide that question; on the one hand, forty minutes seem a long time before the departure of the train, and to call upon the servants of the company to take charge of luggage for the purpose of the journey; on the other hand, the fact that it was Christmas Eve, that the railway company were, within a very short time of the arrival of the plaintiff, issuing tickets for that journey, and that they were receiving without objection or demur van-luggage, with respect to which it is not denied that they were, in so doing, acting in pursuance of the authority conferred on them by their employers, are all circumstances from which I think it might be inferred that the time was not too long; but, in truth, I am not entitled to speculate upon the matter; this is essentially a question of fact, and the learned judge has, in this instance, specifically found that the time of the intrusting the luggage to the porter was a reasonable and proper time before the departure of the train. It seems difficult to say that, with the evidence before him to which I have adverted, it was not open to him to arrive at that conclusion.

Now, while I entirely agree that the duty of the porter, as disclosed by the evidence, is either to take the luggage to the cloak-room, if intrusted to him for the purposes of deposit, or to the train, if for the purposes of the journey, I am at a loss to understand how the circumstance that the train is not at the platform can affect the liability of the company. Assume that the company are receiving luggage for the purposes of the journey, and that they do so receive luggage for the purpose of the journey; the presence or absence of the train at the platform is a matter within the control of the company and not of the passenger; and I cannot understand what evidence there is in this case from which it could be reasonably inferred that the porter would be acting within the scope of his authority in receiving the plaintiff's luggage if the train were at the platform and beyond it if the train had not come up. Doubtless a company might make a regulation if they thought fit: "We will not receive luggage for a train forty minutes before it starts"; they might say: "We will not receive luggage to be put on a train which has not yet arrived at the platform." I should very much doubt whether any railway company has any uniform practice as to the period of time which they allow to elapse between the arrival of the train at the platform and its departure. It is enough, however, to say that in this case no evidence of any such practice was given.

If a possible inference to be derived from the facts as proved is that what the porter did in this case was the ordinary practice of the company, then I should say it would follow that the mode in which the company carried on its business was to accept the passengers' luggage at the entrance to the station and to take it to its intended destination, whether van or passenger carriage, at the option of the passenger, and that during the period of what Lopes, L.J., describes as "this short transit," it would be in the custody of the company for the purpose of, and as part of, the journey. If the train were at the platform it would, I suppose, in ordinary course, be distributed, some to the van and some to the passenger carriage, as directed; but once the porter has received and accepted it as luggage to be received and forwarded by the train about to start, it seems to me impossible to contend, and I do not understand Lopes, L.J., or Day, J., to contend, that it is not in the custody of the company for the purposes of the journey. If the porter refused to take charge of the luggage the company might be liable for refusing to carry according to their professed mode of carriage; but might not be liable for loss of goods which they refused to carry; but whether the porter would be doing his duty in refusing to take charge of the luggage during the short transit, on acting in pursuance of his masters' orders, is the very question in debate. If one assumes that it was contrary to his duty, of course the company would not be liable; if it was his duty the company would be liable.

But why am I to assume, upon the facts here put in proof, that the porter was acting contrary to his duty, and, in hopes of personal gain to himself, undertaking a course of business not imposed upon him by the orders of the railway company? I confess, for myself, I should draw the same inference that was drawn by the county court judge; but what the defendants, in order to succeed, must establish is, that the county court judge could not by law have drawn such an inference. It is suggested that Mrs. Bunch's phrase, in asking the porter whether her bag would be safe, exhibited a consciousness that she was asking a favour, and not insisting on her rights as a passenger. I admit that the word "it," grammatically, as the evidence is reported to us, appears to refer to the bag; but I think what Mrs. Bunch meant was the luggage, both van and hand luggage, upon the trolley. But, whatever Mrs Bunch meant, I think she might have asked with equal force whether the train would arrive safely at its destination; and I do not think either her question or the porter's reply would have affected the contract relations of the parties. The truth is that in the conduct of business more contracts are made by the understood course of business than are ever reduced into writing, or even into spoken words at all; and I think that, when people hold themselves out as carriers, and receive luggage at a place regularly appointed to receive luggage for the purposes of a journey, they must be understood to receive it as carriers unless they give notice to the persons from whom they receive it that they receive it in some other capacity. It may be said that I ought not to disregard the existence of the cloak-room system, and that the receipt by the company's servants is susceptible of two interpretations. I admit that this is so; but in this case Mrs. Bunch at once informed the porter that the portmanteau and the hamper, as well as the Gladstone bag, were to be put into the train; and I agree with Lindley, L.J., that the company's notices and directions to their servants are intended to apply, and upon their true construction do apply, to luggage received for purposes of deposit, and not for purposes of transit, and it is upon this part of the case that I think the finding of the learned judge is conclusive against the defendants when he finds that the time of intrusting the luggage to the porter was a reasonable and proper time before the departure of the train. Once that proposition is accepted as conclusively found, it seems to me that the law that would be laid down by the minority of the Court of Appeal would amount to this, that a passenger bringing his luggage for carriage a reasonable and proper time before the departure of the train by which the luggage is to be carried can enforce no liability upon the company in respect of his luggage except it is placed in the cloak-room as a preliminary to the transit, and a receipt given for the same. And even this inadequately represents the difficulty of the contention, since it is obvious, from the notices put in evidence, that the cloak-room tickets and receipts import that the passenger who has deposited his luggage in the cloak-room is expected to get it out again from that same cloak-room, and if he wishes to travel must again commit it to the custody of the company after he has so taken it out. It would seem, therefore, to involve this proposition, that for parcels carried in the passenger carriages the railway company never can be liable at all.

I do not know that it is absolutely necessary in this case to determine what is the exact contract between the company and the passengers, since the learned judge has found negligence against the company, and I do not understand that there is any difference of opinion among us, that, if there was any contract to take care of the bag, there is sufficient evidence of negligence. But I must express my opinion that the views expressed by Lord Truro, Jervis, C.J., Williams, J., Crowder, J., Willes, J., Keating, J., and Montagu Smith, J., do not appear to have had sufficient weight given to them: see Richards v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co.; Talley v. Great Western Railway Co., 19 W. R. 154, L. R. 6 C. P. 44; Butcher v. South-Western Railway Co., 3 W. R. 409, 16 C. B. 13; by the judgment in the Court of Appeal in Bergheim v. Great Eastern Railway Co. All these learned judges appear to me to adopt the view that a railway company in accepting a passenger's luggage for carriage in a passenger train, and in the carriage with the passenger himself, do enter into a contract as common carriers, modified only to the extent that if loss happens by reason of want of care of the passenger himself who has taken within his own immediate control the goods which are lost, their contract as insurers does not apply to loss occasioned by the passenger's own default.

In Bergheim v. Great Eastern Railway Co., the Court of Appeal, commenting upon the case of Talley v. Great Western Railway Co., do not, I think, quite accurately represent the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas. In Talley v. Great Western Railway Co. that judgment expressly assumes the general liability of the company as common carriers, but that the general liability was modified by the implied condition that the passenger should use reasonable care, the fact being that the loss was caused by his neglect to do so, and would not have happened without such negligence. The negligence in question was leaving his portmanteau in a carriage unprotected by his presence; it was found at the end of a journey cut open and its contents rifled in a carriage which he had originally travelled in as far as Swindon, but which he had negligently omitted to re-enter upon leaving the refreshment room at that station. It is obvious that if the court were right, that the general liability of the company was modified by the undertaking of the passenger to look after his own luggage while it was in the passenger carriage, he had omitted that duty. But suppose the loss had happened by reason of some circumstance which would have been no breach of that modifying stipulation, could it have been contended that the company were not responsible as common carriers, because they were carrying for hire in one part of the train and not in another? If the view thus assumed is the correct view of the law, and I think it is, the moment the porters received Mrs. Bunch's luggage, whether van or hand luggage, they received, for carriage to Bath, all the luggage of the passenger; they received the van luggage to be put into the van; they received the hand luggage to be put into the passenger carriage; and I think the learned judge was entitled to infer that their practice, and, therefore, their contract, in receiving hand luggage, was to put it into the passenger carriage, or, if the railway company did not then bring up the train to the platform, to take care of it until the carriage was drawn up and in a position to receive the hand luggage, which in my view the porter, as the agent of the railway company, had accepted and received for that purpose.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right, and I move your lordships that that judgment be affirmed, and that this appeal be dismissed, with costs.

Lord WATSON.—This appeal brings up for consideration the decision of a county court judge, which the higher courts and this House have no jurisdiction to review, except in so far as it involves principles of law. It is impeached upon this ground mainly, that there was no evidence before the learned judge from which it could be reasonably inferred that, at the time when it disappeared, the respondent's Gladstone bag had been delivered to, and was in the possession of, the appellant company for the purpose of carriage. The evidence, it is said, points to, and only warrants, the conclusion that the bag was in the custody of a railway porter as bailee for the respondents.

In Butcher v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 16 C. B., at p. 22, Jervis, C.J., observed in reference to luggage which had been conveyed in the same carriage with its owner, "that, though not in express terms engrafted into it, it is a part of the contract of a railway company with its passengers that their luggage shall be delivered at the end of the journey, by the porters or servants of the company, into the carriages or other means of conveyance of the passengers from the station."

What was thus said of the termination applies equally to the commencement of a railway journey. In the ordinary course of business a passenger's luggage is received at the entrance to the station by the servants of the company, and is by them conveyed either to the van or to the carriage in which he intends to travel. I do not mean to say that railway companies are under any statutory or other obligation to provide that accommodation; but they find it for their interest to do so; and, in taking charge of luggage for these purposes, their servants act within the scope of their implied authority. Their duty is, according to prevailing usage, limited to the transport of passengers' luggage from the vehicle which brings it to the station to a train which is about to start, and does not extend to their taking charge of luggage which cannot, in any reasonable sense, be considered as in actual course of transit. It may be that railway porters do sometimes undertake the charge of luggage which is merely intended for future transit; when they do so they exceed the limits of their implied authority, and in that case their possession cannot be regarded as the possession of their employers.

If the respondents had gone to Paddington Station at noon of the 24th of December, 1884, and had then left their Gladstone bag with a porter, in order that it might accompany them on their journey to Bath by the five p.m. train, I should have had no hesitation in holding that the appellant company had not become responsible for its safe custody during the interval. In that case it would have been in accordance with well-known practice, and therefore an implied term of the subsequent contract between the parties, that the company were not to be liable unless the luggage was duly deposited in the office provided for that purpose. On the other hand, if the respondents had arrived at the station at 4.55 p.m., I entertain as little doubt that the delivery of their Gladstone bag to a porter, for the purpose of its being conveyed to the carriage in which they were about to travel, would have made the possession of their porter that of the appellant company.

Whether passenger's luggage, delivered to a railway porter, is in his possession for present, or merely with a view to future transit, is necessarily a question of degree depending upon the circumstances of the case. Railway companies, as a matter of fact, frequently provide for the travelling public, not only booking offices, but refreshment rooms, and other conveniences; and passengers who merely avail themselves of such accommodation as incidental to their use of the railway cannot be held to have temporarily ceased to prosecute their journey. Bergheim v. Great Eastern Railway Co. is a clear authority to that effect. It is impossible to fix any precise limit of time prior to the starting of a particular train within which the company are to be liable for passenger's luggage delivered to their servants for conveyance by it, and beyond which they are not to be so liable. In my opinion the company are responsible for luggage delivered to, and in the custody of, their servants for the purpose of transit whenever it can be reasonably predicated of the passenger to whom it belongs that he is actually prosecuting his journey by rail, and is not merely waiting in order to begin its prosecution at some future time.

In the present case the evidence shows that the female respondent arrived at Paddington Station forty minutes before the train by which she and her husband travelled was timed to start. She gave her luggage into the charge of one of the appellant company's porters, saw part of it labelled, and directed the porter to place the Gladstone bag, which was not labelled, in the same compartment with herself. The respondent then left the platform and went to the booking office, for the purpose apparently either of taking her ticket or of seeing that her husband procured it for her. She there met her husband, who had taken a ticket, and on their return to the platform, about ten minutes after her arrival, they found that the labelled luggage had been placed in the van, and that the porter and the Gladstone bag had both disappeared. In these circumstances I think the county court judge might reasonably come to the conclusion that the bag continued to be in the custody and possession of the respondents for the purposes of present, and not of future transit, from the time when it was delivered to their porter until its disappearance.

In the argument for the appellants considerable stress was laid upon the fact that at the time when Mrs. Bunch left her luggage upon the platform, the five o'clock train had not come alongside it. That circumstance does not seem to me to be very material, because a passenger can have no personal knowledge of it until he reaches the platform. What appears to me to be a matter of more consequencein the present case is, that it was Christmas Eve; that there was a great crowd of passengers intending to travel by the train in question, and that the servants of the company, as might have been anticipated, were, at the time when Mrs. Bunch arrived at the station, inviting passengers to take tickets, and receiving their luggage for the purpose of its being put in the train. I attach no importance to the question put by Mrs. Bunch to the porter, or to his assurance in reply, that her luggage would be quite safe, and that he would put it in the train. A conversation of that kind could not alter the contractual relations between her and the company.

On the assumption that the appellant company did become responsible for the safe keeping of the bag in question, it was argued on their behalf that there was no evidence before the county court judge to justify the inference that its loss was due to their negligence. Upon that point I am of opinion that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the inference, but I am by no means satisfied that, in order to entitle them to judgment, the respondents were bound to prove that the appellants had been negligent. That depends upon the nature of a railway company's contract liability for hand luggage, including in that term heavier articles, such as are commonly put in the van, when these are placed, or intended to be placed, with the assent of the company's servants, in the carriage in which their owner intends to travel, as well as lighter articles which are generally, if not invariably, carried beside him.

It does not admit of question that passengers' luggage duly delivered to the company's servants for carriage in the railway van remains during its transit at the risk of the company as common carriers; but it has always been held that it would be unreasonable and unjust to make the company liable as insurers in cases where the passenger has assumed, in whole or in part, the custody and control of his own luggage. Whilst they have been in agreement to that extent, eminent judges have differed as to the nature of the contract under which hand luggage is carried, some being of opinion that it is, from first to last, a contract to carry such luggage on the same terms as its owner—that is to say, with ordinary care—others being of opinion that it is throughout a contract of common carriage, modified by the personal interference of the passenger. Whichever of these views be accepted, it is manifest that, in many instances, the resulting liability of the company will be precisely the same; but, according to the second of them, the full responsibility of the company may revive on occasions when, from causes incidental to his journey, the interference of the passenger ceases for a time, and his hand luggage is committed to the exclusive charge of their servants.

At present the ruling authority upon this point is Bergheim v. Great Eastern Railway Co., where it appears to have been decided by the Court of Appeal, consisting of the noble and learned lord opposite (Lord Bramwell), the present Master of the Rolls, and Cotton, L.J., that the contract of the company with respect to hand luggage is merely to carry with ordinary care. Cotton, L.J., who delivered the judgment of the court, said:—"The company, therefore, must, according to ordinary principles, be held liable in respect of these goods as bailees for hire and contractors to carry, and, therefore, liable for loss or injury caused by negligence, but not otherwise; the company have, in fact, the same liability with respect to the carriage of those goods as they have with respect to the carriage of the passenger himself. This is our view on principle." The observations thus quoted were directed to the special case of a passenger's luggage which had been placed at his request, and with the assent of the company, in the carriage in which he was to travel; and the learned judge possibly did not intend to extend the principle to luggage in the exclusive custody of the company's servants for conveyance to or from the carriage.

However that may be, I prefer the principle which appears to me to have been adopted in Richards v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co. and Butcher v. London and South-Western Railway Co. I think the contract ought to be regarded as one of common carriage, subject to this modification, that in respect of his interference with their exclusive control of his luggage, the company are not liable for any loss or injury occurring during its transit to which the act or default of the passenger has been contributory.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed, with costs.

Lord Bramwell.—It is the custom for English railway companies, at all events for the appellants, to have porters at the entrance of their railways to receive the luggage of passengers and convey it to the van or carriage in which it is to be carried. Whether this is a duty imposed on the companies or a voluntary act on their part is immaterial. It is a duty they undertake, at least this company does, and must, like other duties, be performed with skill and without negligence.

What is this duty? I have said, to carry the passenger's luggage to the van or carriage in which it is to be carried. We all know that large packages are taken to the luggage van; smaller packages (often much too large for the comfort of other travellers) are, if requested by the passenger, taken to the carriage in which the passenger is to be carried, either that he may make use of it or take personal care of it, or, more frequently, that he may hasten away with it without waiting for it to be given out of the luggage van. There is no further duty or professed duty that I know of.

If the passenger arrives before the train is at the platform, whether of a terminal station or not, the porter may certainly refuse to do more than take the luggage on to the platform and leave it there in charge of the passenger. Of course, if the passenger wants to get his ticket and says so, the porter must take the luggage on to the platform and wait and see to it till the passenger has got his ticket and comes to see to it himself.

If there is any duty beyond this, it is more than I know of, or ever heard of; I mean any ordinary duty. There can be no duty on the company or the porter, when the train is not at the platform, to take care of the luggage till it comes. If there is an obligation to do this for five minutes there is an obligation to do it for as many hours. Everyone knows it is not so; everyone knows that a cloak-room is provided for the custody of luggage that the passenger wants to have taken care of till it can be put in the carriage in which it is to be carried. If this is true of luggage to be carried in the luggage carriage, and that is not there, it is equally true of luggage to be carried in the passenger carriage when the passenger is not there. If the luggage carriage is not there, the porter is not bound to take charge of the luggage till it comes. Of course, if he says nothing, but takes it, and it is labelled for its destination, and left in his charge, the passenger may well suppose, and has a right to suppose, that the company has taken charge of it for the journey. The passenger cannot tell whether the luggage carriage is there, or, if not, whether the company is not content to take it to a place where it will be in readiness for the train when it comes, and be taken care of meanwhile.

So, with respect to an article to be put in the passenger carriage, if the passenger should suppose a train he meant to go by was at the platform, and walked to it, and the porter said nothing, I should say that the passenger would have a right to suppose that the company had taken charge of the parcel, and was taking it to his intended carriage. But if the porter said of luggage intended for the luggage carriage, "That carriage is not here, you must look after your luggage yourself," and the passenger does not look after it, there would be no pretence for saying the company was liable. The same thing is true of luggage to be put in the passenger carriage. It must be remembered that luggage to go in the passenger carriage, is to go in the same carriage as its owner; the passenger. Suppose a train at the platform, the passenger says, "I want this in the carriage with me," the porter proceeds with the parcel to the train, the passenger goes somewhere else, not for a minute or so, but for some sensible time, five or ten minutes, perhaps half an hour. Would he have a right to complain if his parcel was placed near the train the passenger said he was going by, or taken to the lost luggage room? I say No. If he would, on what ground? He must know that by not following and taking his seat he was attempting to impose a burthen on the company's servants which he had no right to impose. Mrs. Bunch knew that. She did not say, "You must take care of this" or "I want to go and meet my husband;" but asks whether the bag will be safe. It will be said that it is not to be expected that she would speak with the precision of a lawyer, or know the law. I agree; but I say that, treating this practically, she knew, everybody knows, that she was asking for a favour, for something to which she had no right. Does anyone believe that if the porter had said, "I can take your luggage to the luggage carriage and it will be taken care of, but you must take care of what is to go with you till you have taken your place," I say if he had said this, as he ought to have done, would anyone believe she would have any right to complain or have been surprised; always let it be remembered that she knew that it was necessary to get some promise or engagement from the porter other and more than the ordinary engagement of a porter when he takes luggage.

Now as to what he said. Of course it was not a promise or contract by him for himself or the appellants. Certainly there was no consideration for it. All it amounted to was a statement of intention—a holding out of an expectation. "Will it be safe?" "Oh, yes; I will look after it." All that this means is, it will be safe, for I shall look after it. I say that that what the porter said did not impose a duty on the appellants which did not otherwise exist, that duty existed in the appellants other than to carry the bag to the carriage in which she took her place if she took it forthwith; that if she did not take her place so that the porter could not give the parcel into her charge there, she left it in the care of the porter at her own risk. I say she knew this, as is shewn by her question to the porter, and by her acceptance of his statement.

A word on the judgment below. Lord Esher says: "Now comes the case of luggage which is not to go into the van. The porters take possession of such luggage at the same time that they take possession of the other, and they take it on to the platform or the carriage. During the whole of that time it is in process of conveyance to the place to which the passenger is going, and is in possession of a servant of the railway company." So it is, but that is just what this bag was not. There was a time during which it was not in process of conveyance, a time during which it was stationary, during which the porter had said he would guard it. Lord Esher says: "The question is whether there was evidence upon which the county court judge might reasonably find for the plaintiffs." Evidence of what? Evidence of some fact on which he might reasonably so find? What fact? We know all the facts. Lindley, L.J., says: "It seems to me a simple case of transit, not of intrusting to the porter in any sense other than that in which everything put into his hands is intrusted to him. It is very true there was a short time during which it would not be necessary for him actually to keep walking on or rolling his trolley. There was a short delay, but a delay so short as to make it utterly unreasonable to suppose that this ought to be held to be beyond the scope of his duty. It is not essential to say more than this, that the porter was acting within the scope of his employment in taking the luggage in the way he did from the cab to the train." Now, that is precisely what he did not do. He did not take it from the cab to the train. He put it down and said he would guard it, and did that. As to the time being short, it was to be as long as the lady was away, and might have been forty minutes, or more, if the plaintiff had not arrived. I agree with Lopes, L.J.: "It was not part of the employment of a porter to take charge of luggage, except during that transit, i.e., from the cab to the train." I mean by that, during the time which is fairly and reasonably necessary for that transit; and see p. 228.

I make no remark on other authorities beyond this, that they show a generous struggle, on the one hand, to make powerful companies liable to individuals, and on the other hand, an effort for law and justice. Sometimes one succeeds, sometimes the other, and the same conflict accordingly.

I have not used a technical expression, not a word about bailments, &c. I have used plain and practical language. The appellants were under no duty to take care of the bag while Mrs. Bunch went to look for her husband; the porter could, and ought to, have refused to do so. Had he done so, Mrs. Bunch would therefore have no cause of complaint. By doing as he did he could impose no duty on the defendants which did not otherwise exist. Before the respondent can complain of negligence he must make out a duty to exist, before he can have done so. Not that I am sure there is a question of negligence. The sum in dispute is small, but if the question is of considerable importance. If the appellants are liable in this case, I do not know they can avoid it in similar cases. It is certain that the porter exceeded his duty if he made the defendants liable, and I suppose other porters, from good nature or the hope of a tip, will do the same again, though expressly forbidden as this man was. The result of what took place is that the defendants are liable for not taking care of the bag during the time it did not suit Mrs. Bunch to do so.

I cannot pretend to a doubt on the case. Nor can I understand the repeated expression that the county court judge might find as he did—an expression that imports he might have found otherwise. How can that be when the actual facts are not in dispute, nor the conclusions to be drawn from them? I hold that the judgment is wrong, and should be reversed.

Lord Herschell.—No appeal lies in this case from any conclusion of fact arrived at by the county court judge. It is only if he has erred in law that his judgment can be questioned. The single point, therefore, which has to be determined is, as it seems to me, whether there was any evidence to warrant the conclusion that the plaintiff's luggage was lost owing to a breach of obligation on the part of the defendants. It is not necessary for me to state the facts. They have been fully brought before the House by those of your lordships who have preceded me. I will only say that I do not think that the question put to the porter by Mrs. Bunch, or the answer given by him, really affects the case. If the company were under an obligation towards the plaintiff in respect of the bag, I cannot think that this question and answer diminished or destroyed it. If they were not under any such obligation I do not think it was imposed upon them by the statement of the porter.

I concur entirely in the opinions which have been expressed by the noble and learned lord upon the woolsack and the noble and learned lord on my right (Lord Watson), and think it necessary to add but little. Although there was a difference of opinion amongst the judges in the court below, and your lordships do not all take the same view, I think the difference is confined within somewhat narrow limits. I believe that all the judges who have dealt with the case and all your lordships are agreed that if luggage is brought to a railway station and handed to a porter so long before the time appointed for the starting of the train, that it cannot be reasonably said to be intrusted to him for the purpose of its transit with the passenger to its destination, but must be considered as so intrusted for the purpose of being taken care of until the time for the departure of the passenger arrives, the porter is not the servant or agent of the company to undertake the custody and care of the luggage, and the company would not be liable for its loss. Railway companies have provided cloak-rooms or left-luggage offices, which are the proper receptacles for luggage brought to the station under such circumstances.

On the other hand, I do not understand my noble and learned friend (Lord Bramwell), who differs from the majority of your lorships, to doubt that the porter who receives a passenger's luggage at the entrance of the station for the purpose of conveying it to the train, does so as the servant of the company, and that they are liable as well for the luggage which the passenger intends to take with him in the carriage as that destined for the van in case it is lost during its transit to either carriage or van owing to the porter's negligence. And I understand him further to entertain the view that, though the traveller does not proceed direct to the train with his luggage, but stops for the purpose of taking his ticket, the company are nevertheless liable during the time so occupied.

Now I do not think it can be laid down that procuring a ticket is the only act incidental to the journey for which the passenger may pause on his way to the train without the company being free from liability in case the luggage is lost in the meantime; would not the case be the same if he waited to meet a person who had promised to take his ticket for him, provided always he has not come unreasonably early, and does not wait an unreasonable time? Does, then, the fact that the train by which the passenger is to depart is not at the platform when he arrives at the station make any difference? It may, no doubt, be an element in determining whether the passenger has arrived so early that the transit to his destination cannot properly be said to have commenced. But I do not think it is conclusive of the point, or that the obligation of the company is necessarily different from what it would be if the train were alongside the platform.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the practice of different railway companies, and, indeed, of the same company at different times, varies greatly as to the length of the period prior to the departure of the train during which it is drawn up at the platform. Sometimes, after being at the platform, the train is shunted out of the station, and only returns immediately before its departure. Under these circumstances it is impossible even for a passenger who arrives very shortly before the time fixed for the departure of the train to know, when he alights at the station and intrusts his luggage to a porter, whether the train is at the platform or not. The question whether the luggage can fairly be said to be in the custody of the company's servant for the purpose of transit, or of what I may term warehousing, will not, I think, be generally difficult of solution, though, as it is not possible to lay down any strict line of demarcation, there will always be cases on the border where opinions may differ as to the proper conclusion to be drawn. In the present case Mrs. Bunch arrived forty minutes before the time of departure. She was about ten minutes waiting for her husband, who was to take her ticket. On the other hand it was Christmas Eve, when the trains are notoriously crowded, and prudence dictates an earlier arrival than usual. We have not to determine what would be our view of these facts. I concur with those of my noble and learned friends who think that the county court judge was warranted in point of law in arriving at the conclusion which he did with respect to them.

I have only to add that, although it is not necessary in this case to determine what is the nature of the duty devolving upon a railway company in respect of luggage carried, or intended to be carried, in the same carriage with the passenger, I am disposed to agree with my noble and learned friends in preferring the view of this duty to be derived from the cases of Richards v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co. and Butcher v. South-Western Railway Co. to that enunciated in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Berghein v. Great Eastern Railway Co.

Lord Macnaghten.—I concur in the motion which has been proposed.
